This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. M'Clure, Naismith, Brodie, & Macfarlane, v. Stewart.

M'Clure, Naismith, Brodie, & Macfarlane, (Defenders) Appellants. —Balfour, Q.C.—Pearson—Haldane.

Robert Buchanan Stewart, (Pursuer) Respondent.—Rigby, Q.C.—Begg.

Agent and Client—Reparation—Alleged failure of agent to inform client of material fact—Proof—Onus.—B, a law-agent, was employed by a client to obtain a loan on the security of a patent. S, another client of B, after consulting B, lent £5000. The patent was subsequently found to be invalid, having been anticipated by prior patents. In an action raised by S against B for payment of loss through the transaction, on the ground that the defender had failed to communicate to the pursuer the fact that he had ascertained that the patent could not be relied on as valid without further inquiry than had been made, and had allowed him to advance his money in ignorance of this risk, held (rev. judgment of First Division) (1) that the onus of proving that the communication had not been made lay upon the pursuer; and (2) on the proof (diss. the Lord Chancellor) that the pursuer had failed to discharge himself of this onus, and that from the facts proved and documents produced it was to be inferred that B did make the communication to his client.

(Reported in the Court of Session, July 7, 1886, 13 R. 1062.)

At delivering judgment,—

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case, with one possible exception, with which I will deal presently, it seems to me that no question of law arises, but that it is one simply of fact.

The history of the case, although it will take some time to go through the details of it, may, I think, shortly be summarised in this way—That from the month of March in the year 1877 down to the month of September in the same year, Mr Brodie, one of the defenders, was endeavouring to procure the sum of £10,000 for the Messrs Martin, who were patentees of improvements in anchors. The original intention had been to create a partnership, and an advertisement issued from Mr Brodie's office inviting persons to become partners and to advance capital. The pursuer, who had been a client for some time of Mr Brodie, was, I think, as early as the month of June in the first instance brought into the matter, and after some negotiations with reference to a partnership the question became one of loan, and in the course of the negotiations it became apparent to Mr Brodie that if some lenders could be induced to advance £5000 it would facilitate matters in the success of the adventure in which they were all interested in common. The only person, I think, who can be properly said to have filled the character of lender was the pursuer. By reason of family ties and business ties the others had interests not simply as investors, and Mr Brodie was acting for them. Now, I think it is impossible to deny that the interests of the respective parties were necessarily to some extent of a counter character. Those who were borrowing money had an interest in getting that money lent, and those who were lending it had an interest in seeing that the money so lent was properly secured. The person who was endeavouring to borrow for a client was in this instance the person whose duty it was to see that the security was sufficient. I do not say that it is impossible to reconcile those two positions, but I think it casts upon him the duty of being on his guard against himself, and of seeing that he does not sacrifice the interests of one client to the interests of the other. Whether he did so or did not do so is the question in the cause.

Now, something has been said about the lapse of time which has taken place between the supposed cause of action and the attempt to recover damages for it in a Court of law, but the whole question in the cause is, whether the pursuer did or did not know at the time of the transaction in what way his interests had been regarded by Mr Brodie. A subsequent question arose, about which I will say a word presently. I am not quite certain that the question of the lapse of time is very material except in this sense, that it may render it more difficult for either side to prove their case; but whatever may be said as to lapse of time, not by way of fault on the part of the pursuer, but by reason of the proper and just mode of disposing of the case, those who allege a fact must prove it whatever the lapse of time may be, and no Court of law would be satisfied with less than an adequate amount of proof because time has elapsed.

Before dealing with the facts I wish to say one word about the onus. It appears to me that if the Lord President has laid down the rule that in this case the onus was on anyone else than the pursuer, he was in error. I cannot acquiesce in that view of the law. I will refer to a case in which a somewhat similar question arose, namely, the case of Elkin v. Janson, 13 M. & W. 655. There an action being brought upon a policy of insurance, the defendant pleaded that material facts were not disclosed—the plaintiff, in reply, pleaded de injuria. It was argued that the person who was bound to establish the fact that the communication was made was the plaintiff, and very much upon this ground—Counsel was commenting on a case in Maule & Selwyn, where it was held upon a conviction against a carrier for having game in his possession that it lay on the defendant to prove the affirmative of his qualification, and not on the informer to prove the negative. Mr Justice Bayley in that case said—"I have always understood it to be a general rule that if a negative averment be made by one party which is peculiarly within the knowledge of the other, the party within whose knowledge it lies and who asserts the affirmative is to prove it, and not he who avers the negative." Mr Baron Alderson, upon hearing Mr Justice Bayley's words read, intervened, and said—"I doubt as a general rule whether those expressions are not too strong. They are right as to the weight of the evidence, but there should be some evidence to start it in order to cast the onus on the other side." That I believe to be the accurate rule, and applying it to this case I have no doubt in the world that it lay on the pursuer here to give evidence to shew that the communication which is all important in this case was not made to him. On the other hand, dealing with it simply as a question of the degree of weight which should be attached to each step of evidence in the cause, I think it is important to bear in mind whose duty it was to communicate the fact which was so material in this case.

Now, adverting to the facts, and admitting fully that the onus was upon the pursuer in the first instance, the evidence appears to me to come to this—I will say one word about the effect and value of Mr Brodie's entries presently,—but assuming the complexion which those entries take in my view to be the correct one, I will state what appears to me, with the most sincere deference to those who take a different view, to be the effect of the evidence. Mr Brodie in the first instance endeavoured, I have no doubt, to do his duty to his client; he consulted Mr Hunt; he received Mr Hunt's report on the 14th of August, and it is taken as a fact by all who have dealt with this case that from the 14th of August to the 3d of September he made no communication of that fact to the pursuer. Then it appears that though he made no communication of this fact to the pursuer he made entries in his books which shew communications of a very considerable character between himself and Messrs Martin and those who represented them. So, if I am right, Mr Brodie thought it consistent with his duty to the client who was lending his money to enter into these communications and consultations with the borrower of the money, having in his pocket this communication which he had received from Mr Hunt, and never communicating either by word or letter the result of that communication to the man who was trusting him as the person who was to advise him with respect to the advance of his money. Nor, my Lords, does it appear to be a matter of doubt that even when the communication is suggested to have been made (upon the question whether it was made or not I will say one word presently), it was made in a way different from that in which everyone will agree it would have been made if the pursuer had had a solicitor of his own to advise him, and it is not, of course, denied that where a person is undertaking the double capacity of advising persons who may have adverse interests his duty towards each of them is not lessened by the double capacity which he affects to fill. The result of that appears to be that the first communication made (if any was made) by Mr Brodie to the pursuer was made in the presence of all the other parties, and at a meeting at which all the other parties were to attend, and he was to be presented with these alternatives—"Either the matter must go off, or you must accept Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's report." Now, I say that those are alternatives which ought not to have been so presented to him, because from the beginning to the end of the transaction it is not suggested that by word or letter Mr Brodie ever gave the pursuer an opportunity of considering this matter. And one test which I would apply would be this—suppose Mr Brodie had been only the adviser of the pursuer, is it conceivable that he would not have had communications with him either by word or letter, and consultations with him apart from the other party to the transaction, so as to give him an opportunity of deliberating over and considering the very important investment which he was about to make?

Well, my Lords, that is so far what I may call the admitted complexion of the facts, but I cannot help thinking that that admitted complexion of the facts reflects some light upon the question whether or not we are to assume that that communication which is here suggested to have been made was in fact made. Now, upon that matter it is a remarkable fact that of all the persons present there is not one of them, with the exception of the defender himself, who will allege that that communication was made. And even when one speaks of the defender himself it must be said that he very candidly declined to pledge himself that by any effort of memory he could recall a state of facts upon which he could aver that the communication was made, but he says that seeing a condition of things so novel, and placing his mind so far as he can in the condition of a person who would be subjected to great loss by reason of the neglect of a precaution which ought to have been taken, he is satisfied that he could not have permitted his client to enter into that transaction without having made the communication in question. So that of all the persons present there is really not one who will say as matter of memory that that communication took place.

Now, my Lords, I am not disposed to undervalue the record made at the time; it is most important, and I do not undervalue its importance, but it must be taken with this qualification—if its purport is to be a historical record of everything that took place, and if you are not to suppose that it was not made at the time (which I think no one has suggested)—remembering the object and purpose for which it was made, you may attach credit to it. But I think a greater effect than is just is given to the language in which it is conveyed. The object and purpose of this record is an entirely proper one, namely, to keep an account of the business done on behalf of the Messrs Martin, and to charge them with the amount of work which is done. It is in the ordinary course of the entries made for the purpose of afterwards making out a solicitor's bill, but in the end it does not purport that at the time it was anything like an exhaustive description of everything which was done, and indeed if one translate it by comparing those things which are in it, together with matters which still survive, they enable us to judge of the true effect and meaning of what those entries were intended to convey, and to see that words in the entries which speak of full explanations are satisfied by something which is neither full nor which explains. I will take, for example, the last of the entries which are under the date of the 15th of August—"Writing Mr Stewart, explaining and arranging meeting." Now, if that letter had not been extant, and had not been before us, it probably would have been argued, or it certainly might have been argued with some force, as it has been argued with regard to some other entries, that when Mr Brodie wrote that entry, "Writing Mr Stewart, explaining and arranging meeting," he must have explained in that letter the information which he had received from Mr Hunt (which was in truth the reason of the postponement of the meeting), and explained the difficulty which had arisen. As a matter of fact the letter survives, and we see that the letter contains no such explanation. But no one will suggest that that entry was made with a fraudulent design to misrepresent the character of the letter therein referred to. So when one refers to the entry of the 17th of August, "Attending meeting of all parties" (giving the parties) "and making full explanations," if the letter of the 20th had not been written I suppose it would have been irrefragable evidence, according to the argument which is suggested, that the whole of Mr Hunt's communications to Mr Brodie were then explained. The evidence shewed that they were not. Again, I say no one will suggest that that entry was made with a fraudulent design to represent explanations as having been made which were not made, but, as I say, having reference to the object and purpose with which such entries are made, it explains the nature of the business which was done. I think that they ought not to be carried further than this, that some business, corresponding generally to the character of what is therein described, was done, for which Mr Brodie had a right and a proper desire to make a charge against the person who was responsible for payment for the business which had been done.

My Lords, I am aware that it is said—"If you suppose that this information was withheld, you are making a serious charge of fraud against Mr Brodie." Now, everyone—counsel, Judges, and everyone else—is very reluctant indeed to charge fraud. A person who charges fraud undertakes a heavy burden, and the tendency of all Courts is certainly not to make light of it. Therefore, the learned counsel who attended at your Lordships' bar have not only with great propriety, but with great prudence also, declined to accept that issue, which in truth is an issue that ought not to be put upon those who are complaining of breach of duty if a breach of duty has been committed. If it involves the person complained of, the character which it assumes is immaterial except in this respect, namely, what I may call the not unnatural tendency of all Courts to refuse to act upon anything which is not satisfactory evidence in the cause. The question really is, whether a breach of duty was committed, and if a breach of duty was committed, whether it is charged as fraud or as negligence, is, so far as the pursuer is concerned, immaterial; but, for my own part, I do not think that it is a just observation to say that people may not, in the position which Mr Brodie had voluntarily entered into, possibly commit grave errors of judgment which, if they had the independent view in their minds which they ought to have had, they would recognise as not just to one or other of their clients. Mr Brodie had been from the month of March endeavouring to effect this loan. It is quite possible that with a perfect desire to help both parties, and thinking that everything would go right, he may not have given all the information and advice to the pursuer which he should have done, and yet not have been conscious of sacrificing the interests of his client. I quite admit the broad proposition, apart from the circumstances, apart from the mode in which a man gradually slides from negligence in the earlier stage to something which afterwards assumes the complexion of fraud. I think that in human nature it is very likely that a man in Mr Brodie's position, who begins with a real desire to do what is right at the time, may gradually slide into what is not just to one of his clients, because he is endeavouring to reconcile the interests of both. But however that may be, my Lords, taking the impression upon my mind from what I may describe as the counsels which, apart from the pursuer, Mr Brodie carried on with Mr Martin, and considering the admitted facts proved by the letter, that he had made up his mind without consultation with the pursuer himself, to advise the pursuer to waive any further inquiry and to accept the report of Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck, and looking at the circumstances under which he exposed his client to admitted difficulty without previous consultation with himself and apart from the other persons interested in this transaction, the alternative being suddenly placed before him of either accepting or rejecting a profitable investment which was almost within his grasp, I have come to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that Mr Brodie did not make the communication which I think his sense of duty ought to have led him to make, and if he did not make that communication I believe all your Lordships are of opinion that he would be responsible in damages for the loss of this money.

My Lords, I have thought it right to make these observations, not that I have so much confidence in my own judgment as to suppose that I am right when your Lordships take a different view, but I thought it was only just to the learned Judges below, who have shared the view which I take, shortly to express the grounds upon which I have come to the same conclusion as they have. I am quite aware that the result of the ultimate deliberation will be to overrule the judgment of those learned Judges and to re-establish the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Earl of Selborne.—My Lords, I am glad that this case has been twice argued, because it would not have been satisfactory that a unanimous judgment of this nature of the First Division of the Court of Session should be reversed either by a small number of your Lordships not unanimous, or without very full consideration; but for my own part I see no reason, after having heard the second argument in this case, to alter the opinion which I formed upon the occasion of the first hearing, which was in the appellants' favour.

The Lord Ordinary and the Inner-House of the Court of Session have differed upon a question, not of law but of fact. I cannot, in any case, dissent from an opinion in which four learned Judges have been agreed without much and careful consideration, but in this instance I have been led, after repeated consideration, to the same conclusions as the Lord Ordinary. The question seems to me to depend very much less upon the oral evidence of the parties and witnesses (speaking on both sides, after a lapse of eight years, from a confessedly imperfect recollection of what had passed in conversations at that distance of time) than upon the confirmation which the statements on one side or on the other receive or fail to receive from documentary evidence contemporaneous with the transaction in question, and the reasonable presumptions from uncontested facts. Of the parole evidence in this case (so far as it depends upon unaided memory) I should be disposed to say that it would not by itself on either side furnish at all a satisfactory basis for judgment, and that if the balance had not been turned by the documents (in which I include the entries in the appellants' books, which are among the evidence on the record, and were referred to in Mr Brodie's testimony), and by those considerations which fairly arise out of the probabilities of the case, much might have depended upon the onus probandi. The pursuer's evidence may have been (I assume that it was) sufficient to throw upon the defenders the burden of producing some evidence on the other side to shew that those communications, which the pursuer denies, were made in point of fact, but it is not positive in that sense which would make a conviction for perjury possible if the fact were ever so clearly established against him. The state of Mr Brodie's memory in 1885, if not aided by letters and entries in his books, might not have enabled him to satisfy the burden of proof which, as I have assumed, was thrown upon him; but I am of opinion that the entries in his books ought to receive credit, and ought to be considered in connection with his evidence, and I cannot help adding that they appear to me to have received less consideration than I think due to them in the Court from which the appeal is brought.

The action was for negligence in the discharge of a duty undertaken by the appellants as law-agents for the pursuer on the occasion of his becoming a contributor in the autumn of 1877 to a loan of £10,000, made to two French gentlemen named Martin upon the security of a patent or patents taken out by the Martins in 1872 for certain improvements in anchors. The pursuer (respondent here) contributed £5000; the rest was found by Messrs Miller, ironfounders in Glasgow, and some friends of theirs whom they induced to join. Throughout that transaction the appellants' firm acted as law-agents for all parties, and by the interlocutor appealed from they have been ordered to make good to the pursuer the whole loss which he has sustained by failure of the security, for the patents being disputed three years afterwards turned out to be bad. Mr Brodie was the partner in the appellants' firm who acted in this transaction, and the conclusion drawn by the Lord President (with the concurrence of at least two of the other Judges of the First Division) from the whole evidence was that Mr Brodie "concealed" from the pursuer some very material facts which ought to have been disclosed to him, and that "the interest of one client was sacrificed for that of another."

The Lord President justly said that this was "a very serious matter," and it is on that account necessary to be careful and vigilant, lest injustice should be done to Mr Brodie by affirming such a condemnation upon insufficient grounds. In the language of those Courts of this country with which I have been most familiar, concealment of material facts by a solicitor from one of his clients in order to promote at his expense the interest of another client, would generally be called fraud, and no doubt the averments of the pursuer in his amended condescendence do cover such a case of fraud though the word is not used. The respondent's counsel at your Lordships' bar declined studiously and emphatically to impute fraud, but they did not suggest an omission of duty arising out of mere oversight or inadvertence; they admitted that the non-communication of the matter in question to the pursuer (if it was not communicated) must have been intentional, and they did not give up any part of the substance of the pursuer's allegations, whatever judicial estimate might be formed of them. I do not say that such a line as this, if taken out of tenderness towards the feelings and reputation of a former friend, ought to operate in any way to the pursuer's prejudice; but the appellants are entitled under such circumstances to the full benefit of all ordinary and reasonable presumptions consistent with the proved facts of the case in favour of their honesty and good faith, and I think it right to add, that I could not myself reconcile the non-communication of those things which the pursuer says were not communicated to him under the actual circumstances with honesty and good faith on Mr Brodie's part, especially having regard to the terms of the entry in the appellants' books of the 3d September 1887. That entry is in these words,—"Long meeting with parties interested; going over draft agreement and draft assignment, and previously reporting fully as to what had taken place in regard to inquiries as to the patents, and when it was resolved to accept report of patent-agents in London as furnished—nearly three hours." Mr Stewart and the other proposed lenders of the £10,000 were present at that meeting. What had happened "in regard to inquiries as to the patents," and as to the report of the patent-agents in London then furnished, was this—Mr Brodie of his own accord wrote on the 11th August to Mr Hunt, a patent-agent in Glasgow (whose place of business was very near his own), a letter. On the 14th of August he saw Mr Hunt, and what then took place appears by Mr Hunt's entries in his books, and by Mr Brodie's letter to Mr J. R. Miller of the 20th August. Mr Brodie ascertained in this way that there were some patents earlier than 1872, not which did, but which possibly might, affect the value of the proposed security, and he thought (as Mr Hunt also did) that it would be "necessary to have a distinct report by the patent-agent" (by which expression he then meant Mr Hunt, but it is obvious that Mr Hunt wa not the only patent-agent in the world from whom such a report might be sufficient) "before proceeding further." This (he said) would require time, and a it would be attended with expense (which Mr Martin would have to bear), "the authority of Mr Martin must be obtained." With this view a series of communications followed between Mr Brodie, Mr Martin, and Mr Buckland, who was Martin's agent; the first on the 15th of August (the day after the interview with Mr Hunt), and the last (as I collect from the entries in the appellants' books) on the 29th of that month. Mr Martin before the 24th August (on which day there was a conference on the subject between Mr Morrison, the appellants' clerk, and Mr Buckland) had proposed, as Mr Morrison then understood, that "counsel's opinion" should be "accepted in view of report from Mr Hunt." It is not, however, unlikely that Mr Martin may have meant (whether using inaccurately the word "counsel" or not) the opinion which he did obtain from his own patent-agents, Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck, and which is dated on the 24th of August. At a subsequent meeting (either on the 25th or on the 27th August), Mr Buckland placed in Mr Brodie's hand that opinion, or (as Mr Martin called it) "report" of Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck, and communicated to him a letter to himself (Buckland) from Martin in which it was enclosed, and in which Martin said,—"If this is not sufficient and satisfactory to the utmost we must give up without the least hesitation." From what passed during that or the following interview Mr Buckland inferred that Mr Brodie would "advise the contributors that the report was satisfactory," and would "endeavour to get them together as soon as possible," so that they might "either reject or consent then and there," and so Mr Buckland, in a letter from Glasgow, dated the 27th August (which I accept as evidence, finding it on the record, though in strictness it might have been objected to by the appellants), informed Mr Martin. Mr Brodie, however, did not accept that "report" as satisfactory, without first making an independent inquiry through his own London correspondents, Messrs Anderson & Sons, as to the reputation and standing as patent-agents of Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck, and Messrs Anderson & Sons received from Messrs Carpmael (very good authority on such a subject) a quite satisfactory account of them, which they duly reported to Mr Brodie.

The meeting of the 3d September (a meeting of Mr Brodie and all the lenders) was then appointed to take place "in order" (as explained by Mr Brodie to Mr J. R. Miller) "that the drafts might be submitted and a report made as to what had taken place since the last meeting, which had to be postponed." A meeting which had been appointed (on the 17th) for the 24th August, had been in fact postponed on account of what passed between Mr Brodie and Mr Hunt, as was clearly explained to Mr J. R. Miller in Mr Brodie's letter of the 20th August already mentioned. I assume in the respondent's favour that no similar or equally full explanation was given before the 3d September to anyone else.

These being the circumstances which led up to the meeting of the 3d September 1887, I am clearly of opinion that if Mr Brodie did not communicate to the parties, who then decided to accept Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's report as sufficient for their purpose, the material inquiries as to the patents which had led to that report being obtained and offered to them by the Martins, and especially the substance of what passed between Mr Brodie himself and Mr Hunt, the entry of the 3d of September in the appellant's books was not true, and could not have been honestly made. That entry is not similar to that of the 17th of August; it is not expressed in vague or equivocal terms. It says that Mr Brodie then "reported fully as to what had taken place in regard to inquiries as to the patents," and this as introductory to the question whether the "report of patent-agents in London as furnished" should be accepted. That could not have been done without stating the inquiries made in the first instance through Mr Hunt, and what followed thereon, and I think it impossible (independently of that entry), that facts so material to the question which the parties had to consider and determine at that meeting could have been kept under the circumstances from the knowledge of the parties then assembled without some improper motive.

Is it then a just conclusion from the materials before your Lordships that there was a suppression of those facts, and that the entry of the 3d September ought to be rejected as false, or as not extending in its fair and natural import to the matter now in question? On the one side there is nothing except the postponement of any communication of the facts to more than one of the lenders until that time, and the terms of the letter of the 20th August by which they were communicated to Mr J. R. Miller; on the other side (as it seems to me), are all the probabilities and ascertained facts of the case pointing to the conclusion that the entry is entitled to credit, and that the proper communications were made. The statements of Mr Brodie, confirmed by those of Mr John Ritchie Miller, appear to me to be quite enough to support the entry as honest and true, and also to shew (as far as the recollection of those witnesses goes) that the explanations given were such in all respects as they ought to have been.

There is no suggestion and no probability of any motive operating, or which can be conceived as likely to have operated, on Mr Brodie's mind to pervert his judgment, or obscure his sense of duty, or lead him to prefer the interest of the borrowing to that of the lending clients. He had long known the pursuer, and was on friendly terms with him; his acquaintance with the borrowers was recent, and in this transaction only. The appellants entered into this business without knowing anything more of the patent than that it was commercially successful, and had been in use without challenge for five years, and that the Messrs Miller, who had manufactured anchors for the patentees under it, thought so well of it as to be disposed to lend their own money, and to induce some of their friends to do the same. Whether the treaty for the loan was completed or went off, the appellants' costs would at all events be paid.

The general facts do not tend to shew that in this matter the appellants thought only of the borrowers' or neglected the lenders' interest. When they consulted Mr Hunt (as they did spontaneously on the 11th of August), they were manifestly acting bona fide not in the borrowers' but in the lenders' interest, and the "jottings" also prove that during the period between the 24th of August and the 1st of September they were still continuing to seek information on various points in the lenders' interest, and theirs only. In the same interest they inquired through their London correspondents as to Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's position and character. What reason can be suggested for their acting otherwise at the meeting of the 3d of September? I am content to take it as a just inference, from the terms of the letter of the 20th of August, that they did not enter into this matter with their clients at the first meeting held after their interview with Mr Hunt on the 17th August. It is also true that when informing Mr J. R. Miller of the most material facts in their letter of the 20th August, as constituting reasons for the postponement of the meeting then fixed for the 24th, they said,—"Inform Mr Caird and the others, except Mr Stewart, simply saying that it has been found necessary to postpone the meeting fixed for Friday." If those circumstances were not open to any honest and rational explanation, and if the case were made that Mr Brodie and Mr J. R. Miller were acting in collusion together for the borrowers' interest, there would be force in the observations of the Judges of the First Division on this part of the case. But no such imputation on Mr J. R. Miller was made or insinuated, nor can I see the least ground for it, although he was connected as a manufacturer of anchors under the patent with the Martins, and had on their behalf introduced this business to the appellants' firm. He was not likely for that reason to be willing to lend his own money, still less to advise his friends to lend theirs, without necessity, upon the security of a bad patent. In the absence of such collusion between them it is impossible to suppose either that Mr Brodie, having written as he did to Mr J. R. Miller on the 20th of August, could have been silent as to the material facts mentioned in that letter at the meeting of the 3d of September, or that, if he had been then silent, Mr Miller, as an honest man, would have held his peace on that subject during the whole three hours while the meeting lasted.

The non-communication of the whole facts to any of the lenders except Mr J. R. Miller before the 3d September, and the suggestion to Mr J. R. Miller that he should "simply" inform his friends of the postponement of the meeting fixed for the 24th of August (without entering into the reasons for it), seem to me to admit of an easy and natural explanation, consistent with the indifferent and impartial performance of his duty by Mr Brodie towards all his clients. The communications with the borrowers, arising out of what passed between him and Mr Hunt, had begun just two days before the meeting of the 17th August, and were still depending and in an early stage of progress. Mr Brodie, if he expected that they would have a satisfactory result, might well think, and might honestly and reasonably act on the opinion, that it was not necessary or desirable in the meantime to enter into partial explanations or discussions on that subject upon imperfect materials. He had initiated those inquiries without previous instructions from or communication with his clients, and they had not yet been brought to a point; it was impossible on the 17th of August to know with certainty what might result from them; the result, when arrived at, ought to be communicated, but in the meantime other things might well go forward. It is consistent with the whole evidence that Mr Brodie may have said at that meeting enough to make all present understand that there might be matters not then ripe for consideration which might come before the next meeting: even if he did not say so, I could not infer from his silence at that stage of the matter any purpose of suppression. The same reasons might lead him to think it unnecessary for Mr J. R. Miller to explain to his friends the causes of the postponement of the meeting fixed for the 24th August, and to prefer doing so at the proper time himself. As for the exception of Mr Stewart in the letter, I am satisfied (as the Lord Ordinary was) with Mr Brodie's explanation, although he did not give Mr Stewart any notice of the postponement until the day appointed, when Mr Stewart was informed of it, with some reasons then given by Mr Morrison, Mr Brodie's clerk, whom I assume not to have entered into any unnecessary particulars, though I do not doubt the truth of the entry made by him in the appellants' books.

The Lord President appears to have thought that nothing short of some written communications on this subject to the pursuer (and I presume also to all the other lenders) ought to be held sufficient. With that view I am unable to agree. If all the material facts were communicated to the lenders when assembled at the meeting of the 3d September, the duty of the law-agents was, in my opinion, sufficiently performed. His Lordship also thought that there was some concealment by Mr Brodie of his own opinion as to the necessity of additional inquiry for the lenders' protection. From that opinion I am also compelled to differ, unless it ought to be concluded that Mr Brodie considered—or as a reasonable man of business was bound to consider—Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's letter insufficient for that purpose. That letter, besides referring to the undisputed and successful user of the patent for five years as affording (which it certainly did) strong practical grounds for a belief in its validity, went on to state the opinion of those patent-agents (whose standing and reputation was attested by the high authority of Messrs Carpmael), "that no previous patents taken for improvements in the construction of anchors could affect in any way the validity of the patent of 1872," and that they "believed the principles embodied in that patent to be essentially novel." To myself it never would have occurred as a possible supposition (and therefore I cannot think it was actionable negligence in Mr Brodie if it did not in September 1877 occur to him) that competent and respectable patent-agents could put their names to such an opinion without having first looked into the "previous patents taken for improvements in the construction of anchors," or without applying their skill and judgment to the consideration of the question of the novelty of the invention of 1872 with reference to those previous patents. That letter or "report" was, in my judgment, equivalent to a representation that they had done so, with a result altogether favourable to the patent of 1872. The specifications of all the previous patents were as accessible to Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck in London as they could have been to Mr Hunt at Glasgow, or to any other patent-agents whom the appellants might have consulted there or elsewhere. Nor does it appear to me that either Mr Brodie or his clients had any reasonable ground for distrusting Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's opinion, because it had been obtained by the patentees themselves, and was embodied in a letter addressed to them. The patentees had as much right to receive from any competent patent-agent whom they consulted on such a subject honest and proper advice as any independent person would have had, and nothing had occurred which could at that time suggest a doubt to any reasonable mind as to the good faith of the patentees in the whole course of the negotiation. That Mr Stewart might have forgotten what was said about Mr Hunt is likely enough, although everything ought to have been explained, for he himself says that Mr Hunt "was at the time quite unknown to him," and that "Mr Hunt's name might have been mentioned without exciting his attention." In connection with this point it is not immaterial to observe that the facts which Mr Hunt had ascertained and communicated to Mr Brodie did not "excite a doubt" (as Mr Hunt himself says) as to the validity of the patent, but only "a feeling that further search was necessary." All who are conversant with patents must know that it has been an extremely common thing for the most successful and important patents to be disputed on the ground of anticipation by previous patents, often plausibly, but seldom with success. The appellants might therefore well retain and continue to act upon the presumption and belief that their patent (which had stood the test of five years' public and extensive use without challenge) was good and valid pending the inquiries which they still thought it necessary to make, and they might in the meantime quite consistently proceed with the preparation of all necessary instruments so as to be ready for the completion of the loan at the proper time. I cannot, under the circumstances, impute it to them as actionable negligence if they (explaining in a proper manner what had previously occurred) regarded Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's report as substantially the thing wanted, and as a report which their clients might, if they thought fit, accept as safely as if it had proceeded from Mr Hunt or from any other patent-agent in Glasgow or in London of their own or any other person's choice.

My conclusion is, that the Lord Ordinary was right, and that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed with costs, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored, and I so move your Lordships.

Lord Watson.—The divided state of judicial opinion in the Court of Session, as well as in your Lordships' House, sufficiently indicates that the present case is one by no means unattended with difficulty. At the close of the argument yesterday I had formed an opinion, which I have seen no reason to alter, to the effect that the interlocutor of the Inner-House ought to be reversed and that of the Lord Ordinary restored. Having since had the advantage of reading in print the judgment which has just been delivered, I shall not enter upon an examination of the evidence, and shall content myself with expressing my entire concurrence in the reasoning and conclusions of the noble and learned Earl.

Lord Herschell.—I also entirely concur in the opinion which has been expressed by the noble and learned Earl opposite. I can entertain no doubt that in this case the burden lay upon the pursuer of establishing that breach of duty on the part of the appellants which was the foundation of this action. His case was that the appellant had omitted to disclose certain material facts of which upon all hands it is admitted it was his duty to make full disclosure. Now, my Lords, it appears to me that unless the pursuer established that fact he made out no case at all against the appellants, and I am at a loss to understand why in this case, any more than in any other case where a breach of duty or negligence is alleged, it should not lie upon the person making that charge to establish it by proof.

My Lords, when I examine the proof led by the respondent I am unable to find any satisfactory evidence that the breach of duty alleged was committed. No single witness (I include the respondent himself) pledges his memory upon oath to the fact that the failure to disclose which is the foundation of the action really occurred. Mr Stewart uses language such as this—"Nothing was said at that meeting on the 3d, so far as I know, as to Mr Hunt having been consulted"; "He did not say anything about employing any other expert, so far as I remember"; "I am not conscious of having heard of Mr Hunt having been employed until the case against Wright & Company was going into Court"; "I think that no communication was made affecting in any way the validity of the patent"; "I do not remember whether I was aware before the transaction was closed that Mr Hunt had been consulted; I am not prepared to say definitely that his name was not mentioned to me; it may have been mentioned and made no impression"; "So far as my memory goes, I was not aware of any inquiry having been made at a patent-agent's relative to this patent except that which appeared upon Tongue & Birkbeck's letter."

Now, my Lords, I think I have read all the passages from the respondent's evidence upon which his action is founded, and there is no evidence more clear or conclusive given by any of the witnesses whom he calls, and I confess it appears to me that it would be a somewhat strong measure, if the matter stood there alone without any further evidence, to hold upon evidence such as that that the pursuer had established the breach of duty which he alleges. Certainly his memory as to what passed is somewhat imperfect, because he states that until quite a recent period he was in ignorance of the fact that the letter from Tongue & Birkbeck had been got by Martin; he was under the impression that it had been got by Mr Brodie's firm. Now, he states himself that the letter was read to him at that meeting, and the letter begins in these terms,—"Gentlemen,—With regard to our opinion as to the validity of your patents." Now, how any person hearing that letter read could doubt for a moment that it was addressed to the patentees and not to the law-agent I am at a loss to understand.

So much with reference to the case as made out by the pursuer. But when we contrast with that the evidence on the other side, borne out as it is by the entries in the books, it appears to me that it would be acting not only upon unsatisfactory evidence, but acting in defiance of evidence of a much more satisfactory character the other way, if it was held in this case that the pursuer had made out the charges which he has alleged against the appellants.

Under these circumstances, my Lords, I entirely concur in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord Macnaghten.—In 1877 the respondent, Mr Stewart, and four other persons, employed the appellant Mr Brodie, and his partners, as their law-agents in the matter of a loan on the security of a patent relating to improvements in the construction of anchors. The borrowers were Messrs Martin. Mr Brodie's firm acted for them also. The patent afterwards turned out to be invalid.

Mr Stewart maintains that in the course of his employment Mr Brodie was guilty of professional negligence, owing to which he suffered pecuniary loss. For that loss the judgment under the appeal holds Mr Brodie and his firm responsible.

The point of the case is this. It is alleged by Mr Stewart, and admitted by Mr Brodie, that before the loan was completed Mr Brodie was advised by Mr Hunt, a patent-agent whom he consulted, that a search ought to be made for the purpose of ascertaining the validity of the patent. It is further alleged by Mr Stewart, but denied by Mr Brodie, that this advice was concealed from Mr Stewart. Mr Stewart asserts that by reason of this concealment, and in ignorance of the warning which Mr Hunt's advice conveyed, he was led to advance his money on a worthless security.

There is no doubt or dispute as to the duty which under the circumstances was cast upon Mr Brodie. The only question is, whether that duty was freely discharged? To determine that question your Lordships are called upon to review occurrences which took place so far back as 1877. The materials for such a review consist partly of the oral examination of Mr Stewart, Mr Brodie, and some, but not all, of the other persons concerned in the transaction, partly of letters, some of which were written at the time and some at a later date, when Mr Stewart's claim was first put forward, and partly of entries contained in the law-agent's books. The recollection of the witnesses examined was extremely hazy and imperfect. Very few of the letters are material. The later letters are, I think, wholly unimportant. Under these circumstances much, as it seems to me, must depend on the entries in the law-agent's books. They were made at the time, and their general accuracy is vouched for in the usual way. If they are to be relied upon they afford the most trustworthy evidence of what occurred.

It is important to bear in mind that Mr Brodie is not charged with anything approaching intentional dishonesty. The respondent's counsel, who argued the case with equal fairness and ability, disclaimed any imputation on Mr Brodie's integrity. But it was said that his own judgment, which would naturally have led him to make a frank and full disclosure, was somehow overborne by others who were interested in having the matter carried through at all hazards, or at anyrate interested in having it carried through without a due consideration of the risk involved. At the same time it is not suggested that Mr Brodie was in any way deficient in professional skill or in business capacity, or that he was a man of less than ordinary independence of character and firmness of purpose. The conduct which, if the respondent be right, casts on Mr Brodie the heavy liability with which he has been charged is attributed to the fact of his having been employed by the borrowers as well as by the lenders, and is said to be the natural consequence of his having acted in that double capacity.

Professional men who undertake to act for persons having different and possibly conflicting interests do undoubtedly place themselves in a position of great difficulty. Sometimes throughout the transaction they regard one of their clients as having a paramount right to their services, and they treat the interests of the other as of secondary importance. That is not the case here. Sometimes a sudden conflict of interests arises, and on the spur of the moment even a prudent and capable person is embarrassed and perplexed, and is driven to take a wrong course. That, again, is not the case your Lordships have to consider. The case presented to your Lordships is singular in one respect; if Mr Brodie erred, as it is alleged he did, he certainly showed on two distinct occasions immediately before the error was committed that he fully understood and appreciated his duty to the client whose interest he is said to have sacrificed apparently from no adequate motive. That no doubt is a conceivable case, but I imagine it is one of rare and exceptional occurrence.

Of the five lenders Mr Stewart is the only one who complains. He advanced £5000. The others, who provided £5000 among them, were in a somewhat different position. Apart from the loan Mr Stewart had no interest in the success of the patent. Mr Forsyth and Mr Miller as a firm advanced £2000, but they were manufacturers who had been employed in making the patented article, and they hoped by means of the advance to have their business extended. Mr James Miller, who found £1000, was a brother of Mr Miller. Mr Caird, who found £2000, was his father-in-law. It is said that these four were a family party to whom it was a matter of little or no importance to ascertain whether the proposed security was good or bad. I think this argument was pushed too far. Mr James Miller and Mr Caird certainly seem to have given themselves very little trouble about the matter. Probably they trusted to Mr Miller, but I can see no reason for assuming that Mr Miller and Mr Forsyth were indifferent to the question whether the security was a good one or not, however anxious they might be to increase their business. Mr Miller suggests that owing to his brother and father-in-law being brought in he wanted to keep clear of the matter. But this reason, whatever its force may be, does not apply to Mr Forsyth.

With these preliminary remarks, I propose very briefly to review the history of the transaction in question. The important chapter in that history opens with the letter to Mr Hunt of the 11th of August 1877. Admittedly it was a perfectly honest letter. In it Mr Brodie treats himself as acting solely for the lenders, and states that for their information and protection he wishes to ascertain two things—(1) Whether there were any prior deeds affecting the patents proposed to be assigned as security; and (2) whether there were any prior patents affecting their validity. At that time the proposal was to include in the security three patents, one of 1864, and two of 1872. The 1864 patent and the second patent of 1872, which related to chain cables, were comparatively unimportant. Nothing could be more proper than this letter. It is not, perhaps, immaterial to observe in connection with the respondent's view of Mr Miller's position that it should appear from his evidence that the letter was written after consultation or communication with him.

Mr Hunt communicated with his agents in London. On the 14th of August, having heard from them, he had an interview with Mr Brodie. It happened that the patent of 1864, which had nearly run out, had been charged or dealt with by several instruments, a note of which was given to Mr Brodie. As regards the other matter in reference to which Mr Hunt was consulted, he told Mr Brodie that in his opinion further search was necessary. He had been furnished by his London agents with a printed abridgment of specifications relating to anchors. He had glanced through it hurriedly, and that was the result at which he had arrived. It is I think very important to keep in view what Mr Hunt's opinion and advice came to. As to the validity of the patent he had formed no opinion one way or the other. In answer to the Court he says,—"I would not say that that glance through the abridgment excited a doubt in my mind, but it excited in my mind a feeling that further search was necessary." At that interview, or perhaps shortly afterwards, Mr Brodie obtained the abridgment from Mr Hunt, but it does not appear that he saw him again.

On the same day, and after the meeting with Mr Hunt, the assignation of the letters-patent was drawn. On the next day—the 15th of August—there is an entry of a long meeting with Mr Martin and Mr Buckland, who was Martin's manager or agent, "in regard to patents, making inquiries, and receiving explanations in regard to same matters." But I think it is to be inferred that this interview related mainly, if not entirely, to the 1864 patent and the charges upon it.

On the same day there is the entry—"Writing Mr Stewart, explaining and arranging meeting." The letter to Mr Stewart referred to in that entry is in evidence. It makes an appointment for a meeting on Friday the 17th, and explains the occasion of the meeting. Mr Martin had come from London, and it was thought desirable that all the parties should meet him at Mr Brodie's office. It was said by the counsel for the respondent in the first argument that that letter, taken in connection with the entry, throws some doubt on the accuracy of the law-agent's books—apparently for no reason except that, with the knowledge which we now possess, and having regard to the importance which subsequent events have given to Mr Brodie's interview with Mr Hunt, it might possibly have been inferred from the entry, standing alone, that the explanation referred to had something to do with Mr Hunt's suggestion or advice. I think there was no ground for this attack on the accuracy of the books. The letter does explain why the meeting was summoned, and havin regard to what appears in the letter, I think the entry perfectly accurate.

The proposed meeting took place on the 17th. All the persons concerne were present except Mr James Miller, who was represented by a Mr Drummond There was a preliminary meeting with Mr Stewart, Mr Caird, and Mr Miller Mr Brodie pointed out the risks necessarily incident to such a transaction. Bu I think it may be inferred from the letter written on the 20th to Mr Mille that neither during the preliminary discussion nor at the meeting afterward was any reference—or at anyrate any pointed reference—made to Mr Hunt o to the advice which he had given as to a further search being necessary. Mr Hunt's advice could not have been forgotten. But no action had been taken upon it. Nor could any advantage, that I can see, have been gained by discussing it at that stage of the proceedings. Mr Martin had come from London, and the important thing was, to agree upon the security and settle the terms between the borrowers and the lenders. The meeting was a long one, and it was finally arranged to meet again on Friday the 24th for settlement. That was allowing a week for completion of the drafts, and for clearing up the point suggested by Mr Hunt.

On Monday the 20th the minute of agreement between Mr Martin and the lenders relative to the assignation of letters-patent and the terms on which the loan was made was drawn in Mr Brodie's office. And then it would appear that all other questions having been disposed of, Mr Brodie took up the matter which had been suggested at the interview with Mr Hunt, and he wrote to Mr Miller the letter of the 20th of August. This letter was severely commented upon by the learned Judges of the First Division. As I have said, I think it may be inferred from it that Mr Hunt's advice was not discussed or mentioned at the meeting of the 17th. Considering that Mr Brodie's honesty is not questioned, I do not think that any adverse inference can be drawn from the circumstance that Mr Miller was directed to postpone the meeting without giving any reason for the postponement. Nothing, I think, would have been gained by communicating at that stage to the different lenders the reason for the postponement. The exception of Mr Stewart is, I think, satisfactorily accounted for by the reason given by Mr Brodie that he lived just opposite, and that it would be no trouble to him to come over, when he would receive a personal explanation.

It turned out that on the 20th, and before he received Mr Brodie's letter, Mr Miller went to Peterhead. He did not return till Monday the 3d of September. Mr Brodie therefore had no opportunity of communicating orally with him in the meantime.

One thing certainly appears clearly from the letter of the 20th, and that is, that at that time Mr Brodie was impressed with the idea that it would be necessary to obtain a distinct report by Mr Hunt as to the validity of the patent, and that his view on that point was then at least as strong as it could have been immediately after the interview with Mr Hunt.

Of course it was necessary, as Mr Brodie said, to obtain the authority of Mr Martin before consulting Mr Hunt, as the expense would fall upon him.

During the next fortnight several meetings took place between Mr Brodie and Mr Buckland on the subject of the difficulty which had occurred. Mr Martin seems to have objected on the score of expense. At one time it was proposed that counsel's opinion should be obtained in lieu of Mr Hunt's report. That proposal was not carried out, and ultimately Mr Martin, through Mr

Buckland, furnished Mr Brodie with a letter or report written by Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck, his own patent-agents. It was proposed that the lenders should accept this letter in lieu of what Mr Brodie required. Mr Brodie was not informed of the circumstances under which Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck's letter had been procured. He satisfied himself by inquiry through his own agents that Messrs Tongue & Birkbeck bore a respectable character, and having learned that Mr Tongue had been for twenty years mechanical draughtsman in the office of one of the first—if not the first—patent-agents in London, he was favourably impressed with Tongue & Birkbeck's letter, and he consented to call a meeting for the purpose of submitting it to the persons concerned, and concluding the matter if they thought fit to accept it.

We know now that Tongue & Birkbeck's letter was absolutely worthless, and it is impossible to speak too strongly of the conduct of the writer. But on the assumption that the writer was an honest and respectable person possessed of information, without which no honest person could have written the letter, Mr Brodie was not, in my opinion, to blame for thinking that the document was one which the lenders might at anyrate consider with a view of accepting it in lieu of the formal report which Mr Hunt had recommended, and which Mr Brodie himself had at one time thought necessary.

Under the circumstances an appointment was made for completion for the 3d September. The real question is, what took place at that meeting?

In the interval Mr Forsyth had certainly been informed of the difficulty which had occurred, and probably Mr Stewart, when he came to attend the meeting which was postponed, was told something about it. He did not see Mr Brodie; he saw Mr Morrison. Mr Morrison's recollection is not very clear, and though Mr Hunt's name was probably mentioned to Mr Stewart, I do not think that any reliance can be placed on what passed on that occasion.

I now come to the important meeting of the 3d of September. On the morning of that day Mr Miller came up from Peterhead to attend the meeting, and he saw Mr Brodie before the meeting took place. I do not think there can be any doubt that Brodie then told Mr Miller in substance everything that had occurred. But apparently, if Mr Miller's recollection is to be relied upon, Mr Brodie did not get much help from him. Mr Miller suggests that he felt some delicacy in taking any part in determining what to do as his brother and father-in-law were putting their money into the adventure, and he preferred therefore that Mr Brodie should act on his own responsibility.

The meeting then took place. Now, it is to be observed that whatever Mr Brodie said was said in the presence of Mr Miller and Mr Forsyth. Both of them must have been acquainted with all the circumstances of the case. One of them, if he correctly represents his state of mind at the time, must have been desirous, for the sake of his brother and father-in-law, that the matter should be fairly put before the meeting. He would, I should think, have been struck by any material omission on Mr Brodie's part, especially when he found that Mr Brodie was throwing on the meeting that responsibility which he wished Mr Brodie to take on himself.

The entry of the meeting in the law-agents' book is thus,—"Long meeting with parties interested, going over draft agreement and draft assignment, and previously reporting fully as to what had taken place in regard to inquiries as to the patents, and when it was resolved to accept report of patent-agents in London as furnished—nearly three hours."

Now, it seems to me that if this entry is to be relied upon Mr Brodie must have told the whole story. He could not have avoided placing before that meeting his interview with Mr Hunt, Mr Hunt's advice, and the opinion which at one time at anyrate he himself strongly held. Without these details his report to the meeting would be imperfect and misleading, and as Mr Brodie admittedly was honest and not incompetent, I come to the conclusion that the whole matter was fairly put before the meeting.

The oral evidence is very imperfect, but Mr J. R. Miller does say,—"The alternative was put before us either of further investigation or to take Tongue & Birkbeck's letter as sufficient, and we decided to accept Tongue & Birkbeck's letter. I think it must have been Mr Brodie who proposed a further investigation; I think we did absolve him from having any further investigation, and accepted Tongue & Birkbeck's letter."

Mr Stewart says that to the best of his belief Mr Hunt's name was not mentioned at that meeting, but in substance his evidence only comes to this,—"Nothing was said at that meeting calculated in any degree to excite alarm; if Mr Hunt's advice had been mentioned it would have excited my alarm, and therefore I feel certain that it was not mentioned." Otherwise, though he seems to accept the information disclosed by the documents recovered in the suit, his recollection of the meeting is a perfect blank.

Now, I do not see why at that time a faithful and exact account of the interview between Mr Brodie and Mr Hunt should have excited any alarm. Mr Hunt had not formed an opinion adverse to the patent. It would not have been accurate to say he had. He had not even formed a doubt in his mind; all he said was that in his opinion a further search was necessary. Mr Stewart at that time knew nothing of Mr Hunt. As he says himself,—"Mr Hunt at that time was quite unknown to me, and Mr Hunt's name might have been mentioned without exciting any attention"; and again,—"I do not remember whether I was aware before the transaction was closed that Mr Hunt had been consulted. I am not prepared to say definitely that his name was not mentioned to me. It may have been mentioned and made no impression."

Mr Brodie says that he has no doubt he told the meeting that Tongue & Birkbeck's report was got in lieu of a report of Mr Hunt which he had previously considered necessary; he could not indeed charge his memory with having told them so. The entry led him to think he did it.

My Lords, in this state of the evidence it appears to me that if you were to assume that Mr Brodie abstained from communicating to the meeting the report of his interview with Mr Hunt, Mr Hunt's opinion and the opinion which he himself had formed at an earlier stage of the proceedings, you would not only be coming to a conclusion for which there is no evidence, but you would be assuming a state of things which is contradicted by the entry in the law-agents' books, and which is incompatible with the honesty with which admittedly Mr Brodie is to be credited.

In the result, therefore, I am unable to concur in the interlocutor under appeal.

The case, I admit, is one of difficulty, and it is impossible to dissent from the unanimous decision of the Judges of the First Division without some misgiving. I have therefore considered the case with great anxiety, and I have endeavoured to note the different steps in their reasoning, which I am unable to follow. I find attributed to Mr Brodie a desire for concealment, for which I can discover no reason, and of which I fail to see any evidence. I find that to Mr Hunt's opinion there is ascribed a much more serious and alarming character than I think it deserves. I find it suggested that Mr Brodie was bound to communicate in writing the information which he is said to have withheld, and it seems to be supposed that verbal explanations would have been insufficient. That point counsel for the respondent declined to argue. Above all, I find that the entries in the law-agents' books are treated as of little or no account, when in my opinion they afford important and trustworthy evidence. And on the whole, after much consideration, I am unable to decide in favour of the pursuer without doing that which Mr Rigby very properly refused to do, but which I think the Judges of the First Division have in substance done, attributing to Mr Brodie something akin to dishonesty.

Interlocutor appealed from reversed; interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary restored, the respondent to pay to the appellants the costs both here and in the Court below.

Heir and Executor—Warrandice—By whom obligation of warrandice prestable—Catholic security.—An obligation to free lands of debt arising under the warrandice clause of a disposition falls to be satisfied by the executor of the granter of the disposition in a question between him and the heir.

In a trust-disposition and settlement, executed in 1853, the granter conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, failing heirs of his body, of conveying his estate of M, and his other lands in the county of L, to his brother, and the heirs of his body, under the fetters of an entail. By the same deed he directed his trustees, failing his own issue, to make over the whole residue of his estate to the person who should succeed to M. By a codicil, dated in 1876, he disponed to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, the lands of B and A (which were among the lands originally directed to be entailed), and bequeathed to her the whole residue of his estate. The disposition of B and A contained a clause of warrandice in ordinary form under the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), which imports absolute warrandice. In 1882 the truster granted a bond and disposition in security for £250,000 over the estates of M, B, and A.

On the truster's death, his widow maintained that the obligation of warrandice in the disposition of B and A shewed the truster's intention that she should be relieved of the heritable debt, which she would not be if she had to pay it out of the residue. Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the obligation of warrandice was a personal obligation which fell to be satisfied out of the moveable estate before the residue could be ascertained, and that she was not entitled to be relieved by the truster's heir.

The Dowager Duchess of Montrose and Mr Stirling Crawfurd's trustees appealed.

Mr William Crawfurd Stirling Stuart, only son of Captain James Stirling Stirling Stuart, became respondent on the death of his father.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case the question for your Lordships' decision appears to me to be clear beyond all doubt. Mr Stirling Crawfurd appears to have left three estates, which were charged with a sum of £250,000. With respect to two of them he left them to his widow, the present appellant, with a clause of warrandice that they should be free from all obligations, of course including the proportionate part of this £250,000 to which by law they would be liable.

It is not denied that if nothing more appeared each of these three estates, the one (Milton) which went to the testator's brother and heir-at-law, and which was left to him by a sufficient disposition and not as heir-at-law, and the two which went to his widow, would be rateably chargeable with the payment of this £250,000. It is further apparently admitted that, if the residuary estate had gone to a different person than the widow no such question as has been submitted at your Lordships' bar could have arisen. The fulfilment of that clause of warrandice would have been a personal charge and would have been a primary charge upon the executor, to be met out of personal estate. The only point which appears to be suggested is this, that inasmuch as the person who occupies the position of disponee of these two smaller estates is also executrix and residuary legatee, one must construe the testamentary disposition as a whole, and look at all that it was intended to operate, and that, although there is no express disposition to that effect, we must read into these testamentary dispositions such operative words as will free these smaller estates from the obligation which would otherwise rest upon them. That contention appears to be grounded upon a misuse, I think, of the words "residuary estate." I could imagine a case being presented to your Lordships in which, if the facts could be established to raise such an argument, it might be plausibly contended that it would be impossible to suppose that the testator meant to render null and of no effect a disposition which he had made; and if it could be established that to the knowledge of the testator these two estates would be entirely swallowed up by the obligations which were charged upon them, and that the effect of the disposition when looked at as a whole would be to give his widow absolutely nothing, it would be a plausible argument to contend that we must suppose that he had some object in making the disposition to his widow, and that he could not have intended merely to make a disposition on paper, the result of which, taken as a whole, would be to give her absolutely nothing.

My Lords, no such case arises here before your Lordships. The legal operation and effect of the language used and its technical import are not denied. And when one speaks of the residuary estate it is a fallacy to speak of the residuary estate as if it were an ascertained something. The residuary estate, although it is a compendious and convenient form of expression, means that which remains after the obligations which primarily rest upon the personalty have been discharged; and it seems to me that there is no inconsistency in reading the two propositions together:—"I leave one of these two estates to my widow, and after she has discharged all the legal obligations, including this and all other legal obligations to which the personalty is liable, I also make her the person who shall benefit by my bounty in receiving all that remains after the discharge of this obligation." My Lords, that seems to me to be the rational mode of dealing with these dispositions, reading these testamentary instruments together. Under those circumstances it appears to me that the supposed inconsistency is entirely disposed of.

My Lords, I therefore agree entirely with the judgment pronounced by the Court of Session, which I think, following the language of the question put to them by the parties, is sufficiently accurate to shew what they intended to convey; and under these circumstances I move that the appeal before your Lordships be dismissed, and the interlocutor affirmed, with costs.

Lord Watson.—My Lords, I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that this is a very simple case. I have heard nothing in the course of the ingenious arguments of the learned counsel to suggest any doubt as to the propriety of the judgment of the Court of Session.

The various writings which have been brought under the notice of your Lordships must, I think, be read as one deed constituting the settlement of Mr Stirling Crawfurd. In noticing the terms of his settlement it is sufficient to refer to those provisions which directly bear upon the question argued before us with regard to the warrandice of the conveyance to the lands of Balornock and others. He constitutes the appellant his executrix and universal trustee of his estate, which imposes upon her the character of his personal representative liable to the payment of his moveable debts. Then he gives her a legacy payable by herself in that character of £20,000. Then he conveys to her two estates with warrandice, and imposes upon her as his personal representative, in language technical and of well-known application in the law of Scotland, an obligation to make good that warrandice; and after all these provisions are made he bequeaths to her the whole residue of his estate. What is the residue of his estate? It is simply so much of his personal means as may remain after the whole antecedent purposes of the deed have been effected—after debts and legacies have been paid, and the obligation of warrandice discharged.

But it is urged that as the result of these provisions, we must in point of fact infer that the testator did not mean to charge his personal representative with the burden of the warrandice, and that he meant to impose the obligation upon the fee of the entailed estate. If that was his meaning, it is a singular thing that he should have used words which are ineffectual to create a real burden, and are constantly used by Scotch conveyancers to import an obligation affecting personal representatives.

an infant; that it was the purpose and intention of the spouses when they married that they should reside in Scotland; that she was ignorant of the rights of a Scottish widow, and had discharged terce and jus relictæ for a very inadequate consideration. In answer to an averment by the defenders that according to the law of Ireland the contract was not reducible on the grounds stated by the pursuer, the pursuer stated—"(Assuming, but not admitting, that the law of Ireland is applicable), it is denied that the law of Ireland is as stated; and it is explained that according to that law the pursuer, being an infant in 1846, was incapable of contracting to the effect of discharging or renouncing terce or jus relictæ"; and that further, by the law of Ireland the contract was reducible on other grounds. The pursuer pleaded—1, The contract of 1846 should be reduced, in respect (1) that the pursuer was at its date in minority; (2) lesion—inasmuch as the provision thereby made to her was grossly inadequate; (3) that she was in ignorance of her husband's pecuniary circumstances and of her legal rights, and had no legal guardian.

After a proof, in which no evidence was led as to the law of Ireland, the Court found that the pursuer had failed to instruct lesion, and assoilzied the defenders.

In an appeal to the House of Lords the pursuer contended that the marriage-contract should be reduced, on the ground that, by the law of Ireland, the pursuer being a minor had not the capacity to enter into a contract.

The defenders objected to the competency of raising this plea, on the ground that no evidence had been laid before the Scottish Court as to the law of Ireland, and that the proof was closed, and that it was not open to the House of Lords to consider the question.

Held (1) that the plea of minority apart from lesion was sufficiently raised upon the record, and that although the question as to the law of Ireland was a question of fact for the Court of Session, the House could dispose of it as a question of law; and (2) that by the law of Ireland the pursuer, as a minor, had not the capacity to enter into the contract, which was therefore invalid.

Opinion, per Lord Watson, that a deed in the form of an antenuptial marriage-contract might receive effect as such if signed immediately after the marriage ceremony.

Per Lord Macnaghten,—"I should venture to doubt whether a contract executed after the status of the contracting party had been definitely altered by marriage could be regarded as an antenuptial contract."

Ld. Chancellor
(Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.

(In the Court of Session, 9th January 1885, 12 R. 473.)

On 15th October 1846, Henry Ritchie Cooper of Ballindalloch, Stirlingshire, married in Dublin Miss Mary Jane Butler, a lady domiciled in Ireland. On the day of the marriage an antenuptial contract of marriage in the Scotch form was signed by the spouses. Mrs Cooper was at the time under nineteen years of age, and had no legal guardian.

By the marriage-contract Mr Cooper provided an annuity of £80 for his widow, and his spouse accepted this provision as in full of all legal rights.

In 1863, by a bond of provision (a unilateral deed), Mr Cooper increased the annuity to £200, but declared that this was in full of all legal claims competent to his widow.

Mr Cooper died on 14th June 1882. In June 1883 Mrs Cooper raised this action against Mr Cooper's testamentary trustees and the children of the marriage, concluding for reduction of the marriage-contract and of the bond of provision, in so far as affecting the pursuer, and for declarator that she was entitled to terce and jus relictæ.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "The said deceased Henry Ritchie Cooper and the pursuer Mrs Mary Jane Butler were married in Dublin on 15th October 1846. The pursuer was at that time under nineteen years of age, having been born on 11th November 1827. . . . . The pursuer was the only daughter and only child of Mr Gerald Butler, merchant in Dublin, . . . and she resided in Peter Street, Dublin, with her mother. The pursuer, at the date of her marriage, was according to the law of Ireland an infant, and she had no legal guardian. It was the purpose and intention of the said spouses when they married that they should thereafter reside in Scotland, which they accordingly did . . . ." (Cond. 6) ". . . The said contract was subscribed after the marriage, and in so far as it affects the pursuer's legal rights as widow of Mr Cooper she revokes the same as a donation inter virum et uxorem. Before subscribing the said contract its terms had not been made known to or considered by the pursuer. Its provisions in her favour were grossly inadequate. The pursuer was at the time a minor pubes, she subscribed the document at the request of Mr Cooper, in total ignorance of what her common law rights as the wife or widow of a Scotchman were or would be, and in ignorance also of Mr Cooper's pecuniary position at the time, and his pecuniary prospects for the future. . . . Mr Cooper's pecuniary position at the date of his marriage was very good, with the prospect of improving considerably, as in point of fact it subsequently did." In cond. 22 the pursuer, after stating that she repudiated the provisions made for her by her husband and claimed terce and jus relictæ, further averred,—" With reference to the addition to their answer made by the defenders by way of amendment (and assuming, but not admitting, that the law of Ireland is applicable), it is denied that the law of Ireland is as stated, and it is explained that according to that law the pursuer, being an infant in 1846, was incapable of contracting to the effect of discharging or renouncing the claims that would according to the law of Scotland be competent to her if she survived her husband for jus relictæ, terce, and aliment; and farther, that by the law of Ireland her acceptance of the £80 a-year in lieu of these claims is reducible in respect that that annuity was neither certain nor competent, meaning thereby that it was precarious, unsecured, and inadequate, and, separatim, in respect that she was in ignorance of Mr Cooper's pecuniary circumstances and of her legal rights, and had no legal guardian." (Ans. 22) "Denied that the pursuer was entitled to make any of the said claims put forward by her. Explained that the pursuer was at the date of the marriage a domiciled Irishwoman. So far as regards her capacity to enter into an antenuptial contract with her intended husband, in reference to the provision to be made by him for her in the event of his death, the pursuer was subject to the law of Ireland. By the said law the pursuer was capable of entering into the contract now under reduction, and by the said law the contract so entered into by her was not reducible on any of the grounds alleged by the pursuer."

The pursuer stated, inter alia, the following pleas ;—(1) The contract of 1846 should be reduced and set aside in respect (a) that the pursuer was at its date in minority; (b) lesion—inasmuch as the provision thereby made to her was grossly inadequate, precarious, and unsecured; (c) that she was in ignorance of Mr Cooper's pecuniary circumstances and of her legal rights, and had no legal guardians; (2) Separatim, The said contract having been executed after the marriage, is not binding on the pursuer, who revokes the same in so far as it surrenders any of her legal rights as being a donation inter virum et uxorem ; (4) the bond of provision by Mr Cooper being a unilateral deed, the pursuer is not bound by anything it contains; and in any view, as she repudiates and revokes it, she is entitled to have it reduced and set aside, in so far as it bears that the provision it purports to make for her is in full of her terce and jus relictæ.

There was no express reference to the law of Ireland in any of the pleas.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The pursuer having been a domiciled Irishwoman at the date of her marriage, and the deeds libelled not being reducible by the pursuer by the law of Ireland on any of the grounds stated by the pursuer, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor from the reductive conclusions of the summons.

On 31st May 1884 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) repelled this plea. His Lordship in his note stated as the ground of judgment that the fact that the contract could not be reduced according to the law of Ireland did not prevent its being reducible in Scotland, the place where the parties had contracted that it should receive effect.

A proof was then led before the Lord Ordinary as to minority and lesion, but no evidence was adduced as to the law of Ireland.

On 31st July 1884 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, in which he found:—"That in the circumstances of this case there has not been lesion so as to entitle the pursuer to reduction of the contract; therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions for reduction of the said contract of marriage."

On 9th January 1885 the Second Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The pursuer appealed against these interlocutors, and also against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 31st May 1884 (not reclaimed against), and against a finding of expenses by the Lord Ordinary on 31st January 1885.

The appellant, Mrs Cooper, maintained (1) That by the law of Ireland a minor had not the capacity to enter into any contract. The marriage-contract was therefore ab initio invalid. (2) That the contract had been signed after the marriage, and was therefore revocable as a donation inter virum et uxorem. (3) That lesion had been proved, and that the contract was reducible by the law of Scotland.[1]

The respondent objected to the competency of the appellant raising the plea that the contract was reducible by Irish law on the ground of minority. Her case in the Court of Session had been rested entirely on the law of Scotland, and she had closed the proof without leading evidence as to the law of Ireland.[2]

She had not asked the judgment of the Court below upon the point, and was now precluded from raising it.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case the appellant, the widow of a domiciled Scotsman, seeks to set aside an antenuptial contract executed by her on the day of her marriage.

A question has been raised whether the contract was not in fact executed after the celebration of the marriage; but, without minutely considering the evidence, I am satisfied with the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary that the contract was executed before the marriage, a conclusion which indeed is but feebly contested on the other side.

A Scottish widow is entitled to her jus relictæ and to her terce, unless they have been discharged; and the appellant seeks to remove the bar to these rights by setting aside the contract in question which, if unimpeached, discharges these rights.

My Lords, I think there has been some slight confusion between the question what forum can decide the controversy between the parties and what law that forum should administer in deciding it. Now, it is admitted that the appellant was a domiciled Irishwoman at the time she executed the instrument in question. It is admitted she was a minor; and apart altogether from the remedy peculiar to Scottish jurisprudence of setting aside a contract which operates to the enorm lesion of a minor, a question to be determined in a great measure by the position of the parties and the provisions of the contract itself, the first question arises here whether a domiciled Irishwoman could bind herself at all, while a minor, by a contract executed in Ireland.

There can be no doubt as to what would be the rule of English law in this respect. The series of cases which was brought to your Lordships' attention upon the subject of provisions whereby the common law right of dower was extinguished seem to me beside any question in this case. The statute created the power of extinguishing the right to dower, and Courts of Equity have from time to time considered and acted upon their view how far the provision for the wife has complied with the conditions of the statute; but such cases have no relation to the question of a minor's capacity by his or her act to part with rights with which the law would otherwise invest them. None of these cases relate to the question of incapacity to contract by reason of minority, and the capacity to contract is regulated by the law of domicile. Story has with his usual precision laid down the rule (Conflict of Laws, sec. 64) that if a person is under an incapacity to do any act by the law of his domicile, the act when done there will be governed by the same law wherever its validity may come into contestation with any other country: "quando lex in personam dirigitur respiciendum est ad leges illius civitatis quæ personam habet subjectam."

There is an unusual concurrence in this view amongst the writers on international law; "qua ætate minor contrahere possit et ejusmodi respicere oportet ad legem, cujusque domicilii": Burgundus, Tract 2, n. 6. "C'est ainsi que la majorité et la minorité du domicile ont lieu partout même pour les biens situés ailleurs": 1 Boullenois, Princip. Gen. 6. "Quotiescunque de habilitate aut de inhabilitate personarum quæratur, toties domicilii leges et statuta spectanda": D'Argentré. So also J. Voet, ad Pand. 4, 1, 29: "Quoties in quæstione, an quis minor vel majorennis sit, obtinuit, id dijudicandum esse ex lege domicilii; sicut in loco domicilii minorennis, ubique terrarum pro tali habendus sit, et contra."

It is said that the familiar exception of the place where the contract is to be performed prevents the application of the general rule, and that as both parties contemplated a Scottish married life, and as a consequence a Scottish domicile, the principle I have spoken of does not regulate the contract relations of these two persons. I think two answers may be given to this contention. In the first place, I think it is a misapplication of the principle upon which the exception is founded. Here there is no contractual obligation to make Scotland the domicile, nor is there any part of the contract which could not and ought not to receive complete fulfilment even if (contrary to what I admit was the contemplation of both the parties) they had remained in Ireland after their marriage or had emigrated to some other country.

But another and a more overwhelming answer is to be found in this, that the argument assumes a binding contract, and if one of the parties was under incapacity the whole foundation of the argument fails.

Two other considerations remain to be noticed. The first, and what I confess has caused me most difficulty, is whether the question is open for your Lordships

Feb. 24, 1888.
Cooper v.

on this record, or whether the parties have not concluded themselves by their pleadings to the sole question whether, assuming the Scottish law to apply, there has been enough to set aside the contract on the ground of the lesion of the minor. Undoubtedly that does seem to have been the leading contention, and it is the ground upon which the Judges have in the Court below determined the case.

Upon considering the first plea in law carefully in its several parts, I think it is intended to raise the question of whether minority alone apart from lesion does not invalidate the contract, and therefore I agree that the question is open upon this record; and I also agree that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and the annexed note shew that in his Lordship's opinion the contract made in Dublin and by a minor domiciled there would not deprive her of the right to sue for reduction if there were grounds for it, though it should be held that the minor was capable of entering into such a contract. It therefore becomes unnecessary to consider how far this appeal opens up every interlocutor for review as it would have been if one had stood in the way of your Lordships giving judgment upon the appeal actually before the House.

The only remaining question is one which I certainly do not think one of difficult solution, though the statement of it appears to involve a somewhat anomalous state of things. Your Lordships sitting here require no evidence, indeed can receive no evidence, of English or Scottish law. If in the Scottish Courts evidence had been given of English law and no evidence adduced to contradict it, it would nevertheless be incumbent on your Lordships to decide according to your own views as to what the law of England is, even if it should be in absolute contradiction to all the evidence that had been received by the Scottish Courts; and it is manifest therefore that if all the facts are before your Lordships for decision, and the point is open (and I have endeavoured to shew that it is open), then, it is not only competent, but incumbent upon this House, to decide upon the true view of what legal rights these facts establish, although what was a question of fact in the Court of Session was not there mooted but is for the first time argued here before your Lordships.

This may affect the costs, and I think ought to affect the costs to the extent that the successful appellant ought not to get the costs of an appeal which was brought and successfully argued upon a point not pressed upon the Court below either by argument or evidence; but it cannot, in my judgment, affect the right of the parties in the judgment which your Lordships ought to pronounce.

I designedly abstain from expressing my opinion upon the divergent views of the learned Judges in the Courts below. All the judgments assume as their foundation the validity, subject to reduction upon the ground of enorm lesion, of the contract in question; but in the view I have expressed as to that matter any opinion I might give upon the very difficult question as to what constitutes enorm lesion so as to justify the reduction of a minor's contract would be unnecessary and therefore improper in deciding this case.

I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, but that the appellant should have no costs either here or below.

Lord Watson.—My Lords, the appellant, Mrs Cooper, was married in Dublin on the 15th of October 1846, to the late Henry Ritchie Cooper of Ballindalloch, who died on the 14th of June 1882. At the time of the marriage the appellant, who was about eighteen years of age, and without legal guardians, was domiciled in Ireland. The domicile of the husband was in Scotland, and both the parties contemplated, in accordance with what proved to be the fact, that their married life would be spent in that country.

Upon the same day on which the marriage ceremony was performed the parties entered into a written contract, which bears to have been executed intuitu matrimonii. The only provision thereby made in the wife's favour is a personal obligation, prestable by the heir and executor of the husband, to make payment to the appellant, in the event of her surviving him, of an annuity of £80; and, in consideration of that provision the appellant discharges her legal rights of terce and jus relictæ, and all other claims competent to her upon his predecease, excepting such provisions as he might give her of his own free will. By his trust-disposition and settlement Mr Cooper directed his trustees to pay to the appellant, out of the rents of his lands of Ballindalloch and others an annuity of £200 in lieu of all claims and provisions, whether legal or conventional.

This action was brought by the appellant, after her husband's death, for the purpose of reducing and setting aside the discharge contained in the marriage-contract of the 15th of October 1846, and of enforcing her legal rights.

The facts of the case, so far as I have already stated them, are matter of admission upon the record. The condescendence and pleas in law for the appellant, when fairly construed, disclose three separate grounds of reduction, all of which are disputed by the respondents. Taking the appellant's averments, not in the order in which they occur, but according to their logical sequence, it is alleged—first, that the contract sought to be reduced was executed by the spouses (or at all events by the appellant) after the marriage; secondly, that the appellant being an infant was, by the law of Ireland, "incapable of contracting to the effect of discharging or renouncing the claims that would according to the law of Scotland be competent to her if she survived her husband"; and thirdly, that assuming the contract to be antenuptial and valid, the discharge of her legal rights was to her enorm lesion.

The first and second of these grounds of action go to the very root of the case. If the marriage-contract was, notwithstanding its tenor, postnuptial, then the discharge is revocable by the appellant as a donatio inter virum et uxorem. If the capacity of the appellant to contract must be determined by Irish, or (what is the same thing) by English law, and she was according to that law incapable of binding herself, the discharge cannot stand in the way of her legal rights.

In my opinion the appellant has failed to prove that the contract was executed after marriage. The only evidence bearing upon that part of her case is to be found in the testimony of the appellant herself and of Mr Horan, both of whom signed the deed under reduction, the one as a contracting party and the other as a witness. Their recollection of other circumstances occurring at the time is not very distinct; and I do not think that their reminiscences as to the signing of the deed, however honest, can be held after the lapse of eight-and-thirty years sufficient to displace a material fact appearing from the tenor of a probative deed which they attested by their subscriptions. Had it been proved that in point of fact the parties adhibited their signatures immediately after the ceremony was concluded, I should still have been of opinion that the deed was not thereby deprived of its antenuptial character.

The respondents argued that the second ground of reduction is excluded from this appeal, and that your Lordships have not jurisdiction to determine either the applicability of English law or its effect as regards the appellant's capacity to contract. In the course of the argument it was suggested that the appellant's case, so far as it is based on the law of England, was disposed of by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, dated the 31st of May 1884, which simply repels the third plea in law for the respondents. That interlocutor has been appealed from, although it was not submitted to the review of the Inner-House. Taken by itself it does no more than affirm in general terms the relevancy of the appellant's action as laid; but the annexed note shews that the Lord Ordinary merely intended to decide, on the assumption of the Irish contract being valid, that the appellant was nevertheless entitled to sue for the remedy of reduction, on the head of minority and lesion, according to the law of Scotland, her matrimonial domicile. That being so, the interlocutor contains no adjudication either upon the applicability or the effect of the law of Ireland as pleaded upon the record.

It is admitted that the appellant did not ask the judgment either of the Lord Ordinary or of the Inner-House upon the merits of her objection to the contract founded upon English law. But, according to the ruling of the Lord Chancellor (Brougham) in Luke v. Magistrates of Edinburgh,[1] that circumstance of itself does not necessarily prevent your Lordships from considering the objection now, if it be sufficiently raised on record. The peculiarity of the present case, upon which the respondents strongly relied, consists in this, that in the Courts of Scotland English law is treated as matter of fact, and must be proved as well as averred in order to enable the Judges to give a decision upon it. The appellant adduced no evidence as to the law of England, and was therefore not in a position to press her objection before the Court of Session. On the other hand, this House, as the commune forum of the three countries, deals with such an objection as matter not of fact but of law, and gives its decision upon the legal issues raised without regard to evidence led in the Court below.

I am of opinion with your Lordships that the objection may be competently disposed of by the House. If the question had been one of fact we could not, in the absence of proof, have entertained it. I think, however, that as the case stands, the appellant is not in a worse position than she would have occupied if she had brought forward evidence of English law, and had then failed to submit it to the judgment of the Courts below. That course was actually followed by the pursuer and appellant in the case of Longworth v. Yelverton,[2] who not only pleaded that she was married to the defender according to one or other of three modes permitted by the law of Scotland, but averred and brought legal evidence to prove the constitution of a fourth marriage in Ireland according to the law of that country. The weight of the evidence being against her, she refrained from pleading upon it before the Scottish Courts; and in her appeal against their final judgment, which was unfavourable to her, she pressed the Irish marriage in argument for the first time. The Lord Chancellor (Westbury) observed,[3]—"The respondent also affirms on the record that a religious ceremony took place between the parties in Ireland which amounted to a marriage if there was none before; but she was content in the Court below to have it assumed that this ceremony did not per se constitute a valid marriage, and having so submitted, it is not competent to her to maintain a different view of the case before this House as a Court of Appeal." The language of the noble Lord very concisely states the substance of the respondents' argument in this appeal. But the other noble Lords present did not adopt the view of the Lord Chancellor; and Lords Wensleydale, Chelmsford, and Kingsdown entertained the question of the alleged Irish marriage, and gave judgment on its merits against the appellant. I need scarcely add that, so far as concerns the matter of competency, it is immaterial on which side judgment was given.

Whether the capacity of a minor to bind himself by personal contract ought to be determined by the law of his domicile or by the lex loci contractus has been a fertile subject of controversy. In the present case it is unnecessary to decide the point, because Ireland was the country of the appellant's domicile, and also the place where the contract was made. It was argued, however, for the respondents, that the appellant's objection to the contract, although it rests upon her alleged incapacity to give consent, must be decided by the law of Scotland, as the lex loci solutionis. I am by no means satisfied that Scotland was, in the proper sense of the phrase, the place of performance of the contract. The spouses no doubt intended to reside in Scotland, but they must also have intended that the contract should remain in force and be performed in any other country where they might, from choice or necessity, take up their abode. Apart from that consideration, and assuming Scotland to have been, in the strictest sense of the term, the locus solutionis, I think the argument of the respondents is untenable. The principle of international private law, which makes, in certain cases, the law of the place where it is to be performed the legal test of the validity of a contract, rests, in the first place, upon the assumption that the parties were, at the time when they contracted, both capable of giving an effectual consent, and, in the second place, upon an inference derived from the terms of the document, or from the circumstances of the case, that they mutually agreed to be bound by the lex loci solutionis in all questions touching its validity. That principle can, in my opinion, have no application to a case in which, at the time when they professed to contract, one of the parties was, according to the law of that party's domicile and also of the place of contracting, incapable of giving consent.

Being of opinion that the capacity of the appellant to bind herself by the marriage-contract must be determined by the law of England, I agree with your Lordships that the discharge which she seeks to set aside cannot stand in the way of her claiming her legal rights as a Scottish widow. The rule seems to be clear that an infant cannot, during minority, effectually subject herself to any contractual obligation which cannot be shewn to have been for her benefit. She may ratify the contract, after attaining majority, and so become liable to implement it, but, in the circumstances of the present case, any such ratification of the contract would, according to the law of Scotland, have been revocable by her as a donation inter virum et uxorem. The respondents argued, from the supposed analogy of the case of settlements in bar of dower, that the provisions made by her husband in the appellant's favour by the marriage-contract, and by his trust-disposition, ought to have the effect, according to English law, of excluding her legal claims. In reality no such analogy exists. The rule which enables a husband by his own act to exclude the peculiar right of dower rests upon statute, although the Court of Chancery has, from equitable considerations, enlarged the scope of its enactments, so far as regards the character of the provisions which are to be deemed as in satisfaction of the widow's right. But these enactments, as well as the decisions of the Court, leave untouched the personal incapacity of the minor; and cannot, in my opinion, be extended to terce and jus relictæ, which are rights essentially differing from that of dower.

These considerations are sufficient for the disposal of the whole merits of this appeal. It is therefore unnecessary to determine whether the marriage-contract is reducible on the head of minority and lesion, which was the only question argued and decided in the Court of Session. All I shall say upon that point is, that had it been necessary to decide it, I should, as at present advised, have hesitated to disturb the judgment of the Court below. I think the appellant is greatly to blame for having kept back her leading ground of reduction until she appeared at your Lordships' bar, and that she ought not to have the costs incurred by her either in the Court of Session or in this appeal.

I accordingly concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Macnaghten.—My Lords, in this case Mrs Cooper, the widow of a domiciled Scotsman, but an Irishwoman by birth, challenges on various grounds the validity of a settlement made on the occasion of her marriage, by which she purported to discharge her legal right—her terce and her jus relictæ. It seems to me to be satisfactorily proved by the evidence that the settlement was executed before the ceremony of marriage took place. I mention this because, notwithstanding the opinion of two of the learned judges and the opinion just expressed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson), I should venture to doubt whether a contract executed after the status of the contracting party had been definitely altered by marriage could be regarded as an antenuptial contract. Be that as it may, it is not disputed that at the time of the execution of the contract the lady was an infant; and it is averred by the defenders and admitted by the pursuer that "the pursuer was at the date of the marriage a domiciled Irishwoman."

As regards the contracts of infants the law of Ireland, which does not differ that of England, is well settled. Infants are incapable, speaking generally, of binding themselves absolutely by contract. A settlement on marriage not being a settlement under the Infants Settlement Act (18 and 19 Vict. c. 43) forms no exception to the rule. Prima facie, therefore, Mrs Cooper was not bound by the settlement in question. Prima facie it was voidable by her. And she has elected to avoid it. It is not alleged that she has done any act to confirm it if not binding upon her at the time of its execution.

This was the main ground of appeal before this House.

Three answers were suggested on behalf of the respondents. In the first place it was said that this was a Scottish marriage-contract, that the domicile of the intended husband was Scottish, and that Scotland was the place where the contract was to be fulfilled, that is, where the parties intended to reside after marriage. All that is very true. But it is difficult to see how it can affect the question.

It has been doubted whether the personal competency or incompetency of an individual to contract depends on the law of the place where the contract is made, or on the law of the place where the contracting party is domiciled. Perhaps in this country the question is not finally settled, though the preponderance of opinion here as well as abroad seems to be in favour of the law of the domicile. It may be that all cases are not to be governed by one and the same rule. But when the contract is made in the place where the person whose capacity is in question is domiciled, there can be no room for dispute. It is difficult to suppose that Mrs Cooper could confer capacity on herself by contemplating a different country as the place where the contract was to be fulfilled, if that be the proper expression, or by contracting in view of an alteration of personal status which would bring with it a change of domicile.

In the next place it was argued, though somewhat faintly, that the contract ought to be held binding on Mrs Cooper by analogy to those cases where before the Dower Act a provision, not amounting to a bar to dower under the statute of Henry VIII., was yet held to be a bar in equity. This is certainly a very refined argument. Moreover, the foundation for it seems to be wanting. Undoubtedly, even in the case of an infant, a reasonable provision by antenuptial contract was held to be an equitable bar to dower. But no decision was cited to your Lordships, nor am I aware of any, in which the doctrine was recognised where the father or guardian of the infant did not concur in the contract. "A female infant," says Sir John Leach in Simson v. Jones,[1] "is bound by the settlement made on her marriage as to dower and thirds, not by force of her agreement in the settlement, but by reason of the consent of her parents and guardians, and of the Statute of Henry VIII." Here the father of the infant was dead, and it is admitted that she had no legal guardian.

The third answer on the part of the respondents seems at first sight more formidable. It was said that the point was not argued before the Lord Ordinary or in the Court of Session, and that the appellant has deliberately excluded the consideration of Irish law. It is true that in the Courts below there was no evidence of what the law of Ireland was, and those Courts therefore were unable to consider the question. But there is enough upon the pleadings to raise the point; and the peculiarity of the case is that what must necessarily have been a question of fact in the Courts below becomes a question of law in your Lordships' House. It is not competent to your Lordships on an Irish question, though involved in a Scotch appeal, to shut your eyes to the law of Ireland, and to determine the rights of the parties in the dark, as the Courts below were compelled to do. The authorities cited by the learned counsel for the appellant seem to shew conclusively that in a case like the present your Lordships cannot divest yourselves of your judicial knowledge of Irish law.

The interlocutor of the 31st of May 1884, whether it be now appealable or not, does not, I think, present any difficulty. The interlocutor itself does not touch the question. There are expressions in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary which, taken apart from the context, seem to be unfavourable to the view now presented by the appellant. But the opinion was directed to a wholly different point. Proceeding on an erroneous assumption of what the law of Ireland was, the defenders pleaded that the law of Ireland was a bar to the pursuer's remedy in a Scottish Court. And to that the opinion of the Lord Ordinary was addressed.

Upon these grounds, without expressing any opinion on the reasons upon which the decisions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court of Session are founded, I concur in the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed; and I agree as to costs.

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED:—"That the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of the 31st of July 1884, and also the interlocutor of the NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.

Expenses—Property—Taking of land compulsorily—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (Act 8 Vict. c. 19), sec. 119.—A proprietor of lands brought an action against the Crown and against a railway company, concluding for declarator that he had right to the foreshore ex adverso of his lands, and for interdict against the railway company entering upon it. The pursuer obtained decree in his favour in the Court of Session, and in appeals by both defenders to the House of Lords, with a finding against the appellants for costs in the appeals. The railway company having then served on the proprietor a notice under the Lands Clauses Act of their intention to take the foreshore, the latter presented a petition to the House of Lords against the railway company praying that the costs in the appeal should be taxed as between agent and client in terms of section 119 of the Lands Clauses Act.* The Appeal Committee were of opinion that the costs in the railway company's appeal should be taxed as between agent and client.

(IN the Court of Session, 8th December 1885, 13 R. 314; affd. 1st August 1887, 14 R. (H. L.) 53.)

In this case, both in the Court of Session and in the House of Lords, the pursuer, Robert William Young, obtained decree of declarator that the foreshore ex adverso of his lands pertained heritably in property and belonged exclusively to him subject to the rights of the public therein, and also interdict against the North British Railway from entering on the shore ground in question and proceeding to construct certain railway works thereon.

By the judgment pronounced by the House of Lords, the respective appellants, the Crown and the railway company, were ordered to pay to the pursuer and respondent the costs incurred in respect of the two appeals, —the amount thereof to be certified by the Clerk of the Parliaments.

Young v.
North British Railway Co.

The North British Railway Company subsequently served on Mr Young a notice of their intention to take the foreshore ex adverso of the lands in question under sections 117 and 118 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.

The pursuer thereafter, on 17th February 1888, presented a petition to the House of Lords against the railway company praying that "the costs of the said two appeals and of this application may be taxed by the taxing officer of your Right Honourable House as between agent and client."

The petitioner founded upon the 119th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,* and upon the case of Hyde v. The Mayor of Manchester [1] in which it was decided that the expression "full costs" in the corresponding section of the Land Clauses Act, 1845, applicable to England meant costs as between solicitor and client, and submitted that his right to the foreshore having been determined in his favour he was under that section entitled to the full expenses of the litigation, and to have these taxed as between agent and client.

The North British Railway Company submitted in answer that the petition was irregular and incompetent, and ought to be refused, because (1) the matters set forth in it were irrelevant to the subject-matter of the appeals; (2) the questions as to the amount of compensation under the 117th and 118th sections, and as to the amount of expenses under the 119th section of the Lands Clauses Act had not arisen during the dependence of the appeals, and could not be raised after the judgment of the House of Lords, and further the petitioner had agreed to refer the claim under the Lands Clauses Act which had now been served upon him to arbitration, and the matter of expenses could only be dealt with in that arbitration; and (3) the provisions of the 119th section were not applicable to the subject-matter of the appeals, and did not affect their Lordships' finding as to costs, which could not be limited in any way.

After some discussion before the Committee the following order was pronounced:—"The Committee are of opinion that the costs of the appeal, North British Railway Company against Young, should be taxed by the taxing-officer of this House as between agent and client, such costs to include the respondents' costs in respect of this application."

The appeals were conjoined.

At delivering judgment,—

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.

Lord Watson.—I have come, without difficulty, to the conclusion that the interlocutors appealed from ought not to be disturbed.

The general principles of law applicable to the case have not been disputed. When there is no antenuptial contract, and the husband makes a voluntary provision in favour of his widow, as in full of her legal claims, she is put to her election upon his predecease; and, in the event of her death before she has had the opportunity of making her choice, the right of election passes to her representatives. On the other hand, if the wife has, during the subsistence of the marriage, consented to accept the provision in substitution for her legal claims, she may retract her consent as a donatio inter virum et uxorem, but her right of revocation being strictly personal cannot be exercised by her representatives.

The case of Borrie v. Coldstream[1] is an authority to the effect that the consent of the wife may be effectually given by her subscribing, for that purpose, a testamentary deed of the husband standing unrevoked at the time of his death. The same point was decided by this House in Dunlop v. Boyd,[2] where it was held that the wife's consent remained valid and binding on her representatives, although the husband had subsequently revoked certain portions of the deed which did not affect the wife's provision, or the conditions upon which her consent was given. In Leighton v. Russell[3] Lord Fullerton expressed an opinion that a wife's consent expressed by her signature to a deed, revocable at the will of the husband, ought not to exclude her legal rights; but his opinion was not shared by the majority of the Court, and it is in direct conflict with the subsequent decision of this House in Dunlop v. Boyd.[2] The points actually decided in Leighton v. Russell[3] do not appear to me to touch the present case. There the husband survived his wife, and after her decease he revoked all prior settlements executed by him, and made a new testamentary disposition of his whole means and estate. After his death the wife's next of kin sued his executor for their share of the goods in communion at the time of her death, the defence of the executor being that the claim was extinguished by the wife's consent to the revoked settlement. It was admitted that the revoked deed was not extant, and the executor, in order to instruct his defence, brought an action for the purpose of proving its tenor. The majority of the Court gave judgment in favour of the wife's next of kin upon these two grounds: (1) that the efficacy of her consent was dependent upon the deed becoming operative; and (2) that, assuming its tenor to have been as alleged by the executor, her consent related exclusively to her legal rights in the event of the husband dying before her, and had no reference to the rights arising to her next of kin upon her own predecease.

By his trust-disposition and deed of settlement the late Dr Baxter conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to the respondents as his trustees, with directions, first to pay debts; secondly to make certain payments to a college in Dundee; and thirdly, to pay over the free annual proceeds or income of his estate to his wife, in the event of her survivance, during the whole period of her life. The fourth purpose of the trust runs thus :—"I direct and empower my said trustees, after the death of the longest liver of me and my said wife, to realise and convert into money all my estate and effects, or such part or parts thereof as they may think proper, or in such manner, and at such time or times, and at such prices, as they think fit; and after the death of the survivor of me and my said wife, and with her consent and full approval (in token of which she has subscribed this deed) I direct and appoint my said trustees as soon as they conveniently can, or at such time or times as they consider proper, with full power to postpone the payment of any of the legacies underwritten if my trustees think it expedient to do so, to pay to the institutions, societies and persons after mentioned, or to hold in trust for behoof of such females as are after specified, whose husbands' rights are excluded, the following sums or legacies which I hereby legate and bequeath to them respectively." Then follows an enumeration of legacies to certain institutions and individuals, to the amount in all of £26,750, of which £16,000 is given to relatives of the wife. The fifth purpose of the trust makes specific bequests of household articles and other personal effects; and by the sixth purpose the testator bequeaths the residue of his estate to such charitable uses as may be selected by his trustees.

Apart from any consent given by Mrs Baxter to her husband's trust-deed, it is clear that had she survived him she would have been put to her election between the liferent thereby provided to her and her legal rights as widow; and the only point arising for decision is, whether Mrs Baxter, by her subscribing the deed, consented to accept the liferent, and thereby deprived the appellant as her executor, of the right, which he would otherwise have had, to make an election now. That is a question depending upon the construction of the deed.

I cannot assent to the argument submitted for the respondents, to the effect that Mrs Baxter by subscribing the settlement as one of the parties to its execution, without any limitation appearing in the testing-clause, became a consenter to all its terms and provisions. It is unnecessary to consider what would have been the effect of her subscription if there had been no reference in the body of the deed to the purpose for which it was adhibited; because part of the deed, the fourth purpose, expressly bears to have been made "with her consent and full approval (in token of which she has subscribed this deed)." I think that declaration must be taken to be conclusive as to the purpose for which sh signed, and I am consequently of opinion that her consent cannot be carrie beyond the fourth purpose, except in so far as her assent to its provision necessarily implies approval of other parts of the deed. It appears to me, however, that the fourth purpose, and the antecedent provision of liferent in the third purpose, are so intimately connected with each other that Mrs Baxter must be held by plain implication to have accepted that provision. In the event of he being the survivor of the spouses, payment of the legacies bequeathed by the fourth purpose is deferred until her death; and upon the occurrence of that event, they are made a first charge upon the estate to be held at that time by the trustees, consisting of the universitas of the testator's estate, under deduction only of proper debts. In my opinion, her consent to that arrangement plainly implies that Mrs Baxter not only agreed that the legacies should be paid, but made it a condition of her agreement that they should not be paid until the expiry of the liferent right provided to her by the third purpose of the settlement.

I accordingly move that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Mr Baxter's trust-disposition states the purpose which Mrs Baxter had in view in affixing her signature to it. That being so, it appears to me that it would not be proper to attribute to her signature a purpose wider than that which is expressed on the face of the document. Her consent and approval must, I think, be limited to the directions given to the trustees with respect to the payment of the legacies mentioned in the fourth purpose of the trust-disposition. But, even so limited, her consent and approval appear to me to be inconsistent with the present claim set up by her representatives. The legacies in question are to be paid after Mrs Baxter's death. They are to be paid out of the universitas of the testator's estate, which is to be kept together during Mrs Baxter's life. This appears to me to be inconsistent with the claim put forward on her behalf to withdraw from the operation of the will one moiety of the testator's estate, and to leave the legacies payable out of the dead's part only.

For these reasons, though not agreeing wholly with the grounds on which the decisions of the Courts below have been rested, I concur in thinking that the appeal must be dismissed.

Edward v. Cheyne.

Husband and Wife—Implied donation of wife's income to husband.—A lady who was married in 1827 had right for her separate use to the income of £12,000, held by testamentary trustees, one of whom was her husband. For a time prior to 1860 the income was placed in a bank account in the wife's name. In 1860 that account was closed, and the balance carried to a new account in the joint names of the husband and wife, with power to either to draw upon it. This account was closed in November 1865, when the balance was transferred to the husband's bank account. From that time to the date of the husband's death, in August 1882, the wife's separate income was placed to the husband's account, and mixed with his funds.

The only child of the marriage died without issue in 1867. The spouses lived in great harmony, and in 1871 the wife executed a will leaving her whole property to her husband, on the understanding that he should leave a settlement to take effect at his death "in terms known to us both," "with this duty he is solely and confidently intrusted." The husband predeceased his wife in August 1882, leaving a large moveable estate, a great part of which consisted of accumulations from his wife's income.

In an action brought by the widow's executor against the husband's trustees held (in aff. judgment of the First Division) that the facts shewed that the wife had made a gift to her husband of her whole separate income, and that the gift not having been revoked by her was effectual.

Per Lord Watson,—"By the law of Scotland, as well as by that of England, a married woman may make an effectual gift of her separate income to her husband, with this difference, that by Scotch law she has the privilege, even after her husband's death, of reclaiming the subject of her gift in so far as it has not been bona fide consumed. The wife's consent to give need not be in writing, nor in terms express, but may be matter of inference from the circumstances of the case or the conduct of the spouses. . . . There can be no reason why the same circumstances, which are in England held to imply donation, should be deemed insufficient to sustain a similar inference in the Court of Session."

Per Lord Macnaghten,—"In England the rule in equity is clear from the earliest times that when husband and wife have lived together, the wife cannot charge her husband or her husband's estate as her debtor for arrears of her separate income which she has permitted him to receive. . . . To displace the rule it is not sufficient to shew that the wife's separate income has accumulated in the husband's hands and remains unspent—Beresford v. Archbishop of Armagh, 13 Simons, 643—or that the husband is himself a trustee of the wife's separate income—Caton v. Rideout, 1 M. and G. 599—or that the wife is restrained from anticipation by the terms of the instrument under which her title is derived—Rowley v. Unwin, 2 K. and J. 138."

(IN the Court of Session, July 20, 1886, 13 R. 1209.)
Mr Allan Edward, Mrs Baxter's executor, appealed.
At delivering judgment,—

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.

LORD WATSON.—Dr John Boyd Baxter was married to Margaret Edward in the year 1827, and from that time they continued to live in family together, until his death in August 1882. Mrs Baxter died on the 15th of the following October. There was no marriage-contract between the spouses, and the only child of the marriage died before his parents, without issue, in March 1867.

Under the trust-settlement of her brother David Edward, who died in December 1857, Mrs Baxter became entitled, after the lapse of two years from the truster's decease, to the life interest of a fifth share of the residue. The provision was declared to be alimentary, exclusive of the jus mariti and administration of her husband, and free from liability for his debts or the diligence of his creditors.

Dr Baxter was one of the accepting trustees of David Edward's settlement, and also acted as factor for the trust; and on the death of Allan Edward, in June 1874, he became sole trustee. There appears to have been considerable but unavoidable delay in realising the trust-estate, and a final division was not made until the 11th of April 1866, when the trustees fixed and set apart funds and stocks to the value of £12,382 as the share of residue liferented by Mrs Baxter, and appointed the interest to be paid to her during her life.

Between 1859 and 1865 the trustees made payments to Mrs Baxter from time to time on account of her liferent interest. These payments were at first placed to the credit of an account-current with the National Bank in her name, which was closed on the 10th of December 1860, and the balance standing at her credit transferred to a new account with the same bank in name of both spouses, but bearing to be payable to either of them. Dr Baxter alone drew upon this last account, all cheques being signed by him "pro Mrs Baxter," and it was closed by a draft dated the 11th of November 1865, for £409, 1s. 6d. From the allocation of the residue in April 1866 until the death of Allan Edward in 1874 the income arising from Mrs Baxter's fifth was paid by the trustees to Dr Baxter, who placed it to the credit of his private bank account; and the same course was followed after Dr Baxter had become the sole trustee.

The appellant, as executor-dative of Mrs Baxter, now sues the respondents, who are the testamentary trustees of her husband, for an account of his intromissions with her separate income derived from her brother David's trust. In bar of an accounting, the respondents maintain, in the first place, that Mrs Baxter made a donation to her husband, which stands unrevoked by her, of all moneys which came to him from David Edward's trust, excepting such sums as he paid to her for her own use; and, in the second place, and alternatively, that such portions of her income as were in his possession at the time of his death were disposed of, with her consent, by his trust-disposition and settlement. The appellant disputes both of these propositions; and, with respect to the period preceding 1866, he contends that there are four sums with which Dr Baxter became chargeable as her trustee or agent. It is not said that Dr Baxter intromitted with any part of her income arising before 1866, other than these sums, and, in that condition of the argument, I think it will be convenient, first of all, to deal with the income arising after the allotment of the share of residue liferented by Mrs Baxter.

By the law of Scotland, as well as by that of England, a married woman may make an effectual gift of her separate income to her husband; with this difference, that by Scotch law she has the privilege, even after her husband's death, of reclaiming the subject of her gift, in so far as it has not been bona fide consumed. The wife's consent to give need not be in writing nor in terms express, but may be matter of inference from the circumstances of the case, or the conduct of the spouses. So far as I am aware there is no case in which the Court of Session has had occasion to determine what conduct or circumstances will imply a gift by the wife, unless the case of Hutchison v. Hutchison[1] is to be regarded as an authority, but English Courts of Equity have frequently considered the point; and their decisions, being in pari materia, are, in my opinion, applicable to the present case. There can be no reason why the same circumstances, which are in England held to imply donation, should be deemed insufficient to sustain a similar inference in the Court of Session.

In Caton v. Rideout[1] a widow objected to being charged, as executrix of her husband, with a cash balance of £555 standing at the credit of the deceased with Child & Co. The lady had a separate right to the dividends of stock standing in the name of trustees, of whom her husband was one. The trustees kept their banking account with Currie & Co., who at first paid the dividends to Child & Co. on her account, but for fourteen years before his death it had been their uniform practice to pay to Child's on the husband's account; and the sum in question was admittedly part of the dividends so paid to him. Knight Bruce, V.-C., was of opinion that, in these circumstances it had not been made out that the husband had received the dividends in any other character than that of her trustee or agent; but his judgment was reversed by the Lord Chancellor (Cottenham), who thus stated the rule applicable to such cases: "If the husband and wife living together have for a long time so dealt with the separate income of the wife as to shew that they must have agreed that it should come to the hands of the husband to be used by him (of course for their joint purposes), that would amount to evidence of a direction on her part that the separate income which she would otherwise be entitled to should be received by him." His Lordship also said that "separate money of the wife, paid to the husband with her concurrence or direct authority, to be inferred from their mode of dealing with each other, cannot be recalled. If I were to hold the contrary, I do not know to what extent such a decision would go. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred separate property which is introduced as a protection to the wife, does not take effect; all things going right, and no distinction being made, the question of separate property does not arise; the property is used as a common fund for the benefit of the family, and in that way naturally falls under the control and management of the husband."

The expression "of course for their joint purposes" occurring in the first of these quotations, may appear to be somewhat ambiguous; but it is obvious from his decision that the noble and learned Lord merely intended to say that the wife's tacit assent to her husband's receiving and using her separate income for joint family or other purposes would constitute an effectual gift, whether the sums received by her husband were expended on these purposes or were allowed to accumulate.

In Beresford v. Archbishop of Armagh[2] Shadwell, V.-C., in similar circumstances sustained the right of a husband's executor to a sum of £11,000, being the balance of the wife's separate income received by him, and remaining unspent at the time of his death. In Scotland the claim made by the surviving wife in Caton v. Rideout[1] would have been sustained, not because there had been no gift, but on the ground that she had power to recall it; but the claim made by the wife's executor in Beresford v. Archbishop of Armagh[2] could not have been sustained, because the power of revocation is personal to the wife, and cannot be exercised by her representatives.

Hutchison v. Hutchison[3] has not a very direct bearing upon the present case, although it does illustrate the principle upon which such questions are dealt with between husband and wife. In that case a widow sued her husband's representatives for an account of his intromissions with certain rents and interests from which his jus mariti was excluded. She alleged that the moneys had been received and accumulated by her husband, and were still extant; whereas it was averred by the defenders that they had been spent by him for family purposes. Her right to recover the moneys, so far as these remained unconsumed, and could be traced, was not in dispute. When the case first came before them the Second Division [1] recalled the Lord Ordinary's finding, that the wife was not bound to contribute out of her separate estate towards the maintenance of the family, and remitted to him to hear parties as to the legal presumptions applicable to the case, and as to the relevancy of any offer of proof made by either party. When the case went back to him the Lord Ordinary found that it was relevant for the defenders to aver that such parts of the pursuer's income as were applied by her husband to the maintenance of the family were applied with her knowledge and consent; and also that her knowledge and consent might be competently proved by facts and circumstances only, as well as by direct evidence. The defenders reclaimed on the ground that the onus of proof was laid upon them; and the Second Division decided [2] that it was incumbent upon the widow to prove that the money was applied by the husband to increase his own funds, and was not used for family expenditure. Their Lordships also decided that if the widow failed in such proof, effect must be given to the presumption that all sums received by him had been used and consumed with her sanction and concurrence.

So far as it relates to Dr Baxter's intromissions with his wife's income between 1866 and the time of his death, I am unable to distinguish the present case from Caton v. Rideout.[3] For eight years the interest of her fifth share of residue was regularly paid to him by David Edward's trustees as it accrued, and was by him at once mixed with his own funds, and dealt with in all respects as his own property; and the same practice was invariably followed after he became the sole trustee. It must, in my opinion, be presumed (in the absence of evidence to rebut the presumption) that the uniform course of dealing, which was continued for sixteen consecutive years without any assertion of her separate right by Mrs Baxter, had all along her consent, or at least her tacit acquiescence. Proof has been adduced by both parties, but it does not appear to me to alter the aspect of the case. The bulk of it consists of the personal impressions (which are not evidence) of individuals connected with the family, derived from their observation of the terms upon which the spouses lived together, and from expressions used by Mrs Baxter in their hearing. These expressions are quite consistent with the theory of Mrs Baxter having consented to place her separate income at the absolute disposal of her husband.

I shall now advert to the facts connected with the specific sums which, the appellant argues, were held by Dr Baxter as trustee or agent for his wife. On the 10th of December 1860, Mrs Baxter drew £280, 10s. from her own bank account, which was on the same day applied to the purchase of thirty shares of the Dundee and Arbroath Railway Company. Owing to that undertaking having been amalgamated with the Scottish North-Eastern, which in its turn was absorbed by the Caledonian Railway Company, it has become impossible to discover in whose name the investment was made; and there is no evidence to shew that Dr Baxter received the proceeds. On the 9th of June 1862, £500 of Mrs Baxter's money was lent to the Dundee and Arbroath Company upon a mortgage in her own name. The money was repaid on the 17th of May 1869, when it was received by Dr Baxter, and mixed with his own funds. On the 11th of November 1864, another sum of £1000 was invested in a mortgage of the North-Eastern Railway Company, payable to the spouses jointly, or the survivor of them. It was repaid at Martinmas 1867, when the proceeds were not reinvested in similar terms, but were paid into Dr Baxter's private account, and dealt with as part of his own funds. Again on the 9th of November 1865, £625 of Mrs Baxter's money was lent, along with £375 of her husband's, on a mortgage of the North-Eastern Company, payable in the same terms as the preceding. That mortgage was paid off by the company in November 1868, but there is no evidence to shew how the proceeds were disposed of.

[3] 1 Mac. & G. 599.

The appellant has thus failed to establish the receipt by Dr Baxter either of the £280, 10s. invested in 1860, or of the £625 invested in the year 1865. Assuming, however, that he did receive all of the four sums in question at the time when the investments were realised, I think that, in the circumstances of this case, the presumption must be that they were received by him as his own, for family or other purposes, with the knowledge and acquiescence of Mrs Baxter. Without her intervention they could not have been realised; and, in my opinion, she cannot presumably have been ignorant of the manner in which the proceeds were thenceforth dealt with by her husband. The first investment in railway shares has not been traced, but the three subsequent mortgages were paid up in 1867, 1868, and 1869 respectively. During these years Mrs Baxter was in the practice of giving to her husband, for some purpose or other, the whole of her separate income from her brother David's trust-estate, then amounting to nearly £500 per annum, a practice which continued until his death in 1882; and it appears to me to be neither an improbable nor an unreasonable inference from the facts proved, that she also gave him her savings during the time when her separate income from that source was much less than it became after 1866.

I am accordingly of opinion that the whole funds of which the appellant demands an account in this action were vested in Dr Baxter as his own property at the time of his death, and now belong to the respondents as trustees under his disposition and settlement. In that view it is unnecessary for the disposal of this appeal to enter upon the second branch of the argument submitted by the respondents in support of the judgments of the Courts below. But having heard a full argument upon that part of the case, I desire to say that if there had not been a complete gift of these funds to Dr Baxter, or if they had merely been placed in his hands with a view to their being disposed of by the testamentary disposition of both spouses, I should have been of opinion that the appellant was entitled to judgment. I had occasion to express in another case, and need not here repeat, my opinion as to the legal effect of Mrs Baxter's signing her husband's settlement in token of her consent. The instrument does not profess to deal with any estate except that of the husband; and I do not think that Mrs Baxter's signature could have been held as implying her assent to the disposal of any part of her separate estate then subject to her dominion which she had agreed to settle by a joint deed.

I therefore think the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, and I move accordingly.

Lord Macnaghten.—In this case the executor-dative of Mrs Baxter seeks to recover from the testamentary trustees and executors of her husband, John Boyd Baxter, the aggregate amount of the income of a share of the estate of her brother, David Edward, to which she was entitled for life, for her separate use, under her brother's will.

Mr and Mrs Baxter were married in 1827 without antenuptial contract. Mr Baxter died in August 1882. Mrs Baxter survived her husband for a short time, but during that period she was not competent to do any act affecting her rights. The question, therefore, must depend on the rights of the parties at the date of the husband's death.

The facts of the case are few, and not really in dispute. The dispute is as to the proper inference to be drawn from the facts.

David Edward died in 1857. But several years elapsed before his estate was realised. It was not until 1866 that the securities representing Mrs Baxter's share, which amounted in value to about £12,000, were set apart. Mr Baxter was a trustee, and after the 16th of June 1874 the sole trustee, of David Edward's estate. He was also factor to the trust. It cannot be doubted that Mrs Baxter was aware generally of her rights under her brother's will. For a time the intention seems to have been to preserve her separate title to the moneys coming to her from the trust. On the first division of income an account was opened in her name with the National Bank, and for a time her share of the income, with the exception of what was paid to her personally, was placed to that account. In December 1860 the account was closed, and the balance was carried to a new account, opened in the joint names of Mr and Mrs Baxter, with power to either to draw upon it. This account was closed in November 1865, when the balance was transferred to Mr Baxter's banking account. From that time Mrs Baxter's separate income was paid directly to Mr Baxter's account, and mixed with his moneys. From 1869 to 1880 inclusive, deposits were made from time to time in Mrs Baxter's name with the National Bank. In July 1881 the ultimate balance standing to the deposit account was drawn out and paid to Mr Baxter's account.

In four instances, the latest of which occurred in November 1865, sums derived from Mrs Baxter's separate income are traced into investments either made in Mrs Baxter's name or in which she was recognised as having an interest. But these investments in course of time were realised or paid off, and it may be inferred, if it be not proved, that the proceeds came into Mr Baxter's account and under his sole dominion.

Mr and Mrs Baxter lived together on most affectionate terms. They lived frugally. Mr Baxter's own income was quite sufficient to meet their joint expenditure, and the result was that at his death the property, of which he was at least the ostensible and apparent owner, was largely composed of funds derived from Mrs Baxter's separate income.

What is the proper inference from these facts? On the one side it is said that Mr Baxter was never divested of the character of trustee, that he acted as his wife's banker, and that her representatives are therefore creditors on his estate for so much of her separate income as may appear to have been received by him, and not duly accounted for. It was contended that at the very least his estate ought to be held liable for the proceeds of the four investments of her separate property which came into his hands. On the other side it was not disputed that originally Mrs Baxter intended to keep her own property to herself, but it was said that she drifted away from that purpose, and finally abandoned it altogether. A reason for this change, it was suggested, might be found in the death of the only child of the marriage, who died without issue in March 1867. After that event Mrs Baxter could have no object in keeping her property separate. And it was argued that the proper inference from the facts and circumstances of the case was that Mrs Baxter made a gift of her separate income to her husband.

In Scotland there seems to be no reported decision bearing directly upon the point. Where donations between husband and wife are liable to be revoked during the lifetime of the donor, the question could only arise in an exceptional case like the present, and so the dearth of authority is not to be wondered at.

In England from early times there have been numerous decisions and dicta upon the subject, where husband and wife have lived together and the husband has received the income of his wife's separate estate without objection on her part. In the older cases, generally speaking, no distinction appears to have been drawn between pin-money and other separate income of the wife, and in some it is laid down that the wife shall have no account against her husband or her husband's representatives, in others it is said that the Court will only give the account for one year. Subject to these observations the rule in equity is clear from the earliest times (and the cases go back to the time of Lord Macclesfield), that when husband and wife have lived together, the wife cannot charge her husband or her husband's estate as her debtor for arrears of her separate income which she has permitted him to receive. The object of the rule, according to Lord Hardwicke, was "to prevent such accounts between husband and wife which it is impossible to determine according to the rights after death of the parties": Peacock v. Monk.[1] Since the Duchess of Northumberland's case, Howard v. Lord Digby,[2] which was before this House in 1834, a distinction between pin-money and other separate income of the wife has always been recognised, and since that case there is no English decision, so far as I am aware, which lends countenance to the notion that the Court will give any account against the husband or his representatives in respect of arrears of the wife's separate income, not pin-money, received by him with her express or implied permission.

Where the circumstances are such that the wife's consent or acquiescence may fairly be presumed, the presumption arises immediately on each receipt by the husband, and bars all claim on the part of the wife or her representatives. To displace the rule it is not sufficient to shew that the wife's separate income has accumulated in the husband's hands and remains unspent—Beresford v. Archbishop of Armagh[3]; or that the husband is himself a trustee of the wife's separate income—Caton v. Rideout[4]; or that the wife is restrained from anticipation by the terms of the instrument under which her title is derived—Rowley v. Unwin.[5] Caton v. Rideout[4] is generally referred to as the leading case upon the subject. There was no question or dispute there as to the rule; the difficulty arose simply from the position of the husband, who was one of the wife's trustees. Lord Cottenham there held, under circumstances similar to those in the present case, that the payment with which the wife sought to charge her husband's representatives was made to him as husband, and not as trustee. He states the rule to be that "separate money of the wife paid to the husband with her concurrence or by her direct authority, to be inferred from their mode of dealing with each other, cannot be recalled"; and he adds, that "the practice between the husband and the wife is proper evidence to shew acquiescence and concurrence." Lord Cottenham refers the foundation of the rule to broad grounds of convenience and practice, and points out that the rule is necessary for the peace of families. Indeed, if the rule were otherwise it would be, as his Lordship observes, "impossible to tell what confusion might not be introduced into a family." It appears to me that a rule which rests on such a basis is a safe guide in considering a case to the circumstances of which, if it had occurred in England, the rule would undoubtedly have been applicable.

There remains to be considered the minor point as regards the proceeds of the four investments of moneys derived from Mrs Baxter's separate income, a point which does not seem to have been pressed in the Court below. It appears to me that these proceeds fall within the same rule. Assuming, in accordance with the principle laid down in Rich v. Cockell,[1] that it is incumbent on the husband's representatives to shew by clear evidence that the separate trust in these moneys has been destroyed, I think the evidence is sufficient for the purpose. The investments represented accumulations of income. After Mrs Baxter consented, as it must be taken she did, to her husband receiving her separate income, and dealing with it as his own, there was no reason for making a distinction between accruing income and income that had already accumulated when the accumulations were turned into money. As and when the investments representing these accumulations were realised, Mrs Baxter's receipt must have been required and obtained. It is impossible to doubt that the payment to Mr Baxter in each case was made with his wife's concurrence, that he received the proceeds in the character in which he was at the time receiving her separate income, and that he was intended to be as free from liability to account in the one case as he was in the other.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I only desire to say that had it been necessary to decide any question with reference to the signature to the will, I should have been entirely of the same opinion as my noble and learned friends; but it seems to me that neither in the present case, nor in that which we have just disposed of, is there any real doubt upon the principles of law on which it ought to be decided. The questions are simply questions of fact. I entirely concur in the view which has been taken of those questions of fact by my noble and learned friends, and I merely wish to add my assent to the judgment proposed and the reasons which have been given for it.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed; the costs incurred by both parties in respect of this appeal to be provided out of the estate.

United Horse Shoe and Nail Co., Limited, v. Stewart & Co.

THE UNITED HORSE SHOE AND NAIL COMPANY, LIMITED, (Pursuers) Appellants.—Rigby, Q.C.—Guthrie Smith.
JOHN STEWART AND COMPANY, (Defenders) Respondents.—Finlay, Q.C.—Bigham, Q.C.—Ure.

Patent—Infringement—Damages.—In an action brought by a manufacturer, who held a patent for a machine for making horse-shoe nails of a special description, against another manufacturer, for damages arising from the sale by him of nails of the same description made by a machine which to a limited extent infringed the pursuer's patent, the defender, while admitting the sale of a certain quantity of nails which had been produced by the pirated machine, maintained that as he could have manufactured the same kind of nails by other machinery without infringing the patent, the pursuer had suffered no loss by the sale, and that the damage was nominal.

Held (rev. judgment of the First Division) (1) that the defender was liable for the loss sustained by the pursuer by the sale of the nails illegally made; (2) that as it had been proved that nails of the description in question had a preference in the market over other classes of nails, the sale of the pirated nails had restricted the sale of the pursuer's nails; and (3) that the measure of the pursuer's damage was the profit he would have made in selling the quantity of nails sold by the defender after deducting a percentage for sales which might be due to the special exertions of the defender.

Patent—Infringement—Profits or damages.—A patentee complaining of infringement of his patent cannot claim profits derived from the infringement and also damages, but must elect between them.

(IN the Court of Session, 17th December 1886, 14 R. 266.)
The pursuers appealed.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, no question arises in this case as to the title of the pursuers to recover from the defenders such an amount of damages as the pursuers can establish to have been sustained by the infringement of the patent right whereof the pursuers are possessed.

I am unable to see the object of the minute and very careful examination which has been made by some of the learned Judges below as to the particulars of the patent or patents that have been infringed.

The actual infringement complained of consists of the sale of cases of nails produced by patent machines which are admitted to be infringements of the pursuers' patents. Every nail thus produced was an infringement of the pursuers' patent, the sale of which could have been interdicted, and would give a right of action against all concerned in its production and sale.

The question appears to me to arise solely on the assessment of damages. But I think the admissions in this case render unnecessary, and indeed irrelevant, an examination into the various parts of the patents.

The cases of nails tales quales were infringements, and in so far as these nails, such as they were, interfered with the sale of the pursuers' own goods, they were properly the measure of the damages which the pursuers were entitled to obtain. I say so far as they interfered with the sale of the pursuers' own goods, and while I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers can only recover compensation for the actual loss which they have sustained, the estimate of the particular sum which is to be arrived at when assessing compensation for the injury is purely a matter for a jury, and can rarely be made the subject of exact arithmetical calculation.

I am satisfied, however, that the boxes and cases of nails sold by the defenders did, in fact, interfere with the pursuers' sale. I am unable to agree with Lord Adam that there is nothing in the proof to shew or make it probabl that the pursuers would have made these sales,—I do not say all these sales. I think there is considerable evidence to shew that purchasers generally would have sought that particular nail, and I do infer that the pursuers, but for the intervention of the defenders, would have effected a large part of these sales. And I certainly find from the evidence that the competing nails in the market were not all equally sought after, but that the pursuers' nails had a higher reputation. I think it is nothing to the purpose to shew, if it is shewn, that the defenders might have made nails equally good and equally cheap without infringing the pursuers' patent at all. I will assume that to be proved, but if one assumes that the nails which were in fact made by the pirated machines injured the pursuers' sales, what does it matter if it is ever so much established that the loss which the pursuers have sustained by the unlawful act of the defenders might also have been sustained by them under such circumstances as would give the pursuers no right of action?

Your Lordships have to deal with the facts as they exist, and those facts, as I say, are that the defenders have, in derogation of the pursuers' rights, sold cases of nails which they had no right to sell, and for which to the extent to which they have interfered with the sale of the pursuers' patented nails the pursuers are entitled to damages.

The difficulty I have had in the conclusion at which one should arrive in this case consists in this: that while the only ground upon which I can suppose the judgment appealed against could be supported would be that there was a bare infringement of right without any proof of damages, the judgment for £50 appears to me not to be reconcilable with the idea of nominal damages. And the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, with which I concur, that the pursuers were entitled to recover substantial damages hardly appears to me adequately to represent the amount of damages which the learned Judge held to be proved. In short, the judgment of nominal damages results in a judgment for damages that are not nominal, and the judgment for substantial damages results in a judgment for damages which are hardly substantial. But I so far agree with the Lord Ordinary that, in arriving at the exact figure, it is extremely difficult without further materials to arrive with any confidence at a different sum to that which the Lord Ordinary has assessed. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, that I must treat the question as treated by the learned Judges below as being a question between substantial and nominal damages, and if the former then we must restore the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, even as to amount, though with some hesitation, for the reason I have indicated, as to whether the precise amount arrived at is that which a very minute examination of the evidence would altogether justify.

I therefore move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary be restored; but inasmuch as the litigation has resulted in a restoration of the judgment arrived at by the Lord Ordinary, and as the appellants were those who first appealed against that judgment, I think there should be no costs beyond the costs originally incurred, that is to say, that the appellants should have the costs of the proceedings before the Lord Ordinary, but not further.

Lord Watson.—My Lords, the appellants' company sell through their agents, John Donald & Son, of Glasgow, horse-shoe nails made at their works in Sweden; and for the purposes of their manufacture they retain the exclusive use of two patents for improved machinery to which they have acquired right by assignment. Messrs Kollen, who are also nail manufacturers in Sweden, between February 1883 and March 1885 supplied to the respondents 6215 boxes, each containing 25 lbs. weight of horse-shoe nails produced by machinery which violated the appellants' patent rights; and of these 5752 boxes were sold by the respondents before the 20th of March 1885. On that date the appellants obtained a decree interdicting the respondents from selling or using any horse-shoe nails made in accordance with the patents. The respondents thereupon ceased to sell the nails in question.

The present action was brought by the appellants for damages in respect of injury to their trade occasioned by the competition which they encountered in the Scotch market from the nails illegally sold by the respondents. They allege that their average sales were thereby diminished, at least to the extent of the 5752 boxes actually sold by the respondents; that they were compelled to dispose of their own nails at lower prices than they would otherwise have obtained, and that notwithstanding the withdrawal of the interdicted nails from the market, their trade will not recover its former position, either as regards extent of sales or prices, for a considerable time. The respondents do not impeach the decree of interdict, which is now res judicata; but they maintain that this is a case of damnum sine injuria, and that the appellants can only recover nominal damages.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), after a proof had been taken before him, assessed damages at £530. The appellants being dissatisfied with the sum awarded them, presented a reclaiming note, of which the respondents likewise availed themselves; the result being that the judges of the First Division unanimously altered the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and reduced the damages to £50.

It is hardly disputed that as a matter of fact the sale of the respondents' nails which were known as the "Shoe" brand, did interfere with the appellants' sale of their "Globe" nails, manufactured by their patent machinery. The goods were of much the same quality; and the respondents' own witnesses state that they were in the habit of purchasing whichever of the two nails was at the time the lowest priced. The evidence of Mr Lamb, the respondents' traveller, shews that their goods were in constant and direct competition with those of the appellants. On one occasion he had to discontinue his attempts to sell his "Shoe" brand, in consequence of a recent reduction in the price of the "Globe" nails; and he accordingly communicated with the respondents, and "got a reply to sell at the same prices as the 'Globe.'" It is also established that the appellants' sales, which in 1882 had reached an average of 1268 boxes per month, were reduced during their two years of competition with the "Shoe" nails to a monthly average little exceeding 1000 boxes, which were disposed of at lower prices than they had previously been able to obtain. These are facts which prima facie entitle the appellants to substantial and not merely to nominal damages. The grounds upon which the learned Judges of the First Division have held that only nominal damages are due appear to be these: that the Messrs Kollen in the manufacture of the "Shoe" brand nails used a very inconsiderable part of the appellants' patents, and that if they had not infringed at all they would still have produced nails of the same class, which would have competed as successfully with the appellants' goods as the nails which they illegally sold.

Lord Adam, who delivered the leading judgment, said,—"On the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that if the patent is used exactly as described in the letters-patent, no saving is effected, but the reverse, and that, in any view, the saving is so immaterial that I have no doubt the defenders, without its use, would still have manufactured their nails, and competed with the pursuers, just as they are doing now." The Lord President and Lord Mure concurred in the views expressed by Lord Adam. Lord Shand was of opinion that it had not been shewn that the adoption of parts of the appellants' patents was of material advantage to the respondents; and that had the interdict been granted at the date when that process was brought into Court, and the invasion of the patents then discontinued, the respondents would have been in the market "as competitors, all the same, with nails in all respects the same, but manufactured without the use of the parts of the patents already noticed."

Towards the close of his judgment Lord Adam expresses the opinion that the appellants were entitled to the profits derived from the illegal use of their patents; and cites a decision of the supreme Court of the United States, Mowry v. Whitney,[1] to the effect that the measure of profits recoverable is the saving in the cost of manufacture effected by such use; and it is on that footing, apparently, that his Lordship arrived at the estimate of £50. Lord Shand adopts the same principle, which is manifestly erroneous. It was held by this House in Neilson v. Betts[2] that a patentee cannot claim both profits and damages, but must choose between them; and the appellants have made their election by raising the present action.

When a patentee elects to claim the profits made by the unauthorised use of his machinery, it becomes material to ascertain how much of his invention was actually appropriated, in order to determine what proportion of the net profits realised by the infringer was attributable to its use. It would be unreasonable to give the patentee profits which were not earned by the use of his invention. But the case is altogether different when the patentee of machinery, who does not grant licences, claims damages from an infringing manufacturer who competes with him by selling the same class of goods in the same market. In that case the profit made by the infringer is a matter of no consequence. However large his gains, he is only liable in nominal damages so long as his illegal sales do not injure the trade of the patentee; and however great his loss he cannot escape from liability to make full compensation for the injury which his competition may have occasioned. Every sale of goods manufactured without licence by patent machinery is and must be treated as an illegal transaction in a question with the patentee; and its inherent illegality is not affected by the circumstance that the infringement consisted in using a small, and it may be, the least useful part of the invention. When it had been conclusively found that they infringed, it was no longer open to the respondents to impeach the utility of those parts of the appellants' patents which were copied in the Messrs Kollen's machines. If these parts are not commercially useful,—if, as Lord Adam holds, they effect no saving in the manufacture of nails, but the reverse,—it would necessarily follow, either that the patent was wholly void, or that there was no substantial infringement which could entitle the patentees to an interdict.

The object of inquiry, in a case like the present, is the quantum of injury done to the trade of the patentee by the illegal sales of the infringer. That must always be more or less matter of estimate, because it is impossible to ascertain, with arithmetical precision, what in the ordinary course of business would have been the amount of the patentees' sales and profits. When the product of patented machinery is a new and special article, which cannot be successfully imitated without its use, the process of estimation is comparatively simple; but that is not the case with horse-shoe nails. The appellants had many rivals in their trade, and it is conceded that, in estimating their damage, there must be taken into account all legitimate competition to which they would have been exposed if Kollen's nails had not been in the market. I am clearly of opinion that the respondents are not entitled to assail these patents, and cannot be heard to say that the invention, so far as appropriated by the Kollens, was of no advantage to their manufacture. But I am unable to go the full length contended for by the appellants, and to treat the case on the footing of leaving altogether out of view the fact that, if the respondents had not sold the "Shoe" brand, they would have been in the market, as they had been previously, selling other nails. That fact appears to me to be beyond dispute, and I think that to ignore it would be tantamount to giving the appellants not compensation merely, but profits which they would never have earned if the respondents had not infringed.

Assuming that the respondents might possibly have produced nails of similar quality with the "Globe" brand, by means of machinery which did not infringe these patents, I do not think it is proved, or ought to be presumed in favour of infringers, that they would certainly have done so; and I have come to the conclusion that the sum of £530, fixed by the Lord Ordinary, fairly represents the damage sustained by the appellants. I should have been inclined to assess damages at a higher figure, had it not been for these considerations. The appellants' sales had, in the year 1882, risen to 1268 boxes per month; and yet the combined sales of both parties in 1883 and 1884, according to the most favourable estimate, did not exceed 1310 boxes monthly, notwithstanding the way in which these sales were pressed in the market, and the frequent reductions made in price. That circumstance, of itself, indicates the presence of other formidable competitors in the Scotch market, and leads me to infer that, even in the absence of competition by the respondents, the appellants' sales would not have exceeded the limit they had attained in 1882, and that their average could not have been maintained without a reduction of price. Again, it appears to me that the appellants have failed to establish that, after the respondents' illegal competition ceased, they continued to suffer from its effects. On the contrary, I think it is probable, if not proved, that after the date of the interdict they derived pecuniary benefit from the respondents' outlay and exertions in pushing the sale of their "Shoe" brand nails.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that the interlocutor of the First Division ought to be reversed, and that of the Lord Ordinary restored; and I agree that neither party ought to have costs after the date of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, the appellants' claim for damages comes under two heads—loss of sales and fall in prices.

The Lord Ordinary assessed the damages at £530. He arrived at that figure in this way. The total number of boxes sold by the respondents during the period of interference was 5752. From that number he struck off 700 as having been imported before the 27th of June 1883, the date on which the appellants acquired title to their patents, and he calculated that the appellants would have realised the sum of £530 as the amount of profit on the sale of the remaining 5052 boxes, if they had sold those boxes themselves. There were two other elements which the Lord Ordinary took into consideration. On the one hand it was not certain that the appellants would have made the whole of those sales themselves. On the other the competition of the respondents might to some extent have lowered the selling price of the nails in the market. But in the result those considerations were allowed to balance each other.

On the reclaiming note the Judges of the First Division reduced the damages to £50. They entered into an elaborate inquiry as to the utility of those parts of the patents which the respondents were found to have infringed. They pronounced those parts to be only subsidiary and unimportant, and so they came to the conclusion that if the interdict had been granted at an earlier date, or if the respondents had been better advised they might have been in the market with nails in all respects the same, but manufactured without the use of those parts of the patents which they had no right to use. On this ground they held the first branch of the appellants' claim untenable.

As regards the claim in respect of reduction of price, the learned Judges did not reject it as being too remote, but they thought that it had not been proved that the competition of the respondents was really the cause of bringing down the price. They considered the reduction attributable in a great measure to the competition of other nail manufacturers. In the result they seem to have been of opinion that the appellants were only entitled to nominal damages, which, somewhat singularly, they assessed at the sum of £50, as being the measure of the advantage which the respondents gained by the infringement.

I am unable to agree with this view. The decision in the patent action and the minute of admission in the present case establish beyond question that in selling the " Shoe " brand nails the respondents infringed the appellants' rights. The sale of each and all of those nails was unlawful. It appears to be beside the mark to say that the respondents might have arrived at the same result by lawful means, and that, without infringing the appellants' rights, they might have produced a nail which would have proved an equally dangerous rival of the " Globe " nail.

The sole question is, what was the loss sustained by the appellants by reason of the unlawful sale of the respondents' nails? The loss must be the natural and direct consequence of the respondents' acts. In the first place, I think the claim for loss of profit by reason of the reduction of price must be rejected. I do not think that was the natural or direct result of the respondents' acts. The appellants seem to have had no difficulty in ascertaining where the competing nails were made, and in coming to the conclusion that they were produced by machinery which infringed their patent rights. The appellants must be taken to have believed in their case. If they believed that the respondents were infringing their rights, and relied on obtaining redress in due course of law, it appears to me that it was not a reasonable course on their part to reduce the price so as to injure their own trade. On establishing their rights they would be entitled either to the profits which the respondents had made, or to the damages which they could prove they had sustained. In lowering their prices they seem to me to have been prompted by a desire to provide for the contingency of their failing in their action, and by an anxiety to drive their rivals from the field, whether they were right or wrong.

There remains the other head of damage—loss of sales by reason of the competition of the respondents.

United Horse Shoe and Nail Co., Limited, v. Stewart & Co.

I think the appellants are entitled to take into account the total quantity of nails sold by the respondents and that they are not limited, as the Lord Ordinary held they were, to the period commencing on the 27th of June 1883. Although that was the date on which the appellants acquired their title to the patents, they succeeded to the rights and to the property of their predecessors in title.

Then comes the question to what extent did the wrongful acts of the respondents operate to prevent sales by the appellants? I think it would be going too far to say that if the respondents had not been in the field the appellants would have sold an additional quantity equal to the amount sold by the respondents. But considering that the respondents seem to have worked the ground occupied by the appellants, and having regard to the progressive increase in sales during the previous years, and to the fact that the sales of the appellants and of the respondents taken together did not largely exceed the appellants' sales in 1882, I think it is a fair inference that if the appellants had been left undisturbed the natural increase of their business would have come near the aggregate of the quantity sold by the appellants and respondents together.

If it were assumed that but for the interference of the respondents the appellants would have sold 5752 boxes in addition to what they actually sold, their loss, taking the actual prices, would be £611. I think it would be reasonable to strike off from that amount a moderate percentage, as representing sales due to increased activity produced by the rivalry of two competitors. This would reduce the damages very much to the amount found by the Lord Ordinary, though he has arrived at the result in a somewhat different way.

The amount of damages is not a matter of exact calculation, and your Lordships have not got before you all the materials which would be required to arrive at the most accurate estimate that could be formed, nor indeed all the materials that were before the Lord Ordinary. But it appears to me that substantial justice will be done if your Lordships confirm the amount that the Lord Ordinary has awarded. It would be lamentable to condemn the parties to further litigation.

As regards costs, it seems to me that the respondents ought to pay the costs of the trial before the Lord Ordinary, but that there ought to be no costs of the subsequent proceedings.

THE interlocutor appealed from reversed, and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary restored: Respondents to pay the costs of the trial before the Lord Ordinary; but neither party to have their costs in the subsequent proceedings.

In assessing the bank for income-tax under schedule D, the Income-Tax Commissioners refused to allow deduction from the gross profits of the bank of the annual value of these premises, in so far as they were occupied as dwelling-houses. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the bank was entitled to deduct the annual value of the whole premises in question.

Observations (per Lord Herschell) on the question whether the officers of the bank occupying bank premises as dwelling-houses are liable for income-tax for the premises so occupied by them.

Ld. Fitzgerald.
Lord Macnaghten.

(In the Court of Session 4th March 1887, 14 R. 528.)
The Surveyor of Taxes appealed.

Lord Herschell.—My Lords, this is an appeal from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session sitting as the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, reversing the decision of the Income-Tax Commissioners with reference to the liability of the respondents to pay a certain amount of income-tax claimed. The facts are very shortly stated. The respondents are an incorporated company carrying on the business of banking, and they own certain premises which they use for their business purposes, and those premises (to quote the language of the case) "contain certain accommodation occupied as a dwelling-house by the manager or resident agent of the bank." The respondents claim to deduct the entire annual value of the bank premises, including the portion so occupied by the manager or resident agent. The Crown, on the other hand, contend that the portion of the premises occupied for that purpose ought to be dealt with separately from what they term the bank premises proper, and that no deduction ought to be allowed in respect of the annual value of that portion of the premises belonging to the respondents.

The question turns upon the construction to be put upon the 100th section of the Income-Tax Act of 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35. The case is a case under schedule D, and to be dealt with according to the rules provided in relation to that schedule. It is asserted on behalf of the appellant that the rules prohibit all deductions except those which are expressly authorised by the Act, and that this deduction not being a deduction allowed, the respondents are not entitled to insist upon it.

The duty is to be charged upon "a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern"; and it appears to me that that language implies that for the purpose of arriving at the balance of profits all that expenditure which is necessary for the purpose of earning the receipts must be deducted, otherwise you do not arrive at the balance of profits,—indeed, you do not ascertain, and cannot ascertain, whether there is such a thing as profit or not. The profit of a trade or business is the surplus by which the receipts from the trade or business exceed the expenditure necessary for the purpose of earning those receipts. That seems to me to be the meaning of the word "profits" in relation to any trade or business. Unless and until you have ascertained that there is such a balance, nothing exists to which the name "profits" can properly be applied.

It is quite true that the section provides that "the duty shall be assessed, charged and paid without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed"; and I will assume, for the purposes of this case, that that does prohibit (although the words certainly appear to be applicable to the duty) the making of any deductions from the balance except those allowed by the subsequent provisions of the Act. It is to be observed that, properly speaking, there is nothing to which those words are applicable. The provisions of the Act do not expressly allow any deductions. What they do is to prohibit certain deductions with certain exceptions, and therefore it may perhaps, in a sense, be said that having prohibited certain deductions with certain exceptions, the excepted things are allowed.

Now it is not disputed that the annual value of premises exclusively used for business purposes is properly to be deducted in arriving at the balance of profits and gains. I am of course speaking for the moment of premises which are not used in any way as a place of dwelling, but are exclusively business premises. But there may be a question where the right to make that deduction is to be found. I am myself disposed to think that it is allowed, because it is an essential element to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of the balance of profits. If not, it can only be included by a very broad extension of the terms actually used, as being a disbursement or expense which is money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade. It is quite true that, strictly speaking, the annual value, where the premises are owned and not rented, is not money laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, but it is admitted, and must, I think, have been admitted, that in either the one way or the other that deduction is to be made, because inasmuch as it is clear that even in the case of a dwelling-house, a part of which is used for purposes wholly unconnected with the trade, the annual value of the portion which is used for the purposes of the trade is to be deducted, it is evident that it can never be contended that in the case of premises used not for the purpose of a dwelling at all but exclusively for trade purposes, the annual value is not to be deducted. The annual value is therefore to be deducted somehow. It is to be deducted either by taking it as an element before arriving at the balance of profits and gains, or as included in a very broad construction of the provision relating to disbursements and expenses.

If therefore the whole of these bank premises had been used for the business purposes of the bank without anyone dwelling in them, it is quite clear that the entire annual value would have fallen to be deducted. But it is said that inasmuch as the manager of the bank dwells in a part of those premises that deduction is not to be made. Now, apart from the provision with regard to a dwelling-house, to which I will advert in a moment, I cannot see any foundation for such a contention. The portion of the bank in which the manager resides is as much used for the purposes of the business of the bank, so far as appears upon the facts stated in this case, as if it were used in any other way. He resides there for the purposes of the bank—the bank receive nothing for his residing there. The bank are in precisely the same position as if that portion of their premises were used in any other way, in the strictest sense, for the purposes of the bank and the business of the bank. Therefore I do not see any reason why, if the annual value of the premises belonging to them used for the purposes of their business has to be deducted, any deduction should be made from that amount on account of the fact that the manager of the bank, for the purposes of the business or as part of his emolument (it seems to me not to matter which), occupies a portion of the bank premises.

But then it is said that the case of dwelling-houses is specially dealt with, and that no deduction is to be made in the case of dwelling-houses except in the manner specified. Now, my Lords, it is to be observed that that provision follows the general provision to which I have already alluded, and I think it would be extremely difficult to contend (though the learned counsel who appeared for the appellant hesitated to admit this) that if the bank paid as part of his emoluments the rent of a house in which their manager lived that would not be strictly speaking a disbursement or expense wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purpose of their business. Well, but if so, it is impossible to contend, or very difficult at least to contend, that an expense of that sort which comes within those terms, and which under those terms might be deducted, is rendered illegitimate as a matter of deduction by the words which follow. Now the words immediately following are—"nor for any disbursements or expenses of maintenance of the parties, their families, or establishments," which, of course, are not proper deductions in ascertaining the balance of profits of a trade or calling. Then follow the words, "nor for the rent or value of any dwelling-house or domestic offices, or any part of such dwelling-house or domestic offices, except such part thereof as may be used for the purposes of such trade or concern." I think that that manifestly is intended to apply to the case where a dwelling-house is occupied or rented by the person assessed in part for business purposes, and in part for purposes which are other than business purposes. In that case the Legislature has provided that a portion of the rent to be determined by the commissioners, and that portion alone, is to be deducted from the profits of the business. That this is what is being dealt with seems to me to be clear from the clause which follows: "nor for any sum expended in any other domestic or private purposes distinct from the purposes of such trade manufacture," &c. That shews that what the Legislature were dealing with at that time and intended to refer to were disbursements for the expense of maintenance, or the expense of residence, or of any other domestic or private purpose; and if that be the true view it would be wholly inapplicable to expenditure by a trader upon house rent for the purpose of housing his servants where such accommodation was necessary or incidental to the carrying on of his business.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the whole of this building is a dwelling-house. My Lords, I cannot agree in that conclusion. I do not think that the word "dwelling-house" is here used in any such sense, and that a bank or a manufactory or a warehouse becomes a dwelling-house because some servant of the trader resides in that building for the purposes of the trade.

It is not necessary to decide whether the bank manager would be liable to income-tax in respect of the value of his residence as part of the emoluments of his employment. I may say, however, that it occurs to me that the liability, if it exists, is not under schedule E, but under schedule D, case 2, which appears to be the one applicable to such an employment as that of a bank manager; and under that schedule the duty is to be computed upon "the full amount of the balance of the profits, gains, and emoluments of such profession."

A great part of the argument for the Crown has turned upon the suggestion that if the bank are allowed to make this deduction no claim can be made in respect of the enjoyment of this property by the bank manager. It does not follow necessarily that the Crown must be entitled to make any such charge. If it is not to be regarded as an emolument of the bank manager, but as a burden laid upon him by the necessities of his employment, no doubt it may be that he is not liable. If, on the other hand, it is to be regarded as an emolument the statute seems in express terms to make him liable. Of course it is not necessary in the present case nor would it be proper in his absence to express any definite opinion as to whether he would be so liable or not, but it is sufficient, I think, to say that the deduction which is proposed to be made appears to be one which is essential to arriving justly and truly at the balance of profits and gains of this business, and that therefore the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I entirely concur with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend, and I think that the judgment should be affirmed. There is always considerable difficulty in putting a clear construction on the provisions either of the Act of 1842 or of the Act of 1853. But I think we have a clear state of facts here (save in one particular, to which I shall advert presently) which enables us to come to a just conclusion.

We find that a certain portion of the bank premises is "occupied as a dwelling-house by the manager or resident agent of the bank, as the case may be. The said manager and agent receive said accommodation as part of their emolument in the service of the bank, but the annual value of this accommodation is not assessed to income-tax otherwise than under schedule A." Then it is stated by the bank "that these dwelling-houses form the official residences of the agents, and are necessary for the proper carrying on of the business of the bank; that owing to the nature of the bank's business it is essential that a responsible official should reside on the bank premises, and that thus the whole premises belonging to and occupied by the bank or its officials or agents are used for the purposes of the bank's business. There is no necessity and no possibility for the bank as such having a dwelling-house merely for occupation. The whole premises are, for the purposes of the bank, business premises."

Now, although that is only a contention put forward, yet it is a contention put forward without any controversy as to the facts, but I venture to say that I am not satisfied as to one of the propositions. All through the statement these are called "dwelling-houses." They are in fact a portion of the bank premises occupied, for the purposes of the bank's business, by a bank manager or a bank agent. With all respect I should say that it does not follow that they are dwelling-houses at all, or that the occupation of certain rooms in the bank by the bank manager for bank purposes, which occupation is necessary for the protection of the institution and the carrying on of its business, converts that part of the bank premises into a dwelling-house, though it may make them for certain purposes the dwelling of the manager or agent.

However, passing from that, the first thing which we have to ascertain under this schedule is to estimate the balance of the profits. Now, what is the balance of the profits? "Profits" I read on authority to be the whole of the incomings of a concern after deducting the whole of the expenses of earning them—that is, what is gained by the trade. The whole expenses of earning them must mean, according to the schedule, the whole expenses incurred for the purposes of the business, and nothing else. But I come, upon the statement of facts, to the conclusion that if these premises were either actually used as the counting-house, as other parts of the bank were used, or if the residence of the bank manager or agent upon the premises was necessary for protection purposes and for the purposes of carrying on the business of the bank, the whole premises were used for the purposes of the business of the bank, and the annual value of them forms a proper deduction in estimating the balance of profits, which is the first thing to be done. That balance of profits is to be ascertained after deducting the whole of the necessary expenses, save those which by negativ provisions are excepted in the statute.

Without going further, it appears to me to be perfectly immaterial whethe this accommodation is to be regarded as a part of the emolument of the mar ager of the bank for the performance of the duties imposed upon him or as part of the premises used solely and wholly for bank purposes. Upon th ground which I have stated it seems to me clear that this deduction is a deduc tion which the bank are entitled to make, and that, therefore, they have alread paid the whole amount of income-tax for which they are liable.

Lord Macnaghten.—I quite agree; I think that the deduction was properl and necessarily made in estimating the profits and gains of the bank which were chargeable with duty, and that there is nothing in the first rule applicable to the first and second cases under Schedule D prohibiting the deduction. I do not think that a house in which a bank or limited company carries on business is a dwelling-house within the meaning of that rule. It is not, and could not be, used by the bank for any purpose distinct from their business. I think the expression "dwelling-house" in that rule means a house in which the person liable to pay income-tax dwells in the ordinary course of the word.

Burn, his "whole rights of water and water-power, and other rights connected with the mills hereby disponed, including all right" he had "to dam up and draw water from Loch H., or to form embankments or breastworks at said loch," but so that the water of the loch should not be raised more than three feet above its then existing level. At the same time he expressly reserved his rights in the foresaid loch and burn, excepting his rights therein connected with the mills and "other rights above conveyed or granted," and particularly his right to use the water-power for driving agricultural machinery.

In 1883 the Water-works Commissioners of the burgh of Dumbarton obtained compulsory powers to take the water of Loch H. for the supply of the inhabitants, but their special Act (sec. 9) provided that they must discharge into Loch H. Burn a regular supply of 320,000 gallons a-day, which should "be deemed to be compensation to mill-owners and other persons interested in the waters flowing down the stream called Loch H. Burn for the water intercepted and appropriated for the purposes of this Act"; and also (sec. 10) that "nothing in this Act contained shall be held to prejudice or affect the rights (if any) of B. in the loch known as Loch H., or to prevent him from claiming" from the Commissioners compensation for any such rights which should be injuriously affected by their operations. The Commissioners acquired by private agreement all the rights of D. in Loch H. and Loch H. Burn, and proceeded to take water from the burn at a point close to the loch to supply the town of Dumbarton.

B. claimed compensation, not only for land taken and wayleave, but for rights and interests in the water of the loch and burn injuriously affected. The Commissioners maintained that as the water had been taken from the burn, B.'s claim was excluded by the statutory compensation given under sec. 9.

Lord Blantyre v. Water-Works Commissioners of Dumbarton.

Held that the grant of servitude to D. was limited to the use of water for the mills, and that the Water-works Commissioners were bound to compensate B. for the water taken from the loch for the supply of the town of Dumbarton.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case several difficulties have occurred in the construction of the award on which this action is brought, and it becomes necessary to examine, I think, with some minuteness, not only the rights to which in fact Lord Blantyre is entitled, but, to some extent, the arguments by which some of those rights have been sought to be satisfied. The plain meaning of the award has been perhaps somewhat obscured by the effort on the part of the arbitrator to exclude such constructions of the instrument as might lead to further litigation and leave in doubt that in respect of which he had intended to award compensation.

The position of the parties was this: Lord Blantyre had parted with certain rights in respect of the water in his loch, which, with respect to certain tenements on the burn, he had impressed with a servitude which could not but be of importance to those tenements as long as they were continued and in operation for the purpose for which that servitude was granted, and this servitude (to use the technical language) was a sufficient supply of water to keep certain mills on the stream in operation as mills. The Dumbarton Water-works Company had obtained an Act of Parliament which would have enabled them, had they thought proper, to appropriate both the banks of the loch and all necessary approaches to and interest in the loch for the purpose of supplying the town of Dumbarton with water. They appear to have obtained from those who had been the grantees of the servitude to which I have referred an assignment of all the rights of those grantees, and in some way or another it appears to have been imagined that if an adit could be màde to that portion of the burn or that end of the loch by buying a small piece of land, and then putting certain pipes in that small piece of land so as to adjoin the burn where it issues from the loch, they might by that expedient, and in right of the terms of the grant to the Dunns, who were the original grantees of the servitudes, conduct the water to Dumbarton, and so supply the inhabitants of Dumbarton without any further payment to the proprietor of the loch than that which was involved in the purchase of this small piece of land, and whatever adits or pipes, and so forth, were necessary to connect the burn with the system of pipes which was to conduct the water to Dumbarton.

That appears to me to have been founded on a complete error. The servitude granted to the Dunns was one which could only be available for the purpose for which it was granted. The assignees of that servitude were not entitled to divert a single ounce of water from the loch except for the purpose of the servitude itself, and they have taken the rights, whatever they were, from Dunn by assignment without taking the mills. They appear to me to have severed the servient tenement altogether from that which was the dominant tenement in respect of this servitude.

But another expedient appears to have occurred to the minds of those who were endeavouring to obtain the advantage of Lord Blantyre's loch without paying for it, and that was, that inasmuch as by the Act of Parliament the riparian rights of all the proprietors along the burn were to be satisfied by wha the Legislature considered to be, and what probably was, an equivalent amoun of water discharged down the burn so as to satisfy all the riparian rights dow below it, if the water was abstracted from the loch not at any new entrance int the loch but at some point of departure which should be within that portion o the burn which was already, as it were, equivalently supplied with water by this statutable quantity in lieu of any money compensation, then the process—the circuitous path by which it was sought to arrive at the conclusion—was, inasmuch as we do not take it from the loch, and inasmuch as the burn now is sufficiently supplied with water by the statutable amount of equivalent going down it, the moment we do that you become simply a riparian proprietor, you have no right to money compensation at all, and the consequence is that we can supply the whole town of Dumbarton without any money compensation to you because you are simply a riparian proprietor, and the rights of the riparian proprietors are extinguished by the quantity of water that is sent down the burn.

My Lords, it appears to me that that was an entire error, and I do not think there will be any difficulty at all, or doubt in the mind of any one of your Lordships, in coming to the conclusion that neither of the arguments to which I have referred could in the slightest degree impair Lord Blantyre's rights in the loch as proprietor of the loch and of the water therein contained. I can well understand that these arguments were pressed upon the arbitrator, and that the arbitrator was sought to be influenced by the considerations to which I have referred.

I have thought it right to mention these arguments, unfounded as they appear to me to be, because I think that in these arguments will be found the source of the only difficulty which I have had in the course of this case, and that is as to the language of the award itself, whereby it would appear that the arbitrator has placed something in the nature of a money-counted value upon the construction of the banks and the interest in the banks which Lord Blantyre possesses. My Lords, I cannot help saying that if that were the true construction of the award, and if I could come to the conclusion that the arbitrator had intended to value this in the sum awarded, and had given money-counted value to it as a part of the award, I should have very great difficulty in saying that his award could be sustained. But I think that upon the true construction of his award, and looking at the language in which it is couched, what the arbitrator meant was this—I value the right which Lord Blantyre has in this water as the proprietor of this loch. I value that to the Dumbarton Company, who are taking this water, at the sum of £3000, and that is the sum which I mean to award. And if he had left his award there without any further exposition I believe that your Lordships need not have been troubled with the argument to which we have listened, because it would have been too plain, I think, that that was a perfectly good award, and that Lord Blantyre's rights upon the question which is now before your Lordships would be clearly established upon the facts which are proved before us. But I have no doubt that for the purpose of avoiding future litigation, and for the purpose of explaining what considerations and what sources of calculation had entered into his mind, the arbitrator has used the difficult phrase which has given rise to all this litigation, namely, that in which he seems to value the banks as money-counted. Now, I think that upon a fair and reasonable construction of this award the award is reconcileable with the view which I have suggested, and that all the arbitrator by the use of that language intended to convey was this—It must not be supposed that after I have valued this right of taking water at the sum of £3000 it will be competent to Lord Blantyre hereafter to come and say to the company, "Oh, yes, you have got the water, but you must also pay me for the use of my banks." The arbitrator, I think, intended to say—What I mean to award is the gross sum to which Lord Blantyre shall be entitled in respect of his rights for the water which you, the company, are taking away, and in doing this I have come to the conclusion that there is a usefulness in this partly natural and partly artificial bank, which has been raised to keep in the water which I am thus valuing, as between vendor and vendee,—as between Lord Blantyre and the Dumbarton Company,—and therefore let it not be supposed that I have not disposed of that question by the award at which I have arrived.

My Lords, if that is the true construction of the award I must say for myself that I think it is right. The grant is what it would be if the water were not taken under the powers of the Act; it is a grant of water out of his loch which Lord Blantyre makes, and he certainly must not thereafter do anything wilfully which will defeat the grant which he has made, and therefore the banks ought not to be made themselves the subject of a separate arrangement. The arbitrator says to him—I have taken into consideration in my award the fact that this is partly an artificial loch which belongs to you, and this is one of the modes by which I have arrived at my gross sum of £3000, and therefore let it not be supposed that after that I have left uncovered any demand which you, Lord Blantyre, may possess, or may think that you possess, in respect of the banks which keep in this water as in a natural basin.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the award can be supported upon that construction, and as it is manifestly just that Lord Blantyre should be properly compensated in respect of the water which this water company has taken, not strictly under the powers of its Act at all, but by the expedient to which I have referred, I move your Lordships that the interlocutors appealed from be reversed, that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant his costs both here and below.

Earl of Selborne.—Looking broadly at the justice of this case, I cannot but feel satisfaction with the result at which the noble and learned Lord upon the woolsack has arrived, and which I have reason to believe will be embodied in your Lordships' judgment. That Lord Blantyre ought to be compensated for that which is taken from him I think nobody who has the least regard to law or justice can for a moment doubt, nor do I think that any reasonable person would quarrel with the sum of £3000 as at all an excessive estimate of the compensation which should be made to him for the water of this loch.

When I get out of that broad view of the case I must own that there are some difficulties which still remain upon my mind, though I am not prepared to give my voice against the judgment which has been proposed by your Lordships. One difficulty is the very imperfect way in which the various points of this case have been presented in the judgments under appeal. The majority of the Court evidently proceeded upon the second plea in law for the defenders, which was to this effect, that "the defenders should be assoilzied from the first conclusion of the summons, in respect (a) the pursuer sold to Dunn his mills and whole rights in the loch and burn now claimed upon, with the exception of the right of using the water in the burn as defined in the feu-disposition of 1854; (b) the said reserved right was compensated and discharged by the 9th section of the statute." If that was a correct view of the titles under the sale, as it i called, to Mr Dunn, there can be no doubt that the decision of the Court belo was correct, and as I understand it, the majority of the Court did proceed upo that view of the case, and with regard to those who did not so clearly procee upon that view of the case I think they were embarrassed in some measure b the language and form of the award, which undoubtedly present difficulties The consequence is, that upon the points which appear to your Lordships to b the real points calling for decision after the present argument, we do not get that amount of assistance which doubtless we otherwise should have had from the opinions of those learned Judges who did not proceed upon the transaction with Dunn.

With regard to this point raised by the second plea in law, which the majority of the learned Judges of the Court below thought good, I believe there is not the slightest shade of difference of opinion among your Lordships. To me, without going into any question as to what it may be which the Dumbarton Water Company have obtained from Dunn, it is perfectly clear that Dunn never had any rights whatever which can interfere with the claim of Lord Blantyre to compensation in this case. The dealing with Dunn was simply this—He had, for the purposes of certain mills, large rights given to him over the water in the loch which supplied the burn, and over the water in the burn, but for those purposes, and those purposes only; and that being the construction which I should put upon the words in the grant to Dunn taken by themselves, they being qualified by these words, "connected with the mills hereby disponed," it is to my mind made absolutely clear and unequivocal by the terms of the exception in Lord Blantyre's favour contained in the grant to Dunn, which are—"Reserving always to me and my foresaids all our rights in the foresaid lochs and burn except our rights therein connected with the mills." The question is, whether the right with which we are dealing now is a right "connected with the mills"? If it is, then it is affected by the sale, or whatever it ought to be called, to Dunn; but if it is not, it is not in the least degree whatever affected by it, and therefore it may be put aside as the most irrelevant thing in the world. Is it so? What is the subject of the compensation sought? I turn to Lord Blantyre's claim in the arbitration. Lord Blantyre stated "that these lands included the greater part of the Loch Humphrey and a portion of Loch Fyn, the waters of which flowed partly through his property into Loch Humphrey, and that the Loch Humphrey Burn, or Duntocher Burn, which was the natural outlet of the waters of Loch Humphrey, flowed through his property for a distance of nearly two miles; that the water of the loch and burn was used for agricultural purposes, and was capable of being used for other more important purposes in its course through his property, and otherwise; that by the acquisition of the lands and way-leaves the Dumbarton Water-works Commissioners would be in a position to abstract water from Loch Humphrey and from the burn flowing therefrom, with the result that his rights and interests would be most injuriously affected." "To abstract water" for what purpose? For the purpose of the mill, for which purpose it was given to Dunn? No; for the purpose of carrying it to supply water to the town of Dumbarton. Therefore he alleges rights which are manifestly rights excepted from the grant to Dunn, and he alleges that they would be injuriously affected by an operation of the Water-works Commissioners which Dunn could not possibly have performed under the grant to him. It appears to me that we must and ought to approach this case on the principle that the dealing with Dunn, and the subsequent acquisition of Dunn's title by the Commissioners, is purely and absolutely irrelevant.

That being so, the next point, which certainly appears to have been a matter of some difficulty to the learned Lord Justice-Clerk, if I may judge from the terms in which he expresses himself in his judgment, was also in the first instance, and until the argument had proceeded to a certain point, a considerable difficulty to myself, namely, the peculiar phraseology and language of this award, which appeared at first sight to give the £3000 if Lord Blantyre had any interest in any part of the waters of the lochs or the burns, and inasmuch as some interest which he undoubtedly might have had in the waters of the burns was expressly compensated under the Act of Parliament so as not to be the subject of any tenable claim for further compensation, it did at first sight appear to me that the terms of the award would give him compensation in a case which might fall under the 9th section of the Act. But further argument, especially the argument for the respondents, convinced me that that was not a correct interpretation of the terms of the award in that part of it. The arbitrator did not take upon himself to decide the questions of law in the case which depended upon the Act of Parliament, and upon the facts, which facts were undoubtedly before him and are also before your Lordships. He reserved those questions of law, but upon a double hypothesis he found £3000 to be due as compensation. The hypothesis consisted, as was pointed out in the argument, of these two branches; first, that Lord Blantyre was entitled to some interest in the lochs and burns, or one or more of them, which, if it had stood alone, would have raised the difficulty to which I have referred, but secondly, that he was also "entitled notwithstanding" (I may paraphrase that as "having regard to") "the provisions contained in sections 9 and 10 of the Water-works Act, to compensation in respect of such right or interest." Turning the rather long and involved language of the hypothesis as stated in the award into a shorter and simpler form, it comes to this—If he is entitled to any right or interest in either the lochs or the burns, or any of them, uncompensated by section 9 of the Act of Parliament, then I find the value of that interest, or the compensation which he is to receive in respect of the interference with it, to be £3000. Well now, having regard to the facts, that seems to me to be a hypothesis which really in the end involves no difficulty at all. The 9th section expressly compensates him for all his interest in what I may call the preservation of the water-course of the burns. If he had had any other interest in the burns not so compensated, it was quite right that the arbitrator should take that into account in the compensation which he awarded; and looking to the manner in which the respondents had thought fit to execute their work by taking the water, not directly out of the loch before it entered the burn, but just below the point of discharge of the water of the lochs into the burn, it is manifest to me that both in Lord Blantyre's claim and in this award the "burn" is properly put in to exclude any quibble arising out of the way in which the Water-works Company were actually taking the water, because the compensation given by section 9 of the Act of Parliament for the injury which otherwise might have arisen to those entitled to have the benefit of the burns in their regular and ordinary and natural course plainly does not apply to any abstraction of water from the burns any more than from the lochs for other purposes, as to which, so long as it had nothing to do with the mills, Lord Blantyre's right remained. That being so, the fact is that the water is taken from the lochs, and that Lord Blantyre's interest in the loch is unquestionable. At one time there seemed to be a doubt whether that wa admitted upon the record, but that doubt ultimately disappeared, and it was no really disputed that it was to be taken as his established right and title. Tha interest being unquestionable, it is equally certain that the Water-works Com missioners are taking the waters of the lochs, although they take them at a poin just below the discharge of those waters into the burn, and they take them no for purposes in any way connected with the water-course of the burn, but for wholly different purposes, the result being in my judgment exactly the same as if they had taken the water from any other point of the loch. Therefore I do not find any difficulty in construing the hypothesis. I think it is quite clear that Lord Blantyre has established his interest, and that it is not compensated under section 9 or section 10 of the Act of Parliament.

Then there remains the point about the £3000 and the way in which it seems to be divided upon the face of the award. Now there, I must confess, I have felt more difficulty than upon any other part of the case, and I do not pretend to say that that difficulty is entirely removed. It does seem to me that according to the natural construction of the award the arbitrator has in the first instance found the sum of £3000 as the compensation to be paid in respect of these several matters, first, "in respect of the right or interest to be acquired from Lord Blantyre in the foresaid waters," about which, if he had stopped there, I should have felt no doubt or difficulty whatever; but he goes on to say "and the embankments at said Lochs Humphrey and Fyn," so that he mentions the embankments as a distinct subject in which some right or interest is to be acquired by the Commissioners, "and the right to intercept and to appropriate the said waters," which of course would follow the waters themselves—no question arises upon that, "and for the damage to be sustained by him by or in consequence of the work of the Commissioners."

Now, in order to see whether I am justified in waiving my difficulty, or rather in acquiescing in the construction proposed by the noble and learned Lord of the whole passage, the first question which I ask myself is this—Would the award have been bad if the arbitrator had stopped there without saying anything about the £1650 apart from the rest; would it have been bad because he had mentioned some right or interest to be acquired from Lord Blantyre in the embankments at Lochs Humphrey and Fyn? I confess that it would have been an assistance to me to have heard more argument upon that point than was offered on either side of the bar, but the best judgment which I have been able to form in the absence of that argument is that it would be difficult to say that the Commissioners acquired no right or interest in respect of the embankments. Under the Act of Parliament they had a right to take the waters. Under this award they would have paid for what they did in the exercise of that right. The waters are maintained in their place, and made capable of passing into the conduits of the Water-works Company by reason of their being impounded by certain embankments, and if those embankments were taken away I suppose that the means of carrying the water to Dumbarton might be either entirely lost or seriously impaired. Therefore it seems to be necessarily incident to the right acquired as against Lord Blantyre of taking the waters by paying for them, first of all that whatever Lord Blantyre might before have been able actively to do in the alteration or destruction of these embankments, he can no longer do if it be in derogation of the rights to the water which have been acquired and paid for; and secondly, that even if Lord Blantyre is under no obligation at his own expense to maintain and keep in repair the embankments (as to which we have heard no argument one way or the other), yet at least the Water-works Commissioners, if it were necessary, would, as incidental to their right to have the waters, have a right to do what was needful to keep them in their place by maintaining these artificial embankments on which that depends. So that I could not possibly have held that the mere fact of the embankments being mentioned in that way, if nothing had been said about the £1650, vitiated the award.

My difficulty arises out of the words in which the arbitrator has separated the £1650 from the rest of the £3000, "including in the said sum of £3000 the sum of £1650 as the estimated price or value of the embankments made at Loch Humphrey and Loch Fyn." Now, at first sight I confess that looks very much like a statement by the arbitrator that he would not have given as much as £3000, but that his award would have been less by £1650, if he had not thought it right to give to Lord Blantyre the price or value of the embankments in the same way as if the embankments had been actually and bodily taken under the Act of Parliament. Of course he means the price or value to the Water-works Company. That is evidently the proper interpretation—not the price at which they were originally constructed. Whether it was so or not is not the question; it is not so upon the face of the award. Now, I do not think that if that were the construction I could support the award in that respect. It appears to me that, taking the incidental right to have the embankments in some way or other upheld, or at least not interfered with by Lord Blantyre, taking that as a separate item, it would not have been right for the arbitrator to value that even if he had given a sum less important than £1650. But your Lordships think, as I understand, that the arbitrator has merely intended by those words to signify that in his giving the £3000 for that which was previously mentioned he had taken this into account, so that no separate question is at any time to be raised as to those incidental rights in respect of the embankments which the Water-works Commissioners might acquire, and that he has treated the water as enhanced in its value by reason of the manner in which it is retained by the embankments, and by reason of the rights in respect of the embankments which the Water-works Commissioners would acquire. Your Lordships, I believe, think that that is on the whole the right construction to be placed upon the award; and although I feel, I confess, some difficulty upon the words "estimated price or value," yet I am not inclined to press that difficulty against your Lordships' opinion, and I am the less inclined to do so for this reason, which I think in this particular point of view is of importance. Lord Blantyre has made no separate claim in respect of the embankments; his claim manifestly relates to the interference with his water rights. If, as an element in computing the value of the water rights so interfered with, the arbitrator took into account the fact that the water must still be maintained by means of these embankments, and that that was a thing to be considered as between Lord Blantyre and the Commissioners, it would surely be a very hard thing to say that it is to be imputed to the award that it has introduced a new subject of claim which Lord Blantyre himself never made, and that for the purpose of vitiating a finding which is very reasonable in its amount, and which I think substantially just.

Under these circumstances, though I do not pretend to have my mind free from all difficulty as to the construction of these words in the award, I am not prepared to give my voice against the judgment which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant is proprietor of the lands and barony of Kilpatrick in the county of Dumbarton, which include the greater part of a natural basin of water known as Loch Humphrey, and also an inconsiderable part of Loch Fyn, a small sheet of water which is one of the feeders of the larger loch. The outlet of Loch Humphrey is a burn which runs in a southerly direction for nearly a mile through the appellant's lands, and thence along the eastern boundary of these lands until it joins the Cochno Burn, which is in its turn absorbed by another stream called the Duntocher Burn. Many years ago the storage capacity of Loch Humphrey was greatly increased by means of an artificial embankment erected across its outlet by the predecessors in title of the appellant.

On the 20th February 1854 the appellant, in implement of a previous agreement, disponed in feu to the late Alexander Dunn of Duntocher several parcels of land either adjacent or near to the Duntocher Burn with the mills thereon, and also the whole "rights of water power, and other rights connected with the mills hereby disponed, including all right I have to dam up and draw water from Loch Humphrey and Loch Fyn, or to form embankments or breastworks at said lochs." The appellant especially reserved to himself and his successors "all our rights in the foresaid lochs and burn, except our rights therein connected with the mills, and with the pieces of ground and other rights above conveyed and granted." The effect of the disposition was to leave the property of the lochs and burn in the appellant burdened with a praedial servitude of water power attached to the heritable subjects feued. So far as the water of the loch was not required for the purposes of his dominant tenement, or could be utilised by him consistently with these purposes, it remained subject to the disposal of the appellant, and on the other hand Mr Dunn and his successors could not use their water rights except for the special objects for which they were given.

The servitude could not be communicated by them to any person who was not in right of the subjects to which it was attached.

The respondents are Water Commissioners for the burgh of Dumbarton under an Act passed in 1883, the 6th section of which defines the works which they are authorised to make and maintain. One of these is a reservoir, "being an enlargement of the reservoir or loch known as Loch Humphrey, in the parish of Old or West Kilpatrick and county of Dumbarton, to be formed by an embankment to commence at a point about 23 yards north-eastward from the point where the existing bye-wash issues from Loch Humphrey as aforesaid, and to terminate at a point about 210 yards westward from the said point of commencement." The other is a line of pipes "commencing in the reservoir hereinbefore described," and terminating in the respondents' Garshake reservoir, which lies to the north-east of Loch Humphrey. The Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, and the Water-works Clauses Act, 1847, were incorporated in the Act of 1883, so that the respondents are admittedly bound to make due compensation for all interests in land taken by them or injuriously affected by their statutory operations.

The effect of the authorised works being to divert the water of the loch to Dumbarton, it is obvious that their execution must affect the interests of the appellant both as riparian proprietor along the course of the natural outlet and as owner of the loch. For the first of these interests the appellant cannot claim to be compensated, because the 9th section of the Act provides that the respondents shall cause to be discharged down the burn a regular and continuous flow of not less than 320,000 gallons of water per diem, which is to be deemed to be sufficient compensation to mill-owners and all others interested in the waters of the burn. But section 10 expressly saves the rights of the appellant in Loch Humphrey, and his claims of compensation for any such rights as may be injuriously affected by anything done under or for the purposes of the Act.

If the respondents had chosen to execute the whole works authorised by section 6, it would have been necessary for them to take land for the site of the new embankment and enlargement of the loch, and the supply of water obtained by that means would have been taken from the loch. In that case the difficulties which they have hitherto thrown in the way of ascertaining the appellant's just claims to compensation would never have existed. But instead of strictly following their statutory powers the respondents resorted to the following ingenious device. In June 1884 they proceeded to take from the appellant by notice (1) one-sixteenth of an acre of land, just outside the old embankment and its outlet, upon which they have constructed a couple of guage-wells; and (2) a way-leave for their pipe, which they did not insert in the loch, but connected with the old outlet. In the statutory arbitration which followed on the notice the appellant claimed compensation for his water rights in the loch; but the respondents have all along disputed his claim upon the ground that they do not take water from the loch, but from the stream which issues from it, and that the appellant is therefore fully compensated by the daily supply sent down the burn in terms of section 9. The argument is simply preposterous. Their Act (sec. 8) authorises the respondents to divert, appropriate, and use the waters of Loch Humphrey, and that is just what they are now doing. The oversman valued the subjects included in the respondents' notice at £50, and with respect to the appellant's claim he found as follows,—"In the event of its being admitted or judicially determined that the said Lord Blantyre had at the date of the foresaid statutory notice retained any right or interest in the waters of Loch Fyn or Loch Humphrey, and the streams called Loch Humphrey Burn and Duntocher Burn, or any of them, and that he is now entitled to compensation in respect of such right or interest, notwithstanding the provisions contained in sections 9 and 10 of the Dumbarton Water-works, Streets, and Buildings Act, 1883, or either of them, I hereby find and determine the sum of £3000 to be the amount to be paid by the said Dumbarton Water-works Commissioners to the said Right Honourable Charles Lord Blantyre for or in respect of the interest to be acquired from the said Lord Blantyre by the said Dumbarton Water-works Commissioners in the foresaid waters, and the embankments at said Lochs Humphrey and Fyn, and the right to intercept and to appropriate the said water, and for the damage to be sustained by him by or in consequence of the work of the said Dumbarton Water-works Commissioners, and that over and above the said sum of £50, including in the said sum of £3000 the sum of £1650, as the estimated price or value of the embankments made at Loch Humphrey and Loch Fyn."

The present action has been brought by the appellant for recovery of that sum of £3000. The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), as soon as the record was closed, assoilzied the respondents with expenses, being of opinion that under the feu-conveyance of 1854 Alexander Dunn had "obtained a title to all Lord Blantyre's rights to the water in the two lochs"—a proposition so plainly untenable that it was practically given up by the respondents' counsel. The Second Division of the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Lord Craighill was of the same opinion as Lord Fraser as to the effect of the feu-rights of 1854; but the majority of the Court, consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) and Lord Rutherfurd Clark, did not take that view. They were of opinion that the appellant retained important rights in the lochs notwithstanding his disposition to Dunn; but, so far as I can understand their judgments, they seem to have thought either that the appellant had made no relevant statement of his interests said to be affected, or that these interests were not in reality prejudicially affected by the respondents' operations. The learned Judges appear to me to have overlooked the fact that apart from statutory authority no person could, even with the full consent of Dunn or his representatives, have diverted a drop of the loch water to Dumbarton without first obtaining the permission or acquiring the interest of the appellant, and that the value of that interest to persons taking it compulsorily is a matter for the determination not of the Court, but of the tribunals to whom it is committed by the Lands Clauses Acts.

Besides their defences founded on the feu to Alexander Dunn, and on the assumption that they are not taking water out of the loch but out of the stream, the respondents have at your Lordships' bar relied upon two pleas—the one being that the appellant has made no relevant allegation of his rights in the loch, and the other that the terms of the oversman's award of £3000 are so ambiguous that effect cannot be given to it.

No plea against relevancy is to be found in the record, and if sustained, it would not entitle the respondents to the decree of absolvitor which both Courts below have given them. Moreover, the plea now urged is founded on defect of specification, and if stated in the Court of Session would probably have been met at once by an amendment of the record. It appears to me that in the admitted circumstances of this case the claim made by the appellant in his condescendence, which is practically identical with the claim narrated by the oversman in his award, is perfectly intelligible. The claim in both is for compensation in respect of those interests of his in the loch which the respondents have possessed themselves of, and are now enjoying under statutory authority. It is not disputed that the respondents are using the old loch as a reservoir, the water of which they take to Dumbarton as matter of right—a right which they could not enjoy except by appropriating and using the appellant's proprietary interests. It is quite true that the respondents do not propose to acquire in property the alveus of the reservoir or the old artificial embankment, but they cannot acquire an interest in the water of the reservoir without also acquiring an interest in the basin which contains it, to the use of which they are by necessary implication entitled for the purpose of preserving its contents. These are interests taken by the respondents, with the result of imposing a new and perpetual burden upon the appellant's heritable estate.

To that part of the oversman's award which relates to the £3000 sued for the respondents take two objections. In the first place, it is said that the award fixes the same amount of compensation in respect of the whole as in respect of any one or more of several rights to which the appellant might ultimately be found entitled by a Court of law; and in the second place, that it values the embankments on the footing that they were to be acquired in fee by the respondents. Both objections appear to me to be unfounded. The supposed ambiguity in the award, just as in the appellant's claim, is, in my opinion, mainly due to the strange device by which the respondents sought to escape from their statutory liabilities. The alternative words upon which they found were obviously introduced in order to make the award cover the appellant's interest in the loch water, whether the respondents took it from the loch itself or abstracted it from the burn after it issued from the loch.

As to the second objection, the oversman in the earlier part of his award gives £3000, not in respect of the embankments on the footing that they are to be acquired by the respondents, but in respect of the interest in these embankments which they must necessarily acquire if they are to use the loch as a reservoir. I have had considerable difficulty with regard to the last clauses of the oversman's finding, but I have come to be of opinion with the Lord Chancellor that he did not intend to value the embankment as a separate subject at £1650. He merely refers to that sum as one of the factors which entered into his cumulo estimate of £3000. In valuing water alone the cost of works for storing it must be taken into account. The price of water in an artificial reservoir cannot be estimated on the same principles as that of water in a wholly natural basin. I see no reason to suppose that the arbiter erred in his mode of estimating those proprietary rights of the appellant which the respondents have beyond doubt either taken or affected, and in my opinion he has valued no other rights. I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and a remit made to the Court of Session to decern in terms of the summons. I also think that the appellant ought to have his expenses in the Court of Session as well as the costs of his appeal.

LORD FITZGERALD.—From an early period of this hearing I had no doubt as to the decision at which in furtherance of justice your Lordships ought to arrive if it was practicable to do so, namely, that Lord Blantyre should receive compensation from the Council for the benefits of the reservoir, and the supply of water for the burgh of Dumbarton which they took from the reservoir by a circuitous course, and under a claim of right now decided to be unfounded.

I concur willingly in a decision which defeats the device by which the Council of Dumbarton sought to acquire this supply of water without paying just compensation for it. It is plain that a majority of the Judges in the Court below proceeded upon, or were at least very much influenced and misled by, an erroneous construction of the grant to Dunn.

There has been considerable difficulty in the interpretation of the award, but on the whole I concur in the construction of that instrument adopted by your Lordships, and so fully expressed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson).

My Lords, I now desire for myself to acknowledge the assistance I have derived from the clear argument of Mr Dundas.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from reversed; cause remitted to the Court of Session to decern for £3050, in terms of the summons; the respondents to pay to the appellant his costs both in this House and in the Court of Session.

Road—Right of way—Evidence of public use.—In an action of declarator that there existed a public right of way for passengers on foot and on horseback, and for driving cattle and sheep through the Glen of the Doll in Forfarshire, it was proved that the pass formed the direct and natural access from Clova to Braemar, and that from time immemorial there had existed a well-known and well-defined track through the glen; that there had been a practice of drovers taking sheep by this track from the public market at Braemar in spring and autumn to a public market near Kirriemuir; that the track had been used by farmers in the district going to Clova or to Braemar, and occasionally by tourists going between these places; that there had been a repute in the district, both among the public and among the proprietors of the ground over which the track passed, that there was a public right of way. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division), on a consideration of the evidence, that having regard to the nature of the district, the use proved was sufficient in amount, and that it was to be attributed not to tolerance, but to the assertion of a public right.

The defender appealed.

The respondents were not called on.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Looking at what has been said by Lord Young in this case, and at what has been the course of the evidence, if I had been unable to find an answer to the question which his Lordship has propounded, I certainly should have desired to hear the respondents in this appeal, but in considering the evidence which has been brought before us I should very much regret that upon what is after all a pure question of fact I should differ from such a large majority of the learned Judges—the Lord Ordinary and the majority of the Judges of the Second Division—who had the facts before them, and who must be very much better acquainted than I can be with the habits and practices of the country.

The question in the mind of an English lawyer is not only whether he can, on proper judicial evidence, determine that there has been an exercise of such a right of way as is here in question, but whether he can reasonably infer from that that the owner had a real intention of dedicating that way to the use of the public. That, however, is not the law of Scotland, and if it can be established that for the necessary period there has in fact been such a use of the way as negatives a mere licence or permission, then, as I understand the law of Scotland, that establishes absolutely the right of way in question.

Now, I have said that a question is put by Lord Young to which if I were not able to give an answer I should feel that the respondents ought to be able to furnish it to me. Lord Young, quoting the Lord Ordinary, says,—"The question is, whether such use as has been proved is to be ascribed to tolerance or right. Why, I ventured to ask," says Lord Young, "is it not to be ascribed to tolerance? Does anybody think that an ordinary proprietor would have objected to it, or interfered with it by appealing to a Court of law to prevent such use of it upon any of the occasions which have been referred to? Why, he would have been thought very ill of by his neighbours, and I think deservedly." Now, I say that if no answer could be given to that question I should take a different view from that which I have been at last compelled to take. But when I look at the evidence I find that besides the occasional and rare use of the way by persons who would properly come within the ambit of Lord Young's observations, there are a set of facts which I think are not reconcilable with what his Lordship refers to as kindliness and good neighbourliness. If there is one fact more than another which stands out, as I think, clearly established by the evidence, and not qualified by any cross-examination, it is this, that upon this road from Braemar to Glen Clova there were at least two occasions in every year, and for a very considerable period, when those persons who had not been able to dispose of their sheep at Braemar made a regular, well-known, and ascertained practice of bringing those surplus sheep which they had not been able to dispose of at the Braemar market to the other market.

Now, I ask myself this question, whether, in the first place, I can infer from that state of facts that the proprietor was aware of what took place? I cannot doubt that, dealing with such public rights and such public matters as the markets which persons in the neighbourhood were in the habit of going to and coming from, it would be almost impossible but that the proprietor would become acquainted with that practice. And the second question immediately follows, whether, if he was aware of the long-continued and well-settled practice which was going on from year to year (not through the whole year of course, because the occasions did not arise, but on two ordinary and settled occasions in every year) the proprietor would, on the footing of its being a mere licence or permission, be likely to stand by and allow the right, which he must know would very probably be established by such constant user, to be established without interference or remonstrance on his part? My Lords, I have come to the conclusion that it would be impossible to sustain that contention. However good-natured the proprietor might be, and however desirous of assisting his neighbours, I think he would desire to protect his rights by insisting upon some record of his rights, or some way of shewing that what was being done was by his licence and permission, and not as of right; but I look in vain throughout the whole of this evidence for the least intimation of any effort on the part of the proprietor to impose upon those persons who were using this road —which was a wild mountain road, and one unfrequented no doubt on ordinary occasions—any kind of hindrance which could be removed by his permission.

Under these circumstances, my Lords, I cannot but feel that the observations made by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill are well founded; and apart altogether from what I should certainly regard as absolutely insufficient to establish any such right, namely, the evidence of the occasional and rare use of this road by travellers passing through, or by botanising excursionists, or by friends and neighbours, who are clearly proved to have used part of the road, and might very well be supposed to use a part of it without any assumed right to traverse it from end to end,—apart from all that class of evidence, to which I think Lord Young's observations apply with great force,—I cannot reconcile this market user, which was of necessity from one end to the other, because it was from one market to the other, and which was continuous from year to year on the particular occasions whenever a market was held, with anything but the existence of a public right, and under those circumstances I move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD SELBORNE.—I entirely agree, and I am so well satisfied with the reasons given by the majority of the Judges in the Court below and by the Lord Ordinary that I do not think it necessary to say more than a very few words.

It appears to me, in the first place, that the evidence is as great in quantity and as cogent in its effect as could be expected under the circumstances of the place and of the country if the right did exist and had existed from a very remote period, and that being so, I think it would be rather alarming if without evidence of some kind to counterbalance the impression so made the evidence given were held insufficient, because it would follow from that that practically under such circumstances no amount of evidence at all would establish such a right. Well, is there evidence to counterbalance it? I own that I think there is none.

Now, when you have the fact of user of a road of this description in the manner and to the extent which would be the natural consequence of its being a matter of public right, and that fact proved by a sufficient amount of evidence, how is that to be met? According to the well-known text of the civil law a claim of right of this kind will be repelled if it is shewn to have been enjoyed either vi (which is out of the question here, for certainly there has been no force) or clam (which I think is equally out of the question, for whatever use there was was so public that it must have been known) or precario; and that is the real question here. What is suggested by Lord Young is that it is consistent with the evidence in this case that what was done should have been done precario—that is, by sufferance, by virtue of leave and licence, from time to time on each particular occasion, to those who would otherwise have been trespassers. Now, I confess that upon such evidence as we have here I think that is a strong proposition unless there are some definite facts brought forward in support of it. When I speak of "such evidence as we have here," I refer more particularly to those things which are most unequivocal—to the fact that this passage has taken place along a definite track (I think the evidence shews that even at the point where it is least definite, namely, towards the summit at Jock's Road, the boulders have been cleared away, and there is a sort of ladder or staircase in the rock, such as most people are familiar with in very mountainous districts and countries) from one public terminus to the other public terminus, and that there is a known line of passage and a definite track. It is not as if people made their own way, one in one direction and one in another; but the evidence appears to me to shew, without controversy or contradiction, that this is a definite passage between one public terminus and another, which, according to the law of Scotland, is necessary to make a public way. Then, in the next place, although except at certain periods and for certain purposes the use of it may be so casual that if that had stood alone it might have been insufficient to make out the right, yet the very periodicity and the nature of the purposes which at those periods caused the use of it to take place, give emphasis to all the other circumstances as calculated to call the attention of the proprietors and occupiers to the matter, and to lead either to interference or to definite permission if the thing were not of right. And I may mention (not supposing that so remarkable and conspicuous an instance frequently took place) the evidence which is not controverted about the several droves of sheep which several different persons took over the pass in 1875. It seems to me that that alone must have brought the parties into a sort of conflict with each other, and have led to an understanding whether the thing was to go on upon the footing of a right or otherwise if it had been really challenged.

Macpherson v. Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited.

I then ask the question, whether there has been any leave or licence or tolerance or sufferance, regarded as a question of fact. Is there any evidence whatever given in support of an affirmative opinion? Absolutely none. I find from the beginning to the end not a trace of such a thing, not only not proof of there having been any act which would fairly have had that meaning, but I do not find the least trace of its having been suggested or thought of by anybody. On the contrary, it is to my mind fully proved both that the parties who used this road understood themselves to be doing so as of right without its necessitating anybody's permission, and that the occupiers and owners, at least for a very considerable time from the present (though perhaps not enough by itself to have established a right), understood that to be so, acquiesced in it, and themselves acted upon that supposition. There were several instances. I will not insist upon them as enough to establish the right, because the dates of them may be too recent. There was the soliciting of public subscriptions, and the obtaining of them, for a bridge in which the public would have had no interest whatever except upon the supposition that this was a public right. Then when one of the owners planted a certain place a space was left on purpose for this road, clearly because it was a public road; and there were some other things which I need not mention, but it is enough to say that it appears to me to be the true result of the evidence that everybody, both those who used the road and those over whose ground it was used, thought and acted upon the opinion that it was a matter of public right and not to be resisted. As far as there is evidence at all it is all that way.

Under these circumstances I confess that I do not think it possible to differ from the conclusion arrived at in the Court below.

Lord Watson.—Having regard to the character of the track in dispute, and to the thin population of the district in which it is situated, I think the amount of actual user for upwards of forty years past has been just such as might have been expected if it had been admittedly a public way.

That being so, the case is narrowed to this issue—Was such use had in the exercise and assertion of a public right, or must it be ascribed to the tolerance of successive proprietors? Notwithstanding the able arguments addressed to us by the Solicitor-General for Scotland and Mr Asher, I have been unable to come to the conclusion that the use was by sufferance merely. It appears to me to have been generally understood, as well by those who used the road as by those who stood by and saw it used, that foot-passengers and drovers were free to pass along it as a matter of right, and that no permission was required.

After the observations which have been made by the Lord Chancellor and by the noble and learned Earl opposite, it is unnecessary for me to refer to the evidence in detail. I concur in the judgment which has been proposed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I also concur, and especially in the observations which have been made by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson). If this case had gone before a jury the question to be submitted to the jury would have been whether there had been an exercise as of right of the user of this way; and I should say that the proper inference to be deduced by the jury from the evidence would have been that there had been that continuous exercise—an exercise not by sufferance but as of right. The case comes, as far as I am concerned, in a still stronger light before me, for the Lord Ordinary who heard the witnesses and examined into the case in detail comes to that conclusion, and his decision is adopted by the majority of the Judges of the Court of Session. Upon the question of fact, or of the fair inference to be deduced from the facts in proof, I should have been slow indeed to take an adverse view if the question had been decided upon its being submitted to a jury, but still more so when the determination is that of so many able and learned Judges conversant with the law of Scotland, and with the mode of dealing with rights of this kind in Scotland. When we find, then, that there is evidence of the user of this way as of right, extending over a period of at least forty years, or more than forty years, even if we had some evidence of interruption it would be valueless.

The law on this subject was stated fifty or sixty years ago by the then Lord Chief Commissioner in very clear terms. I allude to the case from Scotland of Harvie v. Rodgers, July 8, 1828 (3 Wilson and Shaw's Reps. 251), in which the Lord Chief Commissioner's direction in point of law to the jury was adopted by Lord Eldon. Lord Eldon puts it thus (3 Wilson and Shaw, 260),—"The learned Judge in substance told the jury, There is evidence from which you may assume that for a particular period, namely, for forty years, this way had been exercised without interruption. If you are of that opinion, then that is, according to the law of Scotland, sufficient to establish a prescriptive right of way; and if that right of way be once established in the manner I have stated, then I tell you in point of law that subsequent interruptions not acquiesced in cannot defeat the right so acquired."

We had a great deal of consideration of the law of Scotland on this subject in the case of Mann v. Brodie, May 4, 1885, 10 App. Ca. 378, 12 R. (H. L.), 52, and Harvie's case is a distinct confirmation of the doctrine which I have mentioned.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I am also of the same opinion.

NORTHERN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, (Defenders) Respondents.—Att.-Gen. Webster—R. T. Reid, Q.C.

Harbour—Construction of the word "port" in policy of marine insurance.—Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that in a policy of insurance on a ship for the voyage, and "while in port thirty days after arrival," the meaning of the term "port" as applicable to the port of Greenock did not include the fairway of the navigable channel of the river Clyde ex adverso of the harbour works.

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.
Ld. Herschell.
Lord Macnaghten.

(IN the Court of Session, March 4, 1887, 14 R. 544.)

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of Lord Watson:—

"The barque 'Afton,' of Ayr, arrived at Greenock from Java, on 22d January 1885, and discharged her cargo in the Victoria Harbour. On 6th February the vessel was taken for repairs into a shipbuilder's private dock within the ambit of the harbour works, and on the 12th of the month she left that dock in ballast for the port of Glasgow in tow of a tug-steamer, when she was capsized by a sudden gust of wind, and sustained serious damage. At the time when the accident occurred the stern of the 'Afton' had reached a point in the waterway of the Clyde 500 yards or thereby outside the harbour works of Greenock. The 'Afton' was covered by three policies of insurance for a voyage from Java to any port of discharge in the United Kingdom, 'and while in port during thirty days after arrival.'

"The present action was brought by her owners, the appellants, against the underwriters, who are respondents, for the cost of raising and repairing the vessel.

"The Lord Ordinary (Trayner) assoilzied the respondents, being of opinion that the locus of the accident was not within the port of Greenock, and that the vessel had left the port on 6th February, within the meaning of the policies, when she went into a private dock for repairs.

"The First Division of the Court (Lord Shand dissenting) affirmed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary upon the first of these grounds, without disposing of the second. Lord Shand was of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was wrong upon both points, and that the appellants were entitled to decree."

Hunter and others, owners of the "Afton," appealed.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question whether the barque "Afton," insured under a policy while she was in port, suffered a misfortune which entitles her owners to recover against the underwriters, depends, first, upon the construction to be given to the word "port," and secondly, when the meaning of that word has been ascertained, upon whether the accident is proved to have happened within the limits contemplated by the contract.

The word "port" is undoubtedly ambiguous. If we were not dealing with a policy of insurance, then, no doubt, what is meant by the word "port" is what Lord Esher, in the Garston Ship Company v. Hickie, 1885, 15 Q. B. D. 580, describes as what shippers of goods, charterers of vessels, and shipowners, would mean by a port—that is to say, a legal port might be, according to the general understanding of the classes of persons described by Lord Esher, either restricted or enlarged by mercantile usage. There are, however, some well-received elements which, I think, according to any usage one would expect to find. I do not know that these ordinary elements are anywhere more concisely set forth than in the treatise ascribed to Sir Matthew Hale—(Pars Secunda de Portibus Maris, contained in Hargrave's Tracts relative to the law of England, 46). "A port is an haven, and something more—(1) It is a place for arriving and unlading of ships or vessels. (2) It hath a superinduction of a civil signature upon it, somewhat of franchise and privilege, as shall be shewn. (3) It hath a ville or city or borough, that is the caput portus, for the receipt of mariners and merchants, and the securing and vending of their goods and victualling their ships. So that a port is quid aggregatum, consisting of somewhat that is natural, viz., an access of the sea, whereby ships may conveniently come, safe situation against winds, where they may safely lie, and a good shore, where they may well unlade; something that is artificial, as quays and wharfs and cranes and warehouses and houses of common receipt; and something that is civil, viz., privileges and franchises, viz., jus applicandi, jus mercati, and divers other additaments given to it by civil authority."

Commonly when a port so described is in question no such difficulty as arises here interferes with the determination of the question of fact. The arrival of a vessel at a particular place, and the mercantile usage applicable to such a place, solves the problem without much real difficulty, or any appeal to the mercantile usage referred to by the Master of the Rolls in the case already quoted. What are the proper tests to apply when the question arises whether the vessel has or has not arrived at the port at which she is to deliver her cargo, to quote the language of the noble Lord (15 Q. B. D. 588)—"Now, what will such a port be? What do you go to a port for? Because you want either to load or unload goods. Everyone who understands ships knows that you cannot conveniently load or unload goods in a place where the ship itself would be in danger. Therefore all people possessed of common sense, instead of taking their boats on to a beach on an open sea, where they might be knocked to pieces in a storm, go to what they call a port, which is always a sheltered place. It is a place of safety for the ship and the goods whilst the goods are being loaded or unloaded. There will never be a port, in the ordinary business sense of the word, unless there is some element of safety in it for the ship and goods. Now, what will constitute a port as regards the loading and unloading of goods and the safety of the ship during the process? What will more certainly be a port in the sense of all persons concerned in the use of it than a natural port? That is, a place in which the conformation of the land with regard to the sea is such that if you get your ship within certain limits she is in a place of safety for loading and unloading."

But the difficulty in this case arises from the fact that there are, so to speak, rival ports along the course of the Clyde, and it is essential for the pursuers to establish that the "Afton" was capsized and stranded within the limits of the port of Greenock. I entirely agree with Lord Shand that the port as fixed by statute for fiscal purposes has no relation to the question now in debate. The port of Cardiff, for instance, extends for sixty miles for Customs purposes, and within that sixty miles are comprehended several other ports perfectly well known and recognised as different and independent ports in the commercial sense, although comprehended within the ambit enacted for Customs purposes. I also agree with Lord Shand that the test applied by one of the witnesses, namely, that the port must be where a ship can legally call upon a consignee of cargo to take delivery, is obviously unsound. I also agree that the argument derived from the Act of Parliament of 1866 is inconclusive, and I should follow the learned Judge's reasoning, for it is impossible to suppose that that statute has changed the meaning of the "Port of Greenock" as that term was previously understood in its natural and ordinary commercial sense by business men in making their contracts of charter or insurance.

Now, the place where the "Afton" stranded is about a quarter of a mile from the shore of Greenock, and the question whether or not it is within or without the limits of the port of Greenock is a pure question of fact. I think there was some evidence which, unexplained, might have induced me to come to the conclusion that it was. The reception of port dues, the loading or unloading of vessels bound to the port, are the natural and appropriate sources of proof. But the element of doubt which exists in this case arises from the fact that the accident happened in a land-locked waterway, as to which it may be said that the evidence is as applicable in some respects to Glasgow as to Greenock. The place called the Tail of the Bank has been used by vessels consigned to other ports, and it is common for vessels to anchor there when it is intended to lighten them of part of their burden, and the goods so lightered, and the vessels so lightened, have proceeded to ports other than Greenock. The only class of evidence which has made me hesitate has been the exaction by the Greenock authorities of dues from vessels anchoring at places which, if those dues had been lawfully exacted, would be almost conclusive to shew that the locus in quo was within the limits of the port of Greenock. But the weight of that evidence has, in my judgment, been so reduced by proof of successful resistance to the dues that I am unable to differ from the Lord Ordinary and the majority of the learned Judges who concurred with him in the conclusion at which they arrived, that the locus in quo is not proved to have been within the limits of the port of Greenock. I doubt whether the history of the port throws any light upon the questions under debate. Both in Scotland and in England the right to erect a port is part of the royal prerogative. No port can exist except under the authority of the Sovereign, and if the question were the legal existence of such a port as Greenock, the historical evidence would be conclusive, but it does not appear to me to touch the question of the limits of the port thus proved to exist. For these reasons I am of opinion that it is not established that the locus in quo was within the limits of the port of Greenock.

The Lord Ordinary decided the case in favour of the defenders, and expressed an opinion that the taking of the vessel into Caird's Dock, or the starting on her voyage, even if within the limits of the port of Greenock at the time of the happening of the accident, would have put an end to the risk. In the view I take of the case it is not necessary to decide these points, but I wish to guard myself against being supposed to concur in either of these views. I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—(After the narrative above quoted)—The harbour works of Greenock are constructed on the south shore of the river Clyde, and consist of a series of quays or breastworks abutting on the river, with inner docks or basins, the majority of which are tidal. The estuary of the Clyde ex adverso of these works is of considerable width, but the navigable channel is contracted by a sandbank on its north side, which extends all the way from the eastern to a point not far from the western extremity of the harbour works. The distance from the front of the works to the edge of the bank averages about 1000 feet, and at the place where the "Afton" capsized is about 800 feet, so that the vessel had crossed the medium filum of the water-way. At the west end of the sandbank, to the north of the waterway proper, there is a roadstead known as the Tail of the Bank, which is chiefly used as an anchorage by foreign-going vessels passing up and down the river on their way to and from Greenock or Glasgow and the intermediate ports, of which there are several. It is customary for inward-bound ships of large burthen, whilst anchored there, to lessen their draught of water by discharging part of their cargo, which is conveyed in lighters, sometimes to Greenock and sometimes to Glasgow. It is also customary for outward-bound ships to moor at the Tail of the Bank for the purpose of taking on board their stores and the complement of their crew.

According to the appellants' argument the port of Greenock comprehends what they represent as the bay of Greenock, being a large area of water ex adverso of the south shore, between Garvel Point on the east and White Farland Point on the west, extending so far northwards as to include the whole navigable channel used by vessels passing up and down the river, as well as the Tail of the Bank. The case submitted for the respondents is, that the port of Greenock is confined to the artificial harbour works, and to such part of the river as ma be necessary for and is actually used by vessels moored alongside the piers o quays. A great mass of evidence—oral and documentary—has been adduce in support of either view. It was not disputed that what is popularly or commercially understood to be the port of Greenock must be taken to be the por for the purposes of this case.

I doubt whether it would be expedient, and I do not think it is necessary, to attempt any definition of the various circumstances or indicia which will be sufficient to give to a particular piece of water the character of a port in a popular or commercial sense. In many instances its natural or artificial features of themselves go a long way to indicate what must be popularly taken to be the limits of a port; but the case of The Sea Insurance Company v. Gavin, decided by this House in 1830 (4 W. & S. 17), shews that an open and exposed roadstead may be a port within the meaning of a marine policy. I think it was rightly held in Garston Ship Company v. Hickie, 15 Q. B. D. 580, that in ascertaining its popular limits no aid can be derived from statutory definitions of a port for fiscal purposes. That is obviously true in the present case, because the port of Greenock, as defined by Treasury Warrant, in pursuance of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1853, includes the greater part of the Firth of Clyde, and all seaports on the mainland, or in the Hebrides, from Ardnamurchan Point to West Loch Tarbert. The boundaries of the burgh of Greenock, as fixed for police purposes by a series of municipal Acts, appear to me to be equally beside the present question.

In my opinion the most important consideration in all cases like the present must be whether the area in dispute has or has not been used and treated as an integral part of the port by vessels frequenting it as well as by the port authorities. I do not think the oral evidence—which chiefly consists of conflicting opinions derived from facts otherwise proved—throws much, if any, light upon the controversy between the parties. Upon the whole evidence, I have come to the conclusion that both Courts below were right in holding that the place where the "Afton" met with her mishap on the 12th February 1885 is not within the limits of the port and harbour of Greenock. The contour of the south shore between Garvel Point and White Farland Point does not indicate the existence of anything like a bay enclosed by two headlands, although the phrase "bay of Greenock" does occur in some of the documents produced. A straight line drawn between these points would include but a small portion of the area claimed as a bay by the appellants. Immediately, or at a very short distance, outside the face of the harbour works there is the navigable channel, of inconsiderable width, which is in constant use by shipping of all sorts and sizes, passing and repassing between Glasgow or other places on the Clyde and home or foreign ports. The Tail of the Bank is not used for these purposes, and affords a safe harbourage for vessels of large size, but there are no physical features to indicate that it is more intimately connected with Greenock than with other ports on the river.

According to the law of Scotland the right of erecting and holding public ports and harbours is vested in the Sovereign, and neither communities nor individuals can possess that right without a grant from the Crown or the authority of Parliament. In some instances the Crown has given a right of free port, with the privilege of levying dues, over a large area of water, as in the case of the royal burgh of Campbeltown, whose grant expressly includes the whole loch or bay—Magis- trates of Campbeltown v. Galbreath, Dec. 14, 1844, 7 D. 220. The port of Greenock was the subject of a grant from the Crown in 1670 to Sir John Shaw, the owner of the lands and barony of Greenock, and superior of the burgh, which conferred upon him and his successors power "to repair and build free ports, harbouries, and havening places upon any pairt of the ground of the said lands," with all rights and privileges pertaining to other free ports, including such shore silver, anchorage, and other duties as these were in use to levy. The charter expressly confines the grant to the foreshore of the barony, and to artificial works upon it, and gives the grantee no right of port in the bay of Greenock or in the navigable waters of the Clyde. It appears from the municipal records of Glasgow in 1693 and 1696 that two ports had then been established on the foreshores of the barony, the one at the burgh of Greenock and the other at Cartsdyke, between the burgh and Garvel Point. These were in all probability mere landing places upon the open beach, ports which Sir Thomas Craig (De Feudis, 1, 16, 12) describes as places in quibus naves appellunt; but in the year 1705 Sir John Shaw raised a sum of money, by subscription from the inhabitants of the burgh, "for building the harbour there situated on a small beginning." The subscription proved to be insufficient for the completion of the works contemplated, and in 1751 a local Act was passed authorising a tax upon all ale or beer sold within the burgh, to be paid to the Magistrates and Council, who were appointed trustees for cleaning and excavating, building, and repairing the harbour and piers. In 1772 the then proprietor of the barony disponed in feu to the Magistrates and Council "All and Whole the harbour of Greenock, and piers and quays of the same, which have been all built and gained off the sea since 1700, consisting of and comprehending eight acres three roods and ten falls, conform to a plan, signed by him of this date, with the anchorages, shore, bay, and ring dues payable by all kinds of ships or vessels coming into the harbour of Greenock or into any other harbour or harbours that may be built betwixt the west side of the Kirk Burn and the east side of the Royal Closs in Greenock." It is clear that the feu-charter of 1772, which transferred the harbour to the burgh, conveyed nothing except the artificial works defined by plan and measurement, and confined the right of exacting dues to vessels entering or using these works, or any additions which might be made to them. Having regard to the terms of his own title, it is equally clear that the superior made over to his feuars all the dues which he himself had a legal right to exact. The fact may be noticed here that in the year 1816 the Magistrates and Town Council, upon an application to His Majesty's Barons of Exchequer in Scotland, obtained a charter of gift from the Crown of the sandbank already mentioned, with the professed object of building dykes upon it for the protection of the bay and harbour from the east and north winds, and for making it otherwise useful without destroying or injuring the navigation of the river. I cannot understand what assistance the appellants derive from the terms of that deed. In the petition to the Barons of Exchequer which the charter narrates the sandbank is not described as lying in or bounding the port of Greenock (which is now the appellants' contention), but as situated in the estuary of the Clyde, and in the dispositive clause of the charter it is described as "opposite to the harbour of Greenock." Thus far the evidence does not suggest that the port of Greenock extends beyond the limits of the artificial works, and so much contiguous water space as may be requisite for the accommodation of vessels which use them.

I do not say that in Scotland the limits of a trading port, as understood by persons engaged in commerce, must of necessity be coextensive with the original grant from the Crown. They may be extended by parliamentary recognition or by the usage of the port, but it appears to me that the terms of the legal grant are an element of some importance in considering the history of the port and its present commercial limits. Since their acquisition by the municipality in 1772 the harbour works have been greatly enlarged and improved in virtue of powers conferred by a succession of local Acts, commencing in 1773 and ending in 1882. Under these Acts the ports and harbours have for a very long period been vested in a body of statutory trustees, who constitute the port authority for Greenock. They levy statutory rates, which are exigible solely in respect of the use of the artificial harbour works, and are applicable to the maintenance, repair, and extension of these works. At the time when the harbour was transferred to trustees the Magistrates and Council retained all rights which they had to levy anchorage, shore, bay, and ring dues, and these, or at least anchorage dues, were until recently collected by the Harbour Trust along with their statutory rates, and paid into the common good of the burgh. The subjects vested in the port authority by these statutes are the port and harbours of Greenock, and their enactments do not appear to me, when closely examined, to contain any recognition by the Legislature of the waterway of the Clyde or of the Tail of the Bank as forming a part of the port. The more recent statutes are decidedly unfavourable to that view. They limit the powers and jurisdiction of the trustees to the artificial works and harbours and the entrances to the latter, and the Act of 1866, which is now the leading statute, expressly distinguishes the port and harbours from the stream of the river and the Tail of the Bank in terms which, taken by themselves, plainly indicate that neither of these places is within the ambit of the statutory port. It must of course be kept in view that the main object of the statutes was to provide for the maintenance and enlargement of the artificial works, and their provisions are therefore not necessarily conclusive as to the limits of the commercial port. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present case to say that their enactments lend no support to the appellants' case. The duty of erecting and maintaining lighthouses and beacons, removing wrecks and other obstructions, of licensing pilots, and of making and enforcing regulations for the navigation of the river and firth of Clyde, including that part of the river which is ex adverso of the Greenock harbours, belongs exclusively to a statutory board, known as the Lighthouse Board. The cost incurred by the board in the execution of their Acts is defrayed by special rates, which they are empowered to levy from all vessels which navigate the waters under their jurisdiction. They have also the duty of deepening and dredging the navigable channel at the expense of these rates, but, so far as concerns that part of the channel which is opposite to Greenock Harbour, it is provided that the dredging shall be performed by the Greenock Harbour Trustees, either at their own instigation, after due notice to the board, or upon the requisition of the board; and, in the case of difference of opinion as to the work necessary to be executed, the Sheriff-depute of the county is authorised to decide between them. In all cases the cost of the work is borne by the board and not by the harbour rates.

The appellants' counsel laid considerable stress upon sections 96 and 134 of the Greenock Harbour Act of 1842, which authorise the trustees to cause the harbour, "and the bed of the river opposite the same," to be cleansed and deepened in such manner and to such extent as they may think fit, and also to remove "any wreck and other obstructions to the said harbours and the approaches thereof." The cost of these operations is laid upon the harbour rates, and I think the operations sanctioned upon the bed of the river were to be confined to the immediate vicinity of the works, and were meant to secure a sufficient depth of water, free from obstructions, alongside the piers and at the harbour entrances.

The appellants maintain that for a long course of years anchorage dues were levied from vessels moored in the waterway or at the Tail of the Bank quite irrespective of their intended port of discharge. As already explained, these dues, although collected by the trustees, were in reality levied by the municipality, as feuars of the port, and not by the harbour authority. Still, I do not think that circumstance would impair the significance of the fact, if it could be shewn that they were regularly exacted as dues for the use of the port of Greenock from vessels which did not enter or use the harbour works for any purpose. But the evidence comes far short of that. The anchorage dues amounted to a considerable sum annually, but the trade of the harbour of Greenock has been very large, and no attempt has been made to prove the proportion of the total sums collected from vessels which merely anchored, but did not break bulk, within the limits claimed by the appellants. So far as regards vessels which did not unload at or into Greenock Harbour, the evidence is both scant and unsatisfactory, and merely proves that attempts were frequently made, often, if not generally, without success, to levy anchorage dues from them. Eventually these dues were acquired by the Harbour Trust, and have not been exacted since the year 1868. There is some evidence to shew that many years ago vessels occasionally dropped their anchor outside the harbour works, but it is conclusively established that the narrow waterway is not and cannot, without detriment to the navigation of the river, be used as a place for mooring and loading and unloading ships. There are no doubt several buoys with mooring rings along the edge of the sandbank on the north side of the channel, but these have not been used for loading and discharging, and were placed there for the convenience of vessels warping out of or into the inner harbour.

In these circumstances, the appellants appear to me to have failed to prove any facts which can reasonably be held to warrant the inference that the port of Greenock extends to the whole of the navigable channel or to the Tail of the Bank. The ambit of the commercial port must, in my opinion, be taken to include merely the artificial works vested in the Harbour Trustees, and such contiguous water space as may be necessary for the accommodation of vessels using these works. What the precise extent of that space may be I do not find it necessary to consider, because it cannot embrace that part of the channel where the "Afton" capsized. The roadstead at the Tail of the Bank may be in a certain sense a port, but it is a roadstead over which the Greenock Harbour Trustees have no authority or control, and is used as a common anchorage by ships navigating the firth and river, whatever be their starting place or destination. It is no more an adjunct of the harbour of Greenock than of the harbours of Broomielaw or Port-Glasgow.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed, on the ground that the "Afton" was not at the time of the accident within the limits of the port of Greenock. I am not at present prepared to concur in the second reason assigned by the Lord Ordinary for his judgment. The respondents argued alternatively, that assuming the place of the accident to b within the limits of the port of Greenock, the "Afton" was no longer "i port" within the meaning of the policies, after she had broken ground, and wa proceeding on a new voyage. In my opinion, that is a question requiring con sideration, and is not (as Lord Shand seems to hold) necessarily ruled either b Garston Ship Company v. Hickie, 15 Q. B. D. 580, or by Roelandts v. Harri son, Jan. 31, 1854, 9 Ex. 444, but in the view which I take of the facts of thi case it is unnecessary to decide the point.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The circumstances which have given rise to this appeal may be very shortly stated. The appellants' barque, "Afton," was insured by an ordinary marine policy, "at and from port or ports in Java to any ports of call or discharge in the United Kingdom, or France, or the United States, and while in port during thirty days after arrival." She arrived at Greenock, to which port she had been ordered, on the 22d of January 1885, and discharged her cargo in the Victoria Harbour. On the completion of her discharge on the 6th of February she went into Caird's Dry Dock for repairs. These were finished on 12th February, and on the same day she was taken in tow in order to proceed to Glasgow to load a cargo of coals for Brisbane. She had reached a point about 500 yards distant from the artificial works of the harbour when she was struck by a squall of wind, capsized, and drifted on to a sandbank opposite the Custom House Quay. The disaster happened within thirty days after the vessel's arrival at Greenock, and the question is whether it occurred while she was "in port."

I agree with the view, which has been more than once expressed by learned Judges, that in construing such a contract as that with which we are dealing, the word "port" must be taken to have been used in its popular or commercial sense—that is to say, as applying to what would be understood as the port by shippers, shipowners, and underwriters. Where there is a common understanding among such persons as to the limits of a port the matter is free from difficulty. Here the appellants attempted to prove such a common understanding. The learned Lord Ordinary came to the conclusion that they had not succeeded in doing so, and after carefully considering the evidence I see no reason to differ from him. In the absence of any such common understanding, how is the question to be determined? It appears to me that you must then consider what are commonly understood to be the characteristics of a port, and what are in general the tests for determining its limits, and apply the conclusions arrived at to the particular case.

A port is a place where a vessel can lie in a position of more or less shelter from the elements, with a view to the loading or discharge of cargo. The natural configuration of the land is therefore often a most important element in determining what are the limits of a port. All the waters within given boundaries which possess the common character of safety and protection would be generally admitted to be within its ambit. Where, however, a port is one of several situate on the same river, it is obvious that the natural configuration of the land is not of the same importance, and does not afford the same guidance. I have carefully examined the plans before your Lordships in the present case, but do not find myself led by them to the conclusion that the disaster to the "Afton" occurred within the port of Greenock, nor have I been assisted by them in fixing the boundaries of that port. Under these circumstances I think we must have recourse to the history of the port, and its user, and must ascertain what is the area which has served the purposes of a port.

The port of Greenock is of comparatively recent origin, and the charter which created it is in existence. But I think that the inquiry, what has de facto been used as the port, is of even greater importance than an investigation of the limits constituted by the original grant. By a charter bearing date 10th July 1670, Charles II. granted to John Schaw of Greenock, the lands and barony of Greenock, comprising the lands of Wester Greenock, and other lands, with the ground within the ebbing and flowing of the sea lying contiguous to the said lands. By the same charter he granted full power to the said John Schaw "to repair and build free ports, harbouries, and havening places upon any pairt of the ground of the said lands," and gave, granted, and disponed "the haill privileges and liberty of free ports, harbouries, and havening places pertaining to any other port, harbourie, or havening place in this kingdom, and haill petty customs, shore silver, anchorage, and other dewties whatsoever of the said port or havening places." I think there can be little doubt that this was the origin of the port of Greenock: the language used points to that, and no evidence has been adduced of its existence at an earlier date. It appears that in the year 1705 Sir John Schaw raised a fund of money by voluntary subscription from the inhabitants of Greenock "for building the harbour there situated on a small beginning," and that a voluntary tax was afterwards imposed by the inhabitants for the same purpose. In the 24th year of Geo. II. an Act was passed, which, after reciting that the superior of the town of Greenock, with the inhabitants thereof, began to raise money about 1705 by voluntary subscription for building a harbour there, gave authority to levy a tax for the repair of the harbour.

In or about 1772, by an instrument which recited that the family of Greenock, who were the only lawful proprietors of the harbour, had been in use to exact certain small taxes called anchorage dues from the ships and other vessels frequenting the said harbour, the administrators and Town-Council of Greenock acquired these rights from John Shaw Stewart, and a feu-contract was afterwards entered into between them by which he alienated to the Magistrates and Town-Council "all and whole the harbour of Greenock, and piers and quays of the same, which have been all built and gained off the sea since 1700, consisting of and comprehending eight acres," with the anchorage, shore, bay, and ring dues payable by all the ships or vessels entering the harbour of Greenock, or any other harbour or harbours within certain limits, with power to the Magistrates and Town-Council to move forward and enlarge the harbour and to erect other harbours. I pause here to observe that it appears to me impossible to infer from the terms of the charter or the instruments founded upon it that the port has the wide limits contended for by the appellants. In 1773 an Act became law, entituled an Act for deepening, cleaning, and making more commodious the harbour of the town of Greenock. Several other Acts were passed relating to the harbour or port of Greenock between that date and 1866, when the consolidating and amending Act now in force was enacted.

Both sides have placed reliance upon this legislation. The appellants contend that it recognises the existence of a port extending beyond the artificial works and across the fairway of the river. The respondents deny this, and assert, on the contrary, that the statutes define the limits of the port, and shew that it does not extend beyond the artificial works and the waters immediately adjacent to them. I do not propose to enter upon a critical examination of the language of these statutes, for I am not disposed to place the same reliance upon them in determining this case as some of the learned Judges did in the Courts below. Even if it were quite clear that the statutes defined the port in the limited sense contended for, it would not to my mind be conclusive of the question with which we are dealing. Such definitions are often inserted merely for the purposes of the Act in which they are found, determining the boundaries within which the regulations or obligations of the statute are to operate. I will only say this—that I can find nothing in this legislation to indicate that the port of Greenock was known or understood to have the extensive limits contended for.

I have already pointed out that, in my judgment, the more important inquiry is what has been used as the port. For if an area outside the charter or statutory limits has in fact served as part of the port, I think it must be held for the present purpose to have these more extended limits. Before proceeding to this inquiry I may observe that I cannot attach any weight to the argument derived from the charter of 1816, by which the sandbank opposite Greenock was granted to the Town-Council for the purpose of building dykes upon it for the protection of the bay and harbour. I think it is consistent with either view. It was no doubt at one time the practice for vessels to anchor near the bank opposite Greenock, principally at the west end, which is known as the Tail of the Bank, and there discharge a part of their cargoes, or occasionally the whole. This practice continued until a few years ago. The appellants lay great stress upon this circumstance, and maintain that these anchorage places were within the port of Greenock. If Greenock had in all cases been the destination of the vessels so anchoring, and of the cargoes discharged from them, I should have felt the weight of this contention, for it would have been cogent evidence that the whole of the fairway opposite Greenock across to the bank had been treated and used as part of the port. But in point of fact many, I believe most, of the vessels which came to anchor in the neighbourhood of the bank were bound to Glasgow and other places on the river, and the part of the cargo there discharged was taken to these destinations. It appears to me that there is no more reason derived from the practice of anchoring and discharging near the bank, for asserting that the water so used formed part of the port of Greenock, than there is for alleging that it was a part of any other of the ports to which the vessels were bound, or to which the goods discharged from them were lightered. The appellants also urged strongly that their contention was supported by the fact that anchorage dues were received by the Greenock authorities in respect of vessels which came to anchor in the neighbourhood of the bank. If these dues had been uniformly paid by vessels so anchoring, one would unquestionably have endeavoured to find a legal origin for payments thus exacted and submitted to. And it may be that the conclusion that the anchoring ground was within the port of Greenock would have been the best explanation that could be arrived at, whatever difficulty might be interposed by the terms of the charter which created the port. But it is clear from the evidence led by the appellants that though many, and even the majority, of the vessels yielded to the claim and made the payments, yet during the entire period over which the evidence extends, payment was at times refused not only in the case of vessels going to Glasgow, but also of vessels destined for Greenock. And when payment was so refused it was never insisted on by the local authorities, nor did they ever assert their right in a Court of law. It is common knowledge that where it is sought to establish a right by evidence of its exercise a few instances in which the claim of right has been resisted and not insisted upon outweigh a multitude of cases in which it has been yielded to. I think it is impossible to draw any conclusion favourable to the appellants from the evidence as to the exaction of anchorage dues. It produces upon my mind the impression of a usurpation and encroachment rather than of the existence of a right which could have been established if brought to the test of legal proceedings.

The conclusion, then, to which I am led is that there is nothing either in the nature of the locality or in the documentary history of the port, or in the evidence as to the way in which it has been used, to shew that its boundaries extended to the place where the "Afton" was capsized. The learned counsel for the appellants insisted that if the contention of the respondents were supported a vessel going from one dock to another could not be said to be "in port." I do not think this follows. A vessel using in this manner and for this purpose the waters adjacent to the artificial works might well be said to be within the port without compelling the conclusion that it extended to the locus in question. All that I decide is that the appellants have not discharged themselves of the burden of proving that the place where the disaster occurred was within the port of Greenock.

It becomes unnecessary, owing to the conclusion at which I have arrived, to express an opinion upon the other question argued at the bar. Inasmuch as the "Afton" had broken ground on a new voyage at the time of the disaster it was urged that even if within the ambit of the port when this occurred she was not "in port" within the meaning of the policy. It was admitted by the appellants that the words "while in port" must receive some limiting construction, and that if the vessel had proceeded—say to Ayr—and then returned to Greenock, and been lost whilst in that port, and within the thirty days, the loss would not have been covered by the policy. Inasmuch as the "Afton" at the time in question would have been covered by a policy "from" Greenock, even though within the limits of the port, it is certainly open to serious consideration whether she can properly be said to have been damaged "while in port" within the meaning of the instrument sued on. I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LORD FITZGERALD concurred.

Trust—Liability of trustees for imprudent investment.—Circumstances in which family trustees, with the fullest powers of investment on such securities, heritable or personal, as they should think proper, were made liable for the loss of a sum lent to a member of the family on insufficient security.

The trustees of a draper in Glasgow, who died in 1863, held his estate, consisting, inter alia, of £4400 of capital in his business and his business premises, for the purpose of paying his widow an annuity of £400 per annum, and of dividing the residue among his children. They had the fullest powers to invest the estate "on such securities, heritable or personal, as they should think proper." The eldest son, who subsequently carried on the business, in 1874 bought the premises for £25,000, and applied to the trustees, after paying £13,000 of the price, for a loan of £12,000 to meet the balance, offering as security the premises themselves, on which he had already borrowed £17,000, and other subjects belonging to him. All these subjects were already burdened. The margin of value of the whole subjects, including the business premises,—taking as the gross value in each case the prices paid for them within a year of the loan,—was £12,150. He also offered the security of a policy on his life for £2160, the surrender value of which was less than £500, and his share, viz., one-seventh, of the sum (£10,000) held by the trustees for security of the widow's annuity. In addition he offered the personal security of his father-in-law, engaged in business in Glasgow as a "club draper," who was proprietor of certain subjects in which large quantities of shale were believed to exist. Both he and the offerer were then (1874) in good credit. The offer was accepted, but no communication was made to the other beneficiaries, several of whom were of age. One of them shortly afterwards, on hearing of the loan, protested for himself and the other beneficiaries, but no notice was taken of his letter. In 1884, the debtor and his father-in-law having both become bankrupt, and the prior bondholders having entered into possession, an action was raised by the beneficiaries against the trustees for repayment of the loss sustained by the estate through the transaction.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the trustees were personally liable as having invested on unsubstantial and insufficient security, contrary to the law and practice of trust administration.

Opinion (per Lord Watson) that there is no rule in the law of Scotland that the responsibility of a gratuitous trustee must (apart from any special dispensation by the truster) be tested by reference, not to an average standard, but to the degree of care and prudence which he uses in the management of his own private affairs.

Per Lord Watson—"The power to lend trust money on personal credit may prove very useful to trustees who are in search of a permanent investment, but trustees who make a permanent loan on that footing must, in my opinion, if any loss results from it, justify their action by shewing that no safer investment was open to them."

The defenders appealed.

After hearing counsel for the appellants,—

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is one which, so far as it determines a question of fact, is very satisfactorily supported by the evidence, and if the facts are as his Lordship found them to be, it seems absolutely impossible to controvert the legal conclusion.

Certain family trustees appear to have lent a sum of £12,000 on what they ought to have known to be a very doubtful security. It is quite possible that the trustees were only actuated by an honest desire to do what was best for the whole family, and it may be that they were quite right in endeavouring to aid and assist William Millar to become the purchaser of the property of which they had the disposition; but there was upon them the overwhelming obligation to see that the property which they disposed of to William Millar was paid for.

Now, I am satisfied the trustees were or ought to have been conscious of the fact that William Millar was not in a position to pay for what he had bought; they nevertheless permitted it to be conveyed to him; they allowed him to raise £17,000 upon it, and then lent him £12,000 on the property so previously charged, not in truth as an investment at all, but as a method by which he should in form pay the purchase money of the property they had sold him.

I asked the same question as Lord M'Laren—"Why did not the trustees agree themselves to lend the £17,000 on a first bond, and allow Mr Millar to raise the £12,000 on what he offered as unexceptionable security?" They knew, or Mr Black, their agent, knew on their behalf, that Mr Millar could not have got the £12,000 from any source but the trust, and I have the less difficulty in arriving at the conclusion at which I have arrived when I remember that Mr Black was to the knowledge of the trustees the adviser of Mr William Millar as well as their own. If trustees will permit such a mixture of interests to take place, they have but themselves to thank when such a misfortune as has resulted in this case overtakes them.

I think there is some evidence to shew that the trustees (I daresay from very worthy motives) had placed themselves in the position of champions of the William Millar side of the family, but I am of opinion that the loan was originally a breach of trust. I think it was not made better by the personal security that they took, since I am of opinion that the whole transaction assumes the shape of an accommodation to William Millar to buy the property, and not a bona fide investment of the trust-funds.

Under these circumstances it becomes unnecessary to consider the indemnity clause, since to such a transaction the indemnity clause has no application.

It is to my mind unnecessary to consider under these circumstances the question as to the continuance of the loan in spite of warning and remonstrances. It certainly cannot make better the position of the trustees. I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—My Lords, the testamentary trustees of the late John Millar, merchant in Glasgow, who are represented by the appellants, lent in November 1874 £12,000 of the trust-funds under their charge to William Millar, one of the seven beneficiaries entitled, in equal shares, to the residue of the trust-estate. That sum formed part of the price of a tenement purchased by William Millar from the trustees, which was payable in terms of the contract of sale in May 1874, but he was unable to pay the £12,000, and was allowed to retain it as a loan. In security of the loan he conveyed to the trustees three house properties in Glasgow, including his purchase from the trust, upon each of which there were prior incumbrances to an amount exceeding two-thirds of their estimated values as stated by the borrower. Besides these margins the trustees held the personal obligation of their debtor, whom they must have known to be impecunious, and of his father-in-law, Andrew Walker, who was engaged in trade, and of whose solvency they knew nothing beyond general repute.

Notwithstanding remonstrances by the other beneficiaries interested, the money was suffered to remain on these securities until 1884, when it was discovered that the margins were utterly worthless, and both the personal obligants became bankrupt, the estimated dividend in William Millar's sequestration being 2d. and in Andrew Walker's 5s. 9d. per pound.

It is not disputed that in ordinary circumstances the conduct of these trustees would have been unwarrantable, and that they would have been personally liable to make good to the trust-estate the deficit occasioned by the insufficiency of the securities, but the appellants plead that the combined effect of tw clauses in John Millar's deed of trust is to relieve them of all responsibility fo the loss.

By the first of these clauses his trustees are authorised and empowered, whe they shall consider it necessary or expedient, to realise the trust-estate, and "t lend out the proceeds and other funds of the trust, or such parts thereof as ma not be otherwise required, on such securities, heritable or personal, as they ma think proper." A power to lend on personal security has been held in Scotlan to include lending on personal credit, but it must be kept in view that in re quiring some kind of security to be taken it was the plain object of the truste to preserve intact the capital of the trust-estate for the benefit of the person ultimately entitled to it. It appears to me that the authority to invest, whic he gives for that obvious purpose and no other, cannot be construed as a licence to his trustees to take a worse instead of a better security—that is to say, to accept a bare personal obligation so long as it is possible for them to obtain a pledge of heritable or moveable property. The power to lend trust money on personal credit may prove very useful to trustees who are in search of a permanent investment, but trustees who make a permanent loan on that footing must, in my opinion, if any loss results from it, justify their action by shewing that no safer investment was open to them. It would require very exceptional circumstances to warrant a loan of trust funds, continued for a period of ten years, upon no better security than the personal guarantee of two individuals whose ability to repay was dependent upon the vicissitudes of trade.

By the second of these clauses it is declared that the trustees "shall not be liable for omissions, errors, or neglect of management, nor singuli in solidum, but each shall be liable for his own actual intromissions only." I see no reason to doubt that a clause conceived in these or similar terms will afford a considerable measure of protection to trustees who have bona fide abstained from closely superintending the administration of the trust, or who have committed mere errors of judgment whilst acting with a single eye to the benefit of the trust and of the persons whom it concerns; but it is settled in the law of Scotland that such a clause is ineffectual to protect a trustee against the consequences of culpa lata, or of gross negligence on his part, or of any conduct which is inconsistent with bona fides. I think it is equally clear that the clause will afford no protection to trustees who, from motives however laudable in themselves, act in plain violation of the duty which they owe to the individuals beneficially interested in the funds which they administer. I agree with the opinion expressed by Lords Ivory, Gillies, and Murray in Seton v. Dawson, 4 D. 318, to the effect "that clauses of this kind do not protect against positive breach of duty."

Upon the facts of this case I should be prepared to hold that there was crassa negligentia exhibited by these trustees. The sale to William Millar was effected on terms favourable to the trust, and having regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the purchaser they were not in my opinion to blame for not insisting upon immediate payment of the £12,000, which might have defeated the transaction. But these very circumstances, coupled with the unsatisfactory character of the securities which the purchaser was able to give them, ought to have warned men of ordinary prudence of the necessity of obtaining payment of the money within a limited time, and of placing it on a proper trust investment. I am content, however, to rest my judgment upon the same view of the facts which was adopted by the Lord Ordinary and by the Second Division of the Court. I do not think it necessary to enter into details of the evidence, which has satisfied me that throughout the unfortunate transaction these trustees lost sight of the primary duty which they owed to the beneficiaries interested, and were mainly actuated by a desire to accommodate William Millar, the borrower of the money.

There were two points raised in the argument for the appellants which appear to me to deserve notice. It was seriously argued that, according to the law of Scotland, the responsibility of a gratuitous trustee must (apart from any special dispensation by the truster) be tested by reference, not to an average standard, but to the degree of care and prudence which he uses in the management of his own private affairs. The rule, which is quite new to me, would be highly inconvenient in practice. In every case where neglect of duty is imputed to a body of trustees it would necessitate an exhaustive inquiry into the private transactions of each individual member, the interest of the trustee being to shew that he was a stupid fellow, careless in money matters, and that of his opponents to prove that he was a man of superior intelligence and exceptional shrewdness. The learned counsel were unable to cite any case in which such a rule has been applied, but it was said to rest upon the high authority of Lord Stair. We were referred to a passage in that title of the Institutes which treats of mandates (i. 12, 10), where the rule is so laid down. But the passage thus relied on appears to me to have reference to special and not to general mandates. The learned author carefully distinguishes between these two classes (i. 12, 15), mandates being defined by him as special or determinate "when both matter and manner are special," and as general or indeterminate "when the matter is special but the manner is not specified." A testamentary trust to invest on such heritable or personal securities as the trustees may think proper is of the nature of a general or indeterminate mandate, and the rule which Lord Stair twice lays down in reference to that case (i. 12, 9, and 15) is, that the mandator "must necessarily do what is best secundum arbitrium boni viri, and must do the like in all indeterminate mandates."

The other point involves matter of some delicacy. It was urged that the trustees acted bona fide in accordance with the advice of their law-agent, whose evidence was no longer available when this case went to trial. The late Mr Knox, one of the trustees, said in his evidence, "we were entirely guided by him," and another of them, Mr Gavin Miller, on his attention being called to the hazardous nature of the transaction, stated "we were acting on the advice of our law-agent, and we considered we were perfectly safe." The agent upon whom they thus relied was not only acting for the trust, but on behalf of William Millar, their borrower, and the fact of his double agency was well known to the trustees. I have always held that in the conduct of his own affairs a man may, if he chooses, trust to the advice of an agent in that position, and if anything goes wrong sibi imputet, but I am very clearly of opinion that no one clothed with a fiduciary character is justified in perilling the interest of the cestuis que trust upon such partial advice. I have not found it necessary to take the circumstance into account in deciding the present case; had it been necessary to do so, any inference which I could have derived from it would have been unfavourable to the appellants.

I concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

Lord Fitzgerald.—My Lords, I concur in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary adopted by the Second Division of the Court o Session should now be affirmed, for the reasons given both by the Lorc Ordinary and in the Court of Session. In the very able and elaborate judgment of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson) there are som additional propositions on which I do not find it necessary to express an opinion.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, I quite agree. Notwithstanding the able argument of Mr Rigby and Mr Dickson I cannot say that I have felt any doubt as to the propriety of the interlocutors under appeal.

Any system of trusts which did not require trustees to act with perfect impartiality as between their cestuis que trust, and to bring to the management of trust affairs the same care and diligence which a man of ordinary prudence may be expected to use in his own concerns, would be illusory and mischievous. Tried by this standard the conduct of the defenders falls far short of what is required by law and common sense. The transaction which has led to the loss stands condemned, whether it be regarded as a sale of trust property, or as an investment of trust funds, or as a combination of both. No man of ordinary prudence would, I think, have sold his own property on the terms upon which the defenders disposed of the property committed to their charge. The property seems to have been readily saleable at the time, yet the trustees were satisfied to part with the legal dominion over it for about half its value in cash, taking for the balance a parcel of securities of the most shadowy and unsubstantial character. No man of ordinary prudence would have thought of investing £12,000 of his own on these so-called securities. No man of ordinary prudence would have entered into the arrangement regarding it as a whole unless his first object had been to assist Mr William Millar and help him to become owner of his business premises.

It was said that the price was a very high one, and that it was greatly to the advantage of the trust-estate that the transaction should be carried through even at some risk. There is no evidence that the sum which Mr William Millar offered was more than might have been got in the open market. But assuming that the price was high, and that it was most important to secure it, that did not justify the trustees in parting with the substance in a great measure for a mere shadow. If the trustees were really desirous of carrying the transaction through for the benefit of the trust-estate, one would certainly have expected to find that they would have required payment by instalments, or at least have insisted on Mr William Millar reducing his debt while his affairs still continued prosperous.

It is impossible, I think, not to see that the trustees did unduly favour Mr William Millar. They seem to have been led aside from the strict path of duty by two things. They appear to have thought, rightly or wrongly, that the second family were trying to put an unfair pressure on Mr William Millar, and so they paid no attention to remonstrances in themselves reasonable, and they allowed their judgment to be guided or warped by the opinion of a gentleman who was acting, or professing to act, as their law-agent, but who was also to their knowledge the law-agent of Mr William Millar, and whom therefore they ought not to have consulted on this question.

On the whole I have no hesitation in agreeing with the Lord Ordinary and the Second Division of the Court of Session that the £12,000 was lent to Mr

William Millar upon unsubstantial and insufficient security, contrary to the law and practice of trust administration.

Westminster Fire Office v. Glasgow Provident Investment Society.

WESTMINSTER FIRE OFFICE, (Defenders) Appellants.—Finlay, Q.C.—Wood Hill.

GLASGOW PROVIDENT INVESTMENT SOCIETY, (Pursuers) Respondents.—Rigby, Q.C.—J. G. Barnes, Q.C.

Fire insurance—Insurable interest—Right of postponed bondholder to recover insurance when prior bondholder has recovered sum sufficient to reinstate.—The proprietor of mills (which with the site were at least of the value of £10,000) granted bonds over them for £9000, and subsequently a postponed bond to another creditor for £900. Policies of fire insurance for £7000 were taken in name of the prior bondholders for behoof of themselves and of the owner in reversion. The postponed bondholder, an investment society, took a policy of fire insurance from another company for £900 in name of the society and of the owner "in reversion." The policy insured against damage by fire "the property described on the margin hereof." On the margin were set forth various items forming parts of the mills and machinery, with the specific sum insured on each. The owner paid the premiums of insurance.

A fire occurred, which damaged the mills and stopped the works. The holders of the prior bonds obtained under their policies of insurance the sum of £5668, which was sufficient to reinstate the works, but they applied it in reduction of their debt.

Subsequently the investment society raised an action, with consent and concurrence of the owner, against their insurers for declarator that the pursuers were entitled to be indemnified by the defenders against the loss they had sustained by the fire, and for payment. The defenders denied liability, on the ground that the loss caused by the fire had already been made good to the prior bondholders and the owner. It was admitted that at the date of the fire the subjects were of sufficient value to cover all the bonds, and that after the fire the subjects were not of sufficient value to meet the prior bonds.

Held (aff. judgment of whole Court) that the defenders were bound under their contract to indemnify the investment society for the loss it had sustained by the fire.

Question, whether the Act 14 Geo. III. cap. 78, applies to Scotland.

Opinion (per Lord Watson) that it does not.

(IN the Court of Session, 12th July 1887, 14 R. 947.)

Ld. Chancellor (Halsbury).
Lord Watson.

The defenders appealed.

The parties agreed to accept the judgment of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Watson.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, this action was founded on a contract contained in a policy of fire insurance, dated 10th October 1881. One of the terms of that contract was that if the property or any part thereof should be destroyed or damaged by fire the appellants agreed that they would make good the loss to an amount not exceeding £900. The owners of the property insured were Messrs Hay, grain millers of Glasgow. The respondents held heritable securities on the property to an extent not exceeding £900. Other contracts of insurance had been made by other creditors of Messrs Hay, the proprietors of the mills. These other creditors also held heritable securities prior to those of the present respondents.

By the joint minute of admission it was agreed between the parties that immediately before the date of the fire the value of the subjects insured was sufficient to cover both the prior bonds and that of the respondents. As a consequence of the fire the value of the buildings is now so reduced that the respondents' bond is entirely uncovered. It appears to me beyond doubt that by the contract of indemnity into which the appellants entered with the respondents the contingency has arisen against which the appellants contracted to indemnify the respondents.

It is difficult to state the argument on the other side, since it seems to me to be founded partly upon an error of law and partly upon a suggestion of fact which seeks to get behind the admission by which the parties are concluded. The error of law, I think, is in the suggestion that a creditor has not an insurable interest in the property of his debtor, upon which property the debtor has given him a heritable security. I should have thought it was too well settled a proposition in insurance law to be susceptible of argument that a creditor under these circumstances is entitled to insure. The error in fact appears to be founded upon the suggestion, more implied than expressed, that more was insured upon the subjects of insurance than their value justified, since, if the property before the fire was good security for the value of the bonds, and is now only good as represented by the insurance paid in respect of it to satisfy the bonds prior to that of the respondents', it is difficult to see that when all these contracts were made, the subject being sufficient to satisfy them, and the fire alone having made the difference, yet the respondents are not to be indemnified to the extent of their loss. I am wholly unable to understand how other contracts made with other people can affect the question, once it is conceded that the property as it originally stood was sufficiently valuable to meet the demands of all. But it is said that, apart from the sums of money received by the prior creditors, and by which they have extinguished the debt which gave them an insurable interest in the premises, they might—or some of them might—have insisted on the reinstatement of the premises. It seems to me that such a proposition would be as reasonable an answer to the respondents' demand as to suggest that if the premises had not been burned down there would have been no loss, and I agree that if the premises had been reinstated there would have been no loss, but as a fact they were not, and, apart from the argument derived from the Statute 14 Geo. III. cap. 78, section 83, that the respondents had no control over the question whether the premises should be reinstated or not, and no terms in the contract to which they were parties gave them an option whether the premises should or should not be reinstated. With respect to that statute I will only say that no such question is suggested upon the record, and inasmuch as there are some questions of fact which would have to be determined before one could affirm the application of that statute, I decline to consider it.

As to the rent, I am of opinion that there was no loss in respect of it. The £120 awarded by the Inner-House in respect of the rent seems to me not to be maintainable—Messrs Hay themselves occupied the premises. This was an occupation to which the respondents could not under the circumstances have been entitled, and the loss, if it can be called a loss, to the actual occupiers has been paid for to the persons entitled to it. It is not a loss to the respondents, who never had it, and could not be entitled to it. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment must be reduced by the sum of £120. It does not appear to me that that alteration of the amount substantially affects the question as to who has been successful in the litigation, and I therefore think that the appellants ought to pay the costs both here and below, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

My Lords, I am not entitled to read to the House as a judgment the opinion of the noble and learned Earl (the Earl of Selborne) who was present during the argument in this case, but as a part of my opinion I am entitled to read it to your Lordships, and I propose to do so. What follows is that which the learned and noble Earl would have said if he had been here.

EARL OF SELBORNE.

"The questions to be decided on this appeal are two—First, whether the respondents are entitled to recover at all against the appellants? and secondly, whether they are entitled to recover for loss of rent? If the respondents have suffered any loss by the destruction of the insured buildings which were destroyed by fire, it follows necessarily that they are entitled to recover to the extent of that loss in this action. If they have suffered no such loss they are of course not entitled to any indemnity. The case therefore of the appellants upon the first question depends upon the contention (difficult in the face of the admissions upon the record) that the respondents have suffered no such loss.

"The respondents were insured in the appellants' office for £900 by a policy dated in 1881, on which the premiums were duly paid. The subjects insured against fire consisted of the Greenhead grain mills and machinery (at Glasgow), belonging to Messrs Hay Brothers, who had given the respondents a heritable security by bond on those premises for the sum of £1000, of which £917, 11s. 6d. remained due when the fire occurred. The amount of that insurance was apportioned over different parts of the subjects insured, of which the barley mill and counting-house were damaged to the full amount at which they were insured, viz., £190, and damage, estimated at £40, was also done to parts of the machinery insured to a greater amount. Under the judgment of the Inner-House now appealed from the respondents have recovered these two sums (making together £230), and also £120 for one year's rent of the barley mill and counting-house—in all £350.

"There were prior securities also given by Messrs Hay Brothers to other creditors upon the same premises, and those other creditors had insured in other offices. All the securities, including that of the respondents', covered the ground or site on which the mills stood, which (being a subject indestructible by fire) was not insured either by the respondents or by the prior incumbrancers.

"It was admitted between the parties that 'immediately before the date of the fire the value of the site, buildings, and machinery of Greenhead grain mills was sufficient to cover not only the prior bonds, but also the pursuers' bond.' The interest therefore of the respondents at the time of the fire was more than equal to the amount which they have recovered in this action. It was also admitted that 'the value of the site of the mills, and the salvage thereon of buildings and machinery after the fire, was not sufficient to meet the bonds prior to that of the pursuers'.' The pursuers therefore have actually lost by the fire the whole amount of that interest in respect of which they were insured, and they have prima facie a clear right to the extent to which that loss is covered by their contract with the appellants so to be indemnified. I reject (as in my judgment fallacious) the argument that part of the loss ought to be ascribed to depreciation in value of the site or ground on which the barley mill and counting-house stood, or of other parts of the site of the mill premises. The site remains at whatever may have been its value apart from and independent of the buildings which stood upon it. Any greater value which it had when the buildings which have been destroyed stood upon it was entirely due to those buildings, and as they were insured and have been destroyed by fire the contract of indemnity covers in my opinion the whole of that difference, less salvage only.

"What, then, is the ground on which the respondents' claim to indemnity is now resisted? Simply this, that the prior incumbrancers have recovered from and have been paid by the other offices in which they were insured (under contracts to which neither the appellants nor the respondents were parties or privies) £5500, being (subject to certain reserved questions affecting a sum of £168, 16s. 8d., with which the respondents are in no way concerned) the amount which had been awarded by the witness Mr Kinniell (oversman in a reference between the prior bondholders and those offices) as sufficient for the reinstatement of the premises. But the premises were not in fact reinstated. The whole amount so awarded went into the pockets of the prior incumbrancers. If it had been applied in reinstating the premises the respondents would no doubt have had the benefit of the reinstatement, and the appellants might then have been entitled to say that they had suffered no loss. But it was not so applied, and the respondents derived no actual benefit from the payment to the prior incumbrancers, because although the debt due to those incumbrancers was (so far) reduced, the balance still remaining due to them was more than sufficient to exhaust the whole remaining value of the property included in their securities.

"It is, nevertheless, insisted that the payment so made, by strangers to the contract on which this action was brought, to other strangers with whom the respondents had nothing to do was, not as between those parties only, but also as against the present respondents, the full and absolute measure of the respondents' interest, and of the whole loss for which any number of insurance companies could possibly be answerable by way of indemnity to any number of persons, under any contracts whatever, in respect of this fire; and that, this having been paid to the prior incumbrancers, and having been insufficient (by more than the amount now in question) to discharge their debt, the whole interest of the respondents in the subject-matter of the action was thereby extinguished. Why should this be so? As between themselves and the prior incumbrancers it was the right of the other insurance companies to satisfy their contracts of indemnity by reinstating the premises which the fire had destroyed, or (which amounts to the same thing) to pay those prior incumbrancers the amount necessary and sufficient for that purpose. This they have done. The claims of the prior incumbrancers on their insurances were in that way satisfied, and it is in my judgment immaterial, as between the present parties, that they might have been entitled under their securities to receive and retain more, if more had been recoverable under their policies. But if the amount of the actual loss by the fire, with which alone the respondents are concerned (as the premises have not been reinstated, and the appellants have not offered to reinstate them), is greater than the amount which would have been sufficient to reinstate them, and which the prior incumbrancers have accepted, why should this latter amount be treated as the measure of the loss as between these parties? Nothing less than some statutory or other binding authority could establish in the appellants' favour a false and arbitrary measure of the actual loss. No such authority applicable in these circumstances, and as between these parties, was cited to your Lordships. The sum necessary to reinstate is one thing; the loss if there be no reinstatement (which is the present case) is another. On this point the evidence of the witnesses Livingstone and Thomson is demonstrative, and in my judgment conclusive.

"It was further contended that the respondents, under a certain statute (14 Geo. III. cap. 78, sec. 83), might have intervened before the settlement between the other insurance companies and the prior incumbrancers, and might have required the money, which was in fact paid to those prior incumbrancers, to be applied in reinstating the premises. I am by no means sure that they could, assuming (as for this purpose I do assume) that the section of the statute relied upon is operative beyond the Bills of Mortality (see Ex parte Gorely, 4 De G. J. & S. 477), and that the Scottish Courts, in which no similar question has yet been raised, would hold it to be applicable to Scotland. It has not, as far as I know, ever been decided that it applies as between mortgagor and mortgagee, or (which is the same thing in effect) as between prior and puisne incumbrancers. The concluding words of the section are sufficient at least to suggest grave doubts whether it ought to be so applied. But I do not think it necessary for your Lordships to decide that point, because no question upon that statute has been raised in the pleadings between these parties, as (in my judgment) it ought to have been, if anything was to be founded upon it. There is nothing to shew that the respondents knew that they had the right which the statute is supposed to have given them, much less that they were bound, as between themselves and the appellants, to put it in force. It is not even shewn that they knew what other insurances there were, or that they could practically have intervened before the settlement between the other insurance companies and the prior incumbrancers was completed. Certainly it does not appear that they were ever called upon by the appellants to exercise that supposed right; and if they were not, the appellants ought not, in my opinion, to be heard to complain that it was not done. So far therefore as my judgment is concerned, nothing turns in this case upon the Statute 14 Geo. III. cap. 78.

"The question of rent remains; and as to this I think the respondents fail, and that the sum awarded to them by the Inner-House ought to be reduced by £120. The mills were in fact occupied by the mortgagors Messrs Hay, and not by any tenant paying rent. Taking the £120 as representing one year's value of their occupation to Messrs Hay (who were joint insurers), the occupation rent could only be lost to the persons entitled to receive it; and when paid to or settled with them it could not be lost over again to any other person. The rent of the barley mill and counting-house was included in the securities of the prior incumbrancers; it was also insured by them; they, according to their priority, and not the respondents who stood behind them, were entitled, if they thought fit, to claim it, or the insurance money payable for its loss. In the settlement between them and the offices in which they were insured they actually did so, and it was allowed to them for eight months, the period which the oversman thought it would have taken to restore the property and to put the mill in full working order. This could only be on the principle of treating them as, through their mortgagors, virtually in possession or in receipt of rents and profits; the mortgagors, as joint insurers, were parties to that settlement. I am unable to see how, consistently with this, there could be another actual loss of the same rent for those four months of the year during which it was treated as not lost to those prior incumbrancers. I think, therefore, that the amount recovered in the action ought to be reduced to £230.

"I do not, however, think that the determination of this point in the appellants' favour ought to make any difference as to costs. Considering the position c the parties, and the nature of the larger question raised by the appeal, my opinio is that all the costs, here and below, ought to be paid by the appellants."

Lord Watson.—I have had the opportunity of considering a print of th opinion of the noble and learned Earl (the Earl of Selborne), and I concur in i The reasoning of the learned Judges who constituted the minority of the Cour of Session depends upon two propositions, which are in my opinion equall fallacious. One of these is that separate fire policies covering the same subjects effected without privity by independent incumbrancers, for the protection o their several interests, must all be treated as if they had been effected by th owner of the subjects, if he is made a party to each policy in respect of his righ of reversion only, and undertakes to pay the premiums of insurance. The othe is, that payment to a first incumbrancer of a sum which does not represent the difference between the insurable value of the subjects and their value after deterioration by fire, but is sufficient to reinstate them, must necessarily be regarded as full indemnity to a postponed incumbrancer in any question with his own insurers, although the sum so paid is pocketed by the insured and is not expended on reinstatement.

The Act 14 Geo. III., cap. 78, sec. 83, was not pleaded in the Court below, and it is not referred to in the appellants' case, although it was founded on in the argument addressed to your Lordships. Having regard to the preamble of the statute, and to the general scope of its provisions, it humbly appears to me that if a question were to arise as to its applicability within the realm of England, beyond the Bills of Mortality, the decision in Ex parte Gorely, Nov. 10, 1864, 4 De G. J. & S. 477, would require to be carefully considered. In my opinion the Act was not intended by the Legislature to have any application to Scotland. It was passed in order to amend previous legislation which had no reference to that country, and the whole tenor of its enactments, and the remedies which these provide, appear to me to indicate that they were not meant to be administered by Scottish Courts.

I am also of opinion that the respondents have failed to shew that they had an insurable interest in the rent of the subjects embraced in their security, but I agree with the Lord Chancellor that their failure upon that subordinate point ought not to prejudice their right to the costs of this appeal.

The House affirmed the judgment appealed against, with a variation deducting the amount given for the alleged loss of rent, the respondents not having an insurable interest in rent for which an allowance had already been made to prior bondholders: Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie.

Magistrates of Glasgow, (Pursuers) Appellants.—
Att.-Gen. Sir R. E. Webster—Balfour Brown, Q.C.

Minerals—Clay—Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 17), sec. 18—Railway Clauses Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33).—Held (diss. Lord Herschell, rev. judgment of First Division) that the provision of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 18, excluding from conveyances of lands purchased under the Act (when not expressly included) "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased" did not apply to a seam of clay forming the subsoil of the lands conveyed.

The Lord Chancellor holding that the word "minerals" fell to be construed in accordance with the ordinary use of the word in dealing with proprietary rights in Scotland, and did not include clay.

Lord Watson holding that the "land purchased" included the soil and subsoil, and that the exceptional depth of the subsoil (even if mineral) was no reason for bringing it within the category of excepted minerals.

Lord Macnaghten holding that the exception was limited to mines in the proper and usual sense of underground workings, and to minerals in such mines.

Lord Herschell was of opinion that the word "mines" was not limited to underground workings or to minerals that could be won only by such operations, and that the word "minerals," as used in the exception, must be taken to mean all such non-vegetable substances lying together in seams or strata as are commonly worked for profit, and to include clay.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I cannot conceal from myself the importance and the difficulty of the question involved in this case. The consequences flowing from a decision either way seem to me to be very grave, and I desire therefore to say at the outset that I wish to decide nothing but what is necessarily involved in the particular case now before your Lordships. That question may be very summarily stated to be whether clay is included in the reservation of mines and minerals under the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847.

I cannot help thinking that the true test of what are mines and minerals in a grant was suggested by Lord Justice James in the case of Hext v. Gill (July 22, 1872, L. R., 7 Ch. App. 699), which I shall have occasion hereafter to refer to, and although the Lord Justice held himself bound by authority, so that he yielded to the technical sense which had been attributed to those words, I still think (to use his language) "that a grant of mines and minerals is a question of fact—what these words meant in the vernacular of the mining world, the commercial world, and land-owners," at the time when they were used in the instrument it is necessary to consider.

I will not at present say how far I think we are bound by authority, because I desire to keep myself entirely free if the question should arise in this House with respect to any other statute or with respect to any grant not controlled by the statute in question in which the words "mines" and "minerals" occur.

It may be that I am influenced by the considerations to which Vice-Chancellor Wickens referred (L. R., 7 Ch. App. 705) when he said that "some inclination may be thought to have arisen on the part of Judges to give more weight than ought to have been attributed to some small circumstances of context in order to cut down the proper and ordinary meaning of the words 'mines and minerals.'" I think no one can doubt that if a man had purchased a site for his house with a reservation of mines and minerals neither he nor anybody else would imagine that the vendor had reserved the stratum of clay upon which his house was built under the reservation of mines and minerals.

There is no doubt that more accurate scientific investigation of the substances of the earth and different modes of extracting them have contributed to render the sense of the word "minerals" less certain than when it was originally used in relation to mining operations. I should think that there could be no doubt that the word "minerals" in old times meant the substances got by mining, and I think mining in old times meant subterranean excavation. I doubt whether in the present state of the authorities it is accurate to say that in every deed or in every statute the word "minerals" has acquired a meaning of its own independently of any question as to the manner in which the minerals themselves are gotten.

Lord Justice Mellish, in the case to which I have already referred, sums up the authorities by saying (L. R., 7 Ch. App. 712) that the word "mines" (to use his Lordship's language) combined with the more general word "minerals" "does not restrict the meaning of the word 'minerals,'" and he says that the result of the authorities appears to be "that a reservation of 'minerals' includes every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit unless there is something in the context, or in the nature of the transaction to induce the Court to give it a more limited meaning." I cannot myself assent to such a definition. In the first place, it introduces as one element the circumstance that the substance can be got at a profit. It is obvious that if that is an essential part of the definition the question whether a particular substance is or is not a mineral may depend on the state of the market, and it may be that a mineral one year is not a mineral the next.

If, on the other hand, one is to have recourse to etymology or science, and to disregard the mode of working as reflecting any light on the nature of the substance, it is obvious to inquire whether coal is a mineral. Its vegetable origin would to some minds exclude its being regarded as a mineral, while the substance kaolin was held by Vice-Chancellor Wickens (L. R., 7 Ch. App. 705) to be a mineral. "According to the evidence kaolin or china clay is a metalliferous mineral, perfectly distinguishable from and much more valuable than ordinary agricultural earth, and which produces metal in a larger proportion to its bulk as compared with ordinary ores, but which it is not commercially profitable to work in England for the purpose of extracting the metal from it."

The difficulty of dealing with this case is not diminished but rather increased by the state of the authorities upon the question. In Bennett v. The Great Western Railway Company, March 18, 1867, L. R., 2 H. L. 27, all that was decided in this House was that the common law principle which would have prevented an owner who had sold his surface land to a railway company from defeating his grant by withdrawing support from the surface land so used, did not apply to a state of things created by the statute in which the statute itself creates the distinction between the surface-owner and the mine-owner, and gives power to the mine-owner to work his minerals unless the railway company purchases or gives compensation to the mine-owner for leaving his mines unworked. In that case it was admitted that the word "minerals" was properly applicable to the substances to be worked, and the only question was the application of the common law principle to which I have adverted. But the Legislature must have meant something when it recognises and acts upon the distinction which as matter of business and understanding in the mining and commercial world I think everyone must be familiar with.

It appears to me that the effect of some of the decisions, pushed to their logical consequences, would be altogether to efface the distinction which all the statutes recognise. One might summarise these decisions and say a mineral need not be metallic, it need not be subjacent, it need not be worked by a mine, it need not be in any one particular distinguished from any part of the substance of the earth, using the word "earth" as applicable to this habitable globe. Even the word "inorganic" must be rejected if applied to some of the substances which form part of the earth. The bones of extinct animals are limestone, and, as curiosities for research and scientific inquiry, would find a ready market and would therefore come within that part of the definition which requires that they should be capable of being profitably worked. Are they minerals?

I find myself called upon to construe these words with reference to the known usage of the language employed in distinguishing proprietary rights in Scotland, and having relation to Scotch land and Scotch mines or minerals. I am not insensible to the observation that this is only one of a group of statutes which may be supposed to have had the same object, and might be therefore assumed to use the same phraseology in the same sense. Still, I am construing the application of general words to a purchase made in Scotland under the statutes, and if there be any difference in the law of Scotland from that of England the Legislature must be supposed to have been familiar with it, and to have legislated accordingly.

Now, the case is stated by the Lord Ordinary thus,—"Here the thing which the defender claims to work is the common clay which constitutes the subsoil of the greater part of the land of this country, which never can in any locality be wrought by underground working, but under all circumstances is only to be won by tearing up and destroying the surface over the entire extent of the working. When such a right is claimed against the owner of the surface, I ask myself, Did anyone who wanted to purchase or acquire a clay-field, whether by disposition or reservation, ever bargain for it under the name of a right of working minerals? In the case of a voluntary sale of land, with reservation of minerals, I am satisfied that we should not permit the seller to work the clay to the destruction or injury of the purchaser's estate, because we should hold that the conversion of the estate into a clay-field was not within the fair meaning of the reservation. That being so, I see no reason for concluding that the statutory reservation of minerals means anything different from a reservation of minerals in a private deed. The consequences of the reservation are different, but the thing to be reserved is to my mind essentially the same, being neither more nor less than the right to work such substances and strata as are ordinarily known by the denomination of minerals in contracts between sellers and purchasers or superiors and feuars."

If that is the correct view, and I find myself unable to differ from it, I think the case of Lord Breadalbane v. Menzies (June 10, 1818, F. C., affd. 1822, 1 Sh. Apps. 225) is a binding authority in this House. There the words were, "haill mines and minerals of whatever nature and quality," and were held not to include a vein of stone suitable for building.

I feel it impossible to resist the reasoning of Lord Mure in this case, but I hold myself free if the question should arise in England to consider quite independently of this decision what may be the law as applicable to an English case. I only regret that the test which Lord Justice James suggested, and which I think would have been the true one, and would have satisfied all difficulties, was not adhered to in Hext v. Gill. In that case, as I have pointed out before, the substance which was called china clay was assumed to be metalliferous ore, and it was held that though the lord of the manor had reserved it, he could not work it, because he had not also reserved a right so to work it at the expense of the surface owner. I hesitate very much to adopt the reasoning of that case, notwithstanding the high authority by which it was decided.

I am satisfied with the view so clearly put forward by Lord Mure, and upon the reasoning of that learned Lord's judgment I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed.

LORD WATSON.—The question raised for decision in this appeal, which is one of general importance, has led to differences of judicial opinion in this House, as well as in the Court of Session. For my own part, I have experienced considerable difficulty in forming an opinion upon it, owing to the very indefinite terms which the Legislature has used to describe the minerals reserved by statute to proprietors whose land is compulsorily purchased for the purposes of railway or water-works undertakings. The present controversy is between a statutory body of water commissioners and a landowner who is now asserting his right to work out a seam of clay within a parcel of ground about twenty-one acres in extent, which they acquired from him under compulsory powers in the year 1871; but the question which your Lordships have to consider would, in my opinion, have been precisely the same if the purchasers had been a railway company.

The Court below disposed of the case without inquiry into the facts, and these must consequently be gathered from the statements made by the parties on record, which are, unfortunately, in some respects conflicting. It appears, however, and it was assumed in the arguments addressed to us, that the seam in dispute is composed of ordinary subsoil clay, such as is generally found throughout the district; that it lies at a depth of not more than two or three feet below the surface of the soil; that it is of considerable but variable thickness, and that it has been wrought open-cast by the respondent in close proximity to the appellants' land, where its extreme thickness has proved to be from twenty to thirty feet. Since their acquisition of the ground the appellants have constructed upon it two reservoirs, each capable of storing nearly four million gallons of water, which have been sunk into and now rest upon the clay.

The 18th section of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847, is identical, mutatis mutandis, with section 77 of the English, and section 70 of the Scotch, Railways Clauses Act of 1845. It enacts that "the undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away, or used in the construction of the water-works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby." The Act of 1847 is a British statute, whereas there is separate railway legislation for England and Ireland on the one hand, and Scotland on the other; but it appears to me clear that the Legislature intended the words "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals" to have the same meaning in all three countries.

In considering whether subsoil clay, such as we have to deal with in the present case, is one of the "other minerals" meant to be excepted, I have been unable to derive much assistance from such authorities as Menzies v. The Earl of Breadalbane (1 Shaw, App. Ca. 225), in which it was held that the reservation by a superior in a feu-contract of the "haill mines and minerals" that might be found within the lands disponed in feu did not give him right to a freestone quarry. Irrespective of other considerations which differentiate that case from the present, there is little analogy between a reservation of minerals coupled with an obligation to support the surface and a reservation not only of minerals but of the right to work them without giving support. Nor have I been able to obtain much light from Hext v. Gill (7 Ch. App. 699) and other English cases referred to in the opinion of Lord Shand, which his Lordship seems to regard as almost decisive of the present question. The only principle which I can extract from these authorities is this, that in construing a reservation of mines or minerals, whether it occur in a private deed or in an Enclosure Act, regard must be had not only to the words employed to describe the things reserved, but to the relative position of the parties interested, and to the substance of the transaction or arrangement which such deed or Act embodies. "Mines" and "minerals" are not definite terms; they are susceptible of limitation or expansion, according to the intention with which they are used. In Menzies v. The Earl of Breadalbane Lord Eldon observed (1 Shaw, App. 228) that the "reservation is not contained in a lease but in a feu; and I take it there is a very great difference as to the principles that are to be applied to the construction of a feu and a lease—it is a question of a very different nature." In Hext v. Gill the controversy, which related to china clay, worked for the purpose of obtaining the felspar which it contained, arose between the lord of the manor and the purchaser of the freehold of a copyhold tenement within the manor, under a contract which excepted "all mines and minerals," and in these circumstances it was sufficiently clear that the copyholder had only right to the surface, and had no right to minerals of any kind.

I need not refer in detail to the provisions of the Water-Works and Railways Clauses Acts which follow and are connected with the sections of these Acts already noticed. The relation which they establish between seller and purchaser in regard to all minerals which may be held to be excepted appears to me to be, as Lord Westbury said in The Great Western Railway Company v. Bennett (2 E. & I. App. 42), clearly defined, useful to the railway company or water-works' undertakers, and at the same time fair and just to the mine-owner. The latter, who is forced to part with the surface of his land and all uses for which it is available, is not compelled to sell his minerals, whilst he is not in a position to ascertain their marketable value or the impediments which might be occasioned to the convenient working of his mineral field by his parting with a strip which intersects it. On the other hand, those who deprive him of a right to a portion of the surface and its uses, by compulsory purchase, enjoy the benefit of subjacent and adjacent support to their works without payment so long as the minerals below or adjoining these works remain undisturbed, but it is upon the condition that if they desire such support to be continued they must make full compensation for value and intersectional damage whenever the minerals required for that purpose are approached in working, and would in due course be wrought out.

It appears to me that the policy of the Acts in excepting certain minerals from conveyances to compulsory takers of land favours a liberal and not a limited construction of the reservation to the seller. The difficulty which I have felt in construing their enactments is due to the fact that they do not deal with "minerals" as something which may be different from and additional to "mines." They do not except mines and minerals, but "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals"—that is to say, they only except minerals which when worked will constitute "mines" within the meaning of section 18 of the Water-Works Act of 1847, and of the corresponding sections of the Railways Clauses Acts. It therefore becomes necessary to consider what meaning ought in these sections to be attributed to the word "mine," and also what are the "other minerals" mines of which are specially excepted? The solution of the second of these queries must necessarily be in a great measure dependent upon the answer to be given to the first.

There is a class of cases in the English books which determine that the word "mine" is according to its primary meaning significant merely of the method of working by which minerals are got; but that is not its only or necessary meaning. Shortly after the passing of the Act 43 Eliz. cap. 2, it was established by a series of decisions, the soundness of which has been often doubted, that occupiers of mines other than coal mines, are exempted from the incidence of the poor-rate. That point being settled beyond recall, the Courts gave a restricted meaning to the word "mine," and decided that in the sense of the Act of Elizabeth it must be taken to be a subterranean excavation. It was accordingly held that persons who worked lead, freestone, limestone, or even clay, by means of a shaft, and underground levels, were not liable to be rated in respect of their occupancy; whilst others who worked the same substances by means of excavations open to the light of day were held to be liable as occupiers of land. I do not suggest that the Courts erred in limiting, so far as they could, the exemption which, for some reason or other, had been established; but I may venture to express a doubt whether any such exemption or distinction with regard to the mode of working would have been recognised if the Act of 1601 had not become law until the year 1847.

I am unable to assent to the appellant's argument that in section 18 of the Water-Works Clauses Act "mines" must be understood in the same sense which it has been held to bear in the Statute of Elizabeth. Such may have been its original meaning, but it appears to me to be beyond question that, for a very long period, that has ceased to be its exclusive meaning, and that the word has been used in ordinary language to signify either the mineral substances which are excavated or mined, or the excavations, whether subterranean or not, from which metallic ores and fossil substances are dug out. It does not occur to me that an open excavation of auriferous quartz would be generally described as a gold quarry; I think most people would naturally call it a gold mine. The whole frame of section 18 indicates, in my opinion, that the Legislature intended it to include minerals got by open working, as well as minerals got by what has been termed mining proper. The clause excepts mines of slate, and also of "other minerals," an expression which must at the least include rock strata of the same homogeneous character, and generally worked, or capable of being worked, by the same methods as slate.

The fact is of sufficient notoriety to be noticed here, that although in the extreme south-west of the island slate is obtained by subterraneous workings, the reverse is the rule in North Wales and in Scotland, where it is quarried. The word "quarry" is no doubt inapplicable to underground excavations; but the word "mine" may, without impropriety, be used to denote some quarries. Dr Johnson defines a quarry to be "a stone mine." In framing section 18 and the corresponding Railway Clauses, the Legislature plainly intended that water-works' undertakers and railway companies should at the time when they take land by compulsion, pay full compensation for, and become at once proprietors of all surface and other strata which are not excepted. To adopt in these clauses the same construction of "mines" which has been followed for the purposes of the English poor-rate would, in my opinion, lead to consequences which the Legislature cannot have contemplated. In that case the extent to which minerals in the lands were sold or excepted at the date of the conveyance would depend upon the mode, underground or open-cast, by which they might be found at some future and far distant time to be workable, or upon the method according to which the landowner might then choose to work them. These factors being indeterminate it would be well nigh impossible at the date of the purchase to arrive at a fair estimate of the compensation payable for it. I cannot conceive that the Legislature in using the expression "mines of slate" meant to distinguish between the different methods of getting it, and to enact that slate, which may never be disturbed, shall be taken and paid for at once, if it would naturally be quarried, but shall not be taken and paid for until it is actually worked, if it would naturally be got by means of an underground level. It was certainly within the contemplation of the Legislature that water or railway works may rest upon excepted minerals, because it is expressly provided that the undertakers or the company are to be entitled to such parts of these minerals as require to be excavated for the purpose of constructing their works. When a railway company or water undertakers excavate in order to obtain a foundation for their works there is no roof to the excepted minerals; and it is difficult to understand how, in these circumstances, they could be got by proper mining.

I am accordingly of opinion that, in these enactments, the word "mines" must be taken to signify all excavations by which the excepted minerals may be legitimately worked and got. If coal, ironstone, or slate crops out at any part of the surface taken for water-works or railways purposes, the undertakers or the company acquire, in my opinion, no right save the right to use that part of the surface—they acquire no right to the minerals themselves except in so far as these are dug out or excavated in order to construct their works. The important question still remains,—What are the minerals referred to, other than coal, ironstone, or slate? My present impression is that "other minerals" must necessarily include all minerals which can reasonably be said to be ejusdem generis with any of those enumerated. Slate being one of them, I do not think it would be possible to exclude freestone or limestone strata. I may add that, so far as I can see, it is possible that there may be some strata which would pass to the compulsory purchaser if they lay on the surface, but may possibly be reserved to the seller if they occur at some depth below it. But I desire to say that, in the view which I take of the present case, it is not necessary to determine any of these points.

The enactments in question describe the excepted mines of minerals as lying under the land compulsorily acquired, and they appear to me to contemplate that the purchasers, as soon as they obtain a conveyance, shall become the owners of "the land." That expression, as it occurs in these enactments, obviously refers to surface, and the question therefore arises, what in ordinary acceptation is understood to be the surface crust of the earth which overlies its mineral strata? It is of course conceded that vegetable mould, which commonly forms a large ingredient of the topmost layer of the crust, is not within the exception; but it is also the fact that in many districts the cultivatable soil is mainly composed of clay, which is a mineral in this sense, that it is an inorganic substance. I have come to the conclusion that the expression "the land" cannot be restricted to vegetable mould or to cultivated clay, but that it naturally includes, and must be held to include the upper soil, including the subsoil, whether it be clay, sand, or gravel; and that the exceptional depth of the subsoil, whilst it may enhance the compensation payable at the time, affords no ground for bringing it within the category of excepted minerals.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session ought to be reversed and that of the Lord Ordinary restored.

Lord Herschell.—I have the misfortune to differ from the rest of your Lordships who heard the arguments in this case. I confess that my mind has wavered much as to the proper conclusion to be arrived at, and I need hardly say that I have the less confidence in my opinion when I find it differs from those which your Lordships entertain.

The point for decision in this case is a simple one, and may be shortly stated, but to my mind it is one of very considerable difficulty. The appellants in 1871 purchased a piece of land from a predecessor in title of the respondent for the purpose of constructing works authorised by the Glasgow Corporation Water-Works Act, 1866, for the sum of £11,000, and have constructed their works upon it. The disposition to the appellants contained a reservation in favour of the sellers of "the whole coal and other minerals in the said lands in terms of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847."

The Act just named, which is incorporated with the appellants' private Act, under which the land was purchased, provides (section 18) "that the undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the water-works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby."

I may observe here that I cannot accede to the view that the present case is to be dealt with as if the "coal and other minerals" had been reserved to the respondent by the operation of the disposition alone without regard to the statutory provision I have quoted. It appears to me that whatever the statute excluded from the purchase was excluded in the present case, and that the issue between the parties depends entirely upon the construction to be put upon the statute in relation to the circumstances before us. Within and under the lands purchased, and the adjoining lands, there is a seam of clay which the respondent had been for some time working in the adjoining lands, and in March 1885 he intimated that he was desirous of working it under the ground acquired by the pursuers, and called upon them to state whether they would avail themselves of their right to prevent his working the seam, by making him compensation therefor in terms of the Water-Works Clauses Act, 1847. Hence the present action, the appellants insisting that the clay was included in their purchase, and that the respondent had no title to it.

In the 4th article of the condescendence, it is alleged that the seam of clay lies at an average depth of only two feet below the surface, and that it can be worked only by open workings, which would destroy or endanger the appellants' works. This is not admitted by the answer, which alleges that the clay in the ground adjoining "has been wrought open-cast, but previous tirring of the surface is not necessary." I understand this to mean that the clay under the appellants' land could be worked otherwise than from the surface. The answer further states that the seam is of great value. No proof was led, the learned Lord Ordinary being of opinion that it was unnecessary to do so. Upon the allegations I have referred to, the question arises, and I think it is the sole question in the case, whether this seam of clay was reserved within the terms "mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals," or whether the whole of it lying under the land conveyed passed by the conveyance.

The real question, then, to be determined is the meaning to be given to the words "mines or other minerals" in construing the Act of 1847. And I doubt whether we are very much assisted by the interpretation which has been put upon the same words appearing in a different collocation or in other instruments or enactments.

Your Lordships were referrd to various English authorities for the purpose of shewing that clay had been held in a case in the Court of Appeal to be within a reservation of minerals, and that in other cases a definition of minerals had been adopted sufficiently wide to include it. On the other hand, reliance was placed upon some Scotch authorities, and notably on Menzies' case in your Lordships' House as establishing that in a contract between superior and vassal a reservation of mines and minerals did not comprise freestone which could only be obtained by quarrying. Lord Mure, whose judgment in the Court below was in favour of the appellants, based his opinion upon the ground that though it might be settled by the English authorities that minerals had the extensive meaning contended for, yet it was settled by the Scotch law that in an ordinary contract of conveyance a more restricted interpretation must be adopted, and that there was no reason for construing differently the statutory reservation in question. It is to be observed, however, that the enactment with which we have to deal is intended to be incorporated with all Water-Works Acts, whether in England or Scotland, and that both the Scotch and English Railways Clauses Acts contain similar provisions. When the object and purview of these various statutes is regarded, it is not to be supposed that the Legislature intended the same or similar enactments in these various statutes to have a different meaning.

What we have to do then is, I think, to look at the purview and intent of the Acts, and to consider what the Legislature meant by the language they have employed. It is impossible to peruse the various provisions of the Act we are considering without seeing that the words "mines" and "minerals" are somewhat loosely used. Before proceeding to the interpretation of them, it may be well to inquire what was the object of the Legislature in reserving the minerals, and not vesting them in the undertakers of the works authorised by the Acts with which the general Act is incorporated.

This object is, I think, clearly stated by the learned Lords who delivered their opinions in the case of Bennet v. The Great Western Railway Company, 2 E. & I. Apps. 27. I think these provisions were inserted for the common advantage of the landowner and the undertakers. He was not to be compelled to sell minerals which were not needed for the purpose of the undertaking, and they were not to be compelled to purchase and pay for minerals which they did not want, which the owner of them might never desire to work, and as to which it would be often difficult to determine beforehand whether their working would be likely to affect the water-works or railway constructed on the surface of the land. I think, then, that we should expect to find reserved all minerals under the land of such a nature as are commonly worked, and which possessed a value independent of the surface.

I propose first to inquire what meaning ought to be attached to the word "minerals," supposing only the words "coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals" had been employed without any mention of "mines." I think that the word "minerals" imports prima facie, and apart from any context, all substances other than the vegetable matters forming the ordinary surface of the ground. In this widest sense clay is unquestionably a mineral. But we have to look to the context to see whether the word is here used in a more limited sense, and if so, what is the limitation to be put upon it. I think the popular use of the word is often narrower, and that when people talk of minerals they frequently use the word in reference to metals or metalliferous ores. But it is impossible to give this restricted meaning to the word in the enactment we are seeking to construe. Coal and slate are specifically mentioned, and the words "other minerals" cannot be confined to metallic substances. Coal, slate, and ironstone are minerals most dissimilar in their character, and I have sought in vain for any mode of restricting the word "minerals" in this section, whether by confining it to things ejusdem generis with those specified or otherwise. There is no common genus within which coal, slate, and ironstone can be comprised except that they are mineral substances of sufficient value to be commonly worked.

But the words which I have hitherto discussed do not, as has been seen, stand alone. The things reserved are "any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals" under the land purchased. It appears to me that this limits the reservation to mines of the substances named, and therefore to "mines" of the "other minerals" included in the general term. What, then, is the interpretation to be put upon the word "mines"? I think the primary idea suggested to the popular mind by the use of the word is an underground working in which minerals are being or have been wrought. It is certainly often used in contrast to "quarry" as indicating an underground working as opposed to one open to the surface. But to limit it in the enactment we are construing to an underground cavity in which minerals are being or have been wrought, would be obviously inadmissible. The enactment was clearly intended to extend to minerals lying underground which had hitherto been undisturbed. Is the true interpretation to be found by limiting the provision to those minerals which are commonly worked by means of underground working? The word "mines" is, I think in a secondary sense, very frequently applied to a place where minerals commonly worked underground are being wrought, though in the particular case the working is from the surface. For example, where iron is got by surface workings they are spoken of as iron mines, and so too with coal which crops out at the surface. No one, I think, ever heard of a coal or iron quarry. On the other hand, the term "slate quarry" is undoubtedly sometimes made use of though the workings are underground. I think it is impossible to obtain any assistance from this use of the word "mines" in construing section 18. It is no doubt exceptional to obtain coal and iron except by underground workings, but this is not so with slate, and the word "mines" is used alike in reference to all these substances.

I thought for some time that the language used must be construed as applying only to those seams or strata of the specified and other minerals which were capable of being wrought by underground workings. It seems to me that there is much to be said for that view, but after reflection I do not feel that it affords a safe basis for decision, nor is it clear that it would assist the appellants. It must be remembered, and I think this has an important bearing on the view adopted by the learned Lord Ordinary, that it is part of the scheme of the statute that the undertakers do not purchase any right to the support of the underlying strata of minerals. No one has doubted that if they refuse to purchase the reserved minerals, whatever is really within the reservation may be got even though the result be to cause a serious subsidence and even dislocation of the surface. In this respect the case differs from an ordinary reservation in a deed unaffected by statutory provisions. In such a case the owner of the reserved minerals can only work such portions of them as can be removed without causing disturbance of the surface, or if he remove more he must provide some substituted means of support. Therefore, when it is suggested that the reservation in question embraces only such mineral seams as are capable of being worked underground, that cannot mean such as are capable of being so worked without disturbing the surface. Once this conclusion is arrived at it is difficult to see any firm basis for a distinction between seams which lie at a considerable depth below the surface, the removal of which would be likely to affect it little, and those which lying near it could not be got without very seriously affecting it. What valid distinction could be drawn between a seam of coal or ironstone a hundred yards beneath the surface and one which came within two feet of it? and if the latter would be within the reservation, how can a seam of clay similarly situated be excluded? I have said that it is not clear that the proposed interpretation of the section would be of any advantage to the appellants, for proof not having been led, I cannot assume that the clay might not be got otherwise than by surface operations, by working on from the adjoining land, though of course its removal would cause subsidence and great disintegration of the surface. I own I have entertained very grave doubts as to the proper conclusion to be arrived at, but I do not see my way to differ from the judgment of the Court below. I think the reservation must be taken to extend to all such bodies of mineral substances lying together in seams, beds, or strata, as are commonly worked for profit, and have a value independent of the surface of the land.

I desire to guard myself against being supposed to decide more than I do. The pursuers in their action seek to interdict the defender altogether from working the clay under their land in any manner whatsoever. All that in my opinion arises for decision is whether they are entitled to do so. I say this because it was contended before us that inasmuch as the statute authorises the use of such part of the minerals as may be necessary for the pursuers' works, and the bed of clay forms the bottom and sides of their reservoir, the defender cannot be entitled to take away this clay. But this point, which is well worthy of consideration, does not appear to me to be raised at the present time. I therefore forbear from expressing any opinion upon it, or (assuming it to be well founded) upon the further question, how much of the clay can be considered as having been used for the purpose of the water-works, and therefore as having become the property of the appellants. I think the interlocutor appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Your Lordships are called upon to determine the meaning of the word "mines" in the 18th section of the Water-Works Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847. That section is the first and the most important section in a group of clauses collected under the heading "With respect to Mines."

Corresponding provisions are to be found in the Railways Clauses Consolidatio Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. The argument before your Lordships proceeded on the ground that so far a the present question is concerned the three Acts must be construed alike, an that in regard to mines under or near lands purchased for the purpose of th undertaking, railways are in precisely the same position as water-works. Th case therefore is one of considerable importance. But the question lies in narrow compass, and must, I think, depend for its solution on an examinatio of the sections in the Water-Works Act which bear upon the subject, with th aid of such light as may be derived from parallel passages in the Railway Acts.

Section 18 of the Water-Works Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847 (corresponding with section 77 of the English Railways Act and section 70 of the Scotch Act) is in the following terms,—"The undertakers shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the water-works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased, and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby."

The exception in favour of the vendor comprehends, it will be observed, mines of all sorts, mines of coal, ironstone, and slate, and mines of other minerals, but nothing else. Taking the words in their ordinary signification and in their grammatical construction, the exception does not extend to minerals other than minerals of which mines are composed. This seems clear from the latter part of the section, where the expression "such mines" refers to and sums up everything covered by the words of description previously used.

On this exception there is engrafted an exception in favour of the undertakers. It is one of very limited extent. But it throws, I think, considerable light on the meaning of the word "mines." It excepts only "such parts" of the mines under the lands purchased "as shall be necessary to be dug and carried away or used in the construction of the water-works."

Now, the meaning of the word "mines" is not, I think, open to doubt. In its primary signification, it means underground excavations or underground workings. From that it has come to mean things found in mines or to be got by mining, with the chamber in which they are contained. When used of unopened mines in connection with a particular mineral, it means little more than veins or seams or strata of that mineral. But however the word may be used when we speak of mines in this country, there is always some reference more or less direct to underground working.

In Darvill v. Roper, May 26, 1855 (3 Drewry's Reps. 294), and again in Bell v. Wilson, March 9, 1865 (2 Drewry and Smale's Reps. 395), Vice-Chancellor Kindersley had to consider the meaning of the term "mines." In the latter case he asks the question "What is a mine?" and he answers it thus,—"I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that a mine and a quarry are not the same. It would perhaps require some labour to define precisely what each is, but we know this, that a mine, properly speaking, is that mode of working for minerals by diving under the earth, and then working horizontally or laterally; whereas a quarry is where the working is sub dio. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind as to the difference between them." The case of Bell v. Wilson was taken to the Court of Appeal. In his judgment on the appeal (1 Ch. 303, 308), Lord Justice Turner asks the same question, and after referring to dictionaries answers it in much the same way. As regards that part of the case he expressed his entire concurrence with the Vice-Chancellor. It was admitted that there is no reported case which throws any doubt on the accuracy of the language used by the Vice-Chancellor in defining or describing a mine. If one wanted a recent authority to confirm the Vice-Chancellor, and to emphasise the ordinary meaning of the word "mines," one could not, I think, do better than turn to the judgment of Mr Justice Kay in the Midland Railway Company v. Haunchwood, March 22, 1882 (20 Ch. Div., p. 552). In describing the case the learned Judge says,—"The subject of litigation in this case is a bed of clay used for making a peculiar kind of brick, and of some value, from the circumstance that it contains a certain amount of iron. There are three or four feet of surface earth above this, except at one point where it crops out, but it is in no sense a mine, being got entirely by open workings."

Dealing, therefore, with section 18 alone there seems to be no reason for giving the word "mines" a strained or unnatural meaning. It has indeed been suggested that the mention of slate tends to shew that the word "mines" is used in a loose way without reference to any particular mode of working, because slate is usually got by open working. But as everybody knows, there are places where slate is worked underground. The Act excepts mines of slate; it is silent as regards slate quarries. The more natural inference would be that slate mines are excepted, and that slate quarries are not, especially as the Railways Clauses Acts make mention of slate quarries in another group of sections. It has also been suggested that the exception in favour of the undertakers points to minerals near the surface, and therefore to minerals which may be got by quarrying. But it seems to me that there is little force in this suggestion. The exception rather tells the other way. In constructing railways and water-works, in deep cuttings, in tunnelling, or in sinking wells, it is at least possible that minerals contained in mines may be met with. On such an event occurring, were it not for the exception, the operations of the undertakers or of the company might be brought to a standstill, and so the Act gives them as included in their purchase such parts of the mines, or in other words, so much of the minerals contained therein as they are obliged to interfere with in the construction of their works. But it gives them nothing more. How strictly railway companies are tied down when their powers are limited by reference to what is necessary is shewn by the decisions on sec. 16 of the English Act as to the diversion of roads and rivers (see The Queen v. Wycombe Railway Company, Jan. 26, 1867, L. R., 2 Q. B. 310; Pugh v. Golden Valley Railway Company, May 31, 1880, 15 Ch. Div. 330). The rights of the undertakers or of the company are limited by the necessity of the case. They are not at liberty to interfere with mines or to use the minerals contained therein merely because it may be a convenience or a saving of expense to do so. If the intention of Parliament had been to reserve to the vendor under the exception of "mines" all minerals of every description however they might be worked, and therefore such things as clay, stone, and gravel, which are ordinary materials for constructing or repairing the works, one would have expected to find the undertakers and the company authorised to use not merely such parts of the mines as might be necessary, but such parts as might be useful or proper for constructing their works, and, on the other hand, required to pay for what might be so used, and to work under the direction or inspection of the mine-owner or his surveyor.

So far there seems to be no difficulty. The difficulty, such as it is, is created by the sections which follow, and which regulate the rights of owners of mineral property (if I may be allowed to use that expression as a neutral term), lying under or near the lands of the undertakers or the company. In these sections we find the expressions "mines or minerals," "such mines," "such mines or minerals," "such minerals, parts of mines," and "mines, measures, or strata," all applied to the mineral property within the scope of the enactment.

Now, the word "minerals" undoubtedly may have a wider meaning than the word "mines." In its widest signification it probably means every inorganic substance forming part of the crust of the earth other than the layer of soil which sustains vegetable life. In some of the reported cases it seems to be laid down or assumed that to be a mineral a thing must be of commercial value or workable at a profit. But it is difficult to see why commercial value should be a test, or why that which is a mineral when commercially valuable should cease to be a mineral when it cannot be worked at a profit. Be that as it may, it has been laid down that the word "minerals," when used in a legal document, or in an Act of Parliament, must be understood in its widest signification unless there be something in the context or in the nature of the case to control its meaning. It has also been held that the use of the word "mines" in conjunction with "minerals" does not of itself limit the meaning of the latter word. At the same time it cannot be disputed that the term "minerals" is not unfrequently used in a narrower sense, and one perhaps etymologically more correct, as denoting the contents or products of mines. Nor indeed are the authorities all one way in preferring the wider meaning of the word "minerals." For example, in Church v. The Inclosure Commissioners, Jan. 31, 1862 (11 C.B., N.S. 664), Mr Justice Williams observed, and apparently the rest of the Court agreed, that minerals in the ordinary sense meant "minerals which could be worked in the ordinary way underground, leaving the surface or crust unaffected."

In dealing with the sections which follow section 18, it is to be observed that their scope is not, like the scope of section 18 and the corresponding sections of the Railway Acts, limited to mineral property lying under the lands purchased and excepted or deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance. These sections have a much wider bearing. They extend to mineral property under the lands of the undertakers or the company, however it may have been severed in ownership from those lands. They also extend to mineral property within the prescribed distance, although the lands under which it lies do not belong to the undertakers or the company. It would therefore not be enough for the respondents to make out that these sections deal with minerals not contained in mines. They must shew that on the fair reading of these sections the word "mines" includes minerals, whether got by mining or not. If that could be established, it would go far towards proving that the word "mines" must have that meaning in section 18 and in the corresponding sections of the Railway Acts.

It may be conceded that in several places in these later sections the word "mines" is used as comprehending whatever is comprehended by the term "minerals" as therein used. But then comes the question, Is the word "minerals" to have its wider signification, and therefore to enlarge the meaning of the word "mines," or is the word "mines" to control the meaning of the word "minerals"? In the absence of an explanatory context or some indication to be gathered from the nature of the case, it has been held that the narrower meaning of the word "minerals" is not to be preferred. Still, it is not a strained or unnatural meaning. You are giving a strained and unnatural meaning to the word "mines" if you make it include minerals not got by mining, and therefore if the question were which of the two words should yield to the other, there could, I think, be no doubt as to the answer. The more flexible word must give way. You must do as little violence as possible to the language you have to construe.

Apart, however, from this argument, it seems to me that if you look at these enactments, carefully comparing one with the other, you will find enough to shew that the minerals spoken of are minerals that are "parts of mines," or minerals that are "contained in mines." I will illustrate my meaning by one or two instances. The sentence in section 78 of the English Act, "if it appear to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway," becomes in the Scotch Act, section 71, "if it appear to the company that the working of such mines either wholly or partially is likely to damage the works of the railway." In the rest of the latter section the two expressions "parts of mines" and "minerals" are used indifferently as convertible terms. The section proceeds as follows,—"And if the company be desirous that such mines or any parts thereof should be left unworked, and if they be willing to make compensation for such mines or minerals, or such parts thereof as they desire to be left unworked, they shall give notice to such owner, lessee, or occupier of such their desire, and shall in such notice specify the parts of the mines . . . which they shall desire to be left unworked, . . . and in such case such owner, lessee, or occupier shall not work or get the mines or minerals comprised in such notice." In the following section (section 72 of the Scotch Act) there is a passage which refers to minerals as being contained in mines, and the context shews that the minerals so referred to are the only minerals in the contemplation of the framers of the Act. The section begins with the following sentence,—"If before the expiration of such thirty days the company do not give notice of their desire to have such mines left unworked, and of their willingness to make such compensation as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such owner, lessee, or occupier" (that is, the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway or any of the works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance) "to work the said mines, or such parts thereof for which the company shall not have agreed to pay compensation up to the limits of the mines and minerals for which they shall have agreed to make compensation in such manner as such owner, lessee, or occupier shall think fit, for the purpose of getting the minerals contained therein." Now, the expression "the minerals contained therein" must mean "the minerals contained in the mines." So the purpose to which the owner of the minerals and the purpose to which the owner of the mines is limited are one and the same, and the purpose of the owner of minerals in working is not to get minerals, using the word in its widest signification, but to get minerals contained in the mines.

I ought, perhaps, to refer to the passage in which the word "minerals" originally occurs in the later sections of the Water-Works Act. It occurs first in section 22, where it is provided that "if the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under or near" the works should be desirous of using the same, he is to give the prescribed notice, and then certain consequences follow. Every subsequent use of the word may be traced to that passage. Now, if the word "minerals" there means minerals whether got by mining or not, the word "mines" is plainly superfluous whatever meaning be given to it. But if the word "minerals" be restricted to minerals contained in mines, I doubt whether either word is superfluous. The risk to be guarded against, as it seems to me, was the loss of support by the withdrawal of minerals from the mines. The minerals might be worked by the owner, lessee, or occupier of the mines. But they might be worked by persons who could not properly be described as owners, lessees, or even as occupiers of the mines. They might be worked by persons having merely a licence to enter and search for minerals, and a grant of the minerals when obtained. The word "minerals" may have been added out of abundant caution to meet such a case as that, and being a less awkward expression for the draftsman's immediate purpose than the expression "parts of mines" which occurs in section 18. At the same time, if the word "minerals" in the sense of "parts of mines" or "minerals contained in mines regarded as separate from the chamber which contains them" be deemed superfluous, I would point out that less care seems to have been given to the framing of these sections than to the framing of section 18. The section and the corresponding sections of the Railway Acts, mutatis mutandis, are word for word the same. In the sections which follow in each of the three Acts there are changes from the language of the other two, and also variations of expression in the same Act in many cases where it is impossible to suggest any difference in meaning. These sections seem to have been taken at random from the different common forms without any attempt at precision or uniformity of language. In such a composition it is not surprising that a superfluous word should be found. It would be singular that in a short clause like section 18 of the Water-Works Act, which exhausts the particular subject dealt with, the leading word should be used in a strained and unfamiliar signification, and that the same peculiarity should be found in all three Acts.

There is no passage in any one of the Acts which requires the wider signification of the word "minerals." On the other hand, the provisions for inspecting mines, both before and during working, and the provisions for the ventilation of the minerals, for making airways and mining communications, all seem to point in the same direction, and to shew that the Acts throughout these clauses are dealing with mines, using the word in its proper and usual signification.

Little or no assistance is to be derived from the rest of the Water-Works Clauses Act. But it may be observed that section 12 authorises the undertakers to dig and break up the soil of the lands which they enter under the powers of their special Act, and "to remove or use all earth, stone, mines, minerals, trees, or other things dug or gotten out of the same." The mention of earth and stone in conjunction with minerals seems to shew that these substances were not considered by the framers of the Act to be necessarily comprehended by the term "minerals."

In considering the Railways Clauses Acts, it is, I think, worth while to refer to the group of sections prefaced by the heading, "With respect to the temporary occupation of lands near the railway during the construction thereof." (Sections 30 to 43 of the English Act, sections 25 to 36 of the Scotch Act.) These sections empower the company, for certain specified purposes to enter upon and use any lands within a distance from the centre of the line not measured by, or necessarily corresponding with, the limits of deviation, and to do so at any time before the expiration of the period limited for the completion of the railway, a period which generally, if not always, extends beyond the duration of the company's powers for the compulsory acquisition of land.

The purposes specified in the Acts include "the purposes of taking earth or soil by side cutting therefrom," and "the purpose of obtaining materials therefrom for the construction or repair of the railway." In exercise of these powers, the company is authorised "to dig and take from out of any such lands any clay, stone, gravel, sand, or other thing that may be found therein useful or proper for constructing the railway." Then comes a proviso, "that no stone or slate quarry, brick-field, or other like place which at the time of the passing of the special Act, shall be commonly worked or used for getting materials therefrom for the purpose of selling or disposing of the same shall be taken or used by the company."

It is clear, therefore, that in certain cases and for certain purposes a railway company may enter upon lands containing brick earth, and use that brick earth, although the lands may not be delineated in the deposited plans, and although the powers of the company to take lands compulsorily may have expired. But while working as temporary occupiers, they are bound (section 41 of the English Act) to work in accordance with the directions of the surveyor or agent of the owner of such lands.

Now, section 42 provides that in all cases where the company enters upon lands for temporary purposes, the owner may "serve a notice in writing on the company requiring them to purchase the said lands." The company thereupon is "bound to purchase the said lands."

Nothing is said about mines or minerals in this section, or in this part of the Act, and as I have already pointed out, there may be cases when the company is not in a position to serve a counter notice, requiring the owner to sell his mines.

Section 43 provides that "where the company shall not be required to purchase such lands" compensation shall be made for their temporary occupation, and that such compensation shall include "the full value of all clay, stone, gravel, sand, and other things taken from such lands."

It seems to follow from the consideration of these sections that where lands taken by the company for temporary purposes are purchased in pursuance of a statutory notice given by the owner, the purchase vests in the company, as part of the property purchased, clay, stone, gravel, sand, and other things of that sort, useful or proper for constructing the railway, although not expressly purchased or expressly named in the conveyance and conveyed thereby, and also that after the purchase the company are free to work as they please, without being subject to the directions of the surveyor or agent of the vendor.

This result, however, seems somewhat incompatible with the view which the respondent takes of the meaning of the term "mines" in section 77. It must be borne in mind that that section is not confined to lands which the company require to purchase for the purpose of their undertaking. It applies to "any land purchased" by the company, and therefore to lands which the owner requires the company to purchase under section 42. If the respondent's view be correct, a railway company which has lawfully entered on lands for the purpose of taking clay or gravel therefrom might find its operations suspended by a notice to purchase those lands. If clay and gravel be comprehended in the term "mines," and if the time for compelling the landowner to sell mines has passed, the company is helpless. Purchase it must. But the purchase prevents it using the lands for the only purpose for which they were wanted, unless indeed you are prepared to do extreme violence to plain language, and to read the provision vesting in the company such parts only of the mines under th lands purchased by them as shall be necessary to be used in the construction o the railway as vesting in them, to an unlimited extent, whatever may be useful or proper for constructing the railway.

It was urged before your Lordships that the enactments dealing with mine were passed for the benefit of persons authorised to construct water-works and railways, that, to use Mr Justice Kay's language, there was "no reason therefor for putting a narrow or restricted construction upon the word 'mines,'" and that consequently the word ought to be held to include minerals of ever description. I am inclined to think that when you make the word "mines" include that "which is in no sense a mine," you do something more than avoid a narrow and restricted construction. And I am not convinced that it is a proper mode of construing an Act of Parliament to strain the language in favour of those for whose benefit the enactment may be supposed to have been passed.

However that may be, it appears to me that the enactments under consideration were not intended to benefit water-works or railways at the expense of those whose lands might be required for the purpose of the undertaking. Indeed, if Lord Cranworth's suggestion in Great Western Railway Company v. Bennett (L. R., 2 E. and I. Apps. 27) be right, the main object of these enactments in their ultimate shape was to prevent the hardships resulting to landowners from the application of common law rights to compulsory purchases. I doubt whether railway companies were special favourites with the Legislature in those days. I should rather have supposed that Parliament considered the division of property and the adjustment of rights effected by these enactments a fair arrangement, and one equally beneficial to both parties. And so it is if the language used has its ordinary and proper signification. Confine the enactment to mines, and nothing can be fairer. Where lands containing mines are taken by a railway company, it would probably be a most serious injury to the vendor to compel him to include his mines in the sale. In most cases he would be selling a long narrow strip of minerals which might form an impassable barrier in the middle of his mines. If the sale were a voluntary sale to an ordinary purchaser it would be a matter of course to reserve the mines. On the other hand, neither railway companies nor persons who construct water-works require mines as such, or are capable of working mines for profit. Mines are only useful to them so far as they may contribute to the support of the lands under which they lie. In many cases they may be worked without interfering with the beneficial enjoyment of the surface.

These considerations, however, do not apply to the case of gravel and clay and things of that sort, which may be termed surface minerals. Remove surface minerals from under the track, and the railway becomes a heap of rubbish. For the very existence of the line it is necessary that they should be left undisturbed. And yet, according to the respondent's argument, a railway company is not to pay for the use they make of surface minerals which do not belong to them. Why? Because the person to whom they do belong does not actually want his property just yet. In the meantime it is more useful to the railway company than it is to the owner. In other words, to put it plainly, a railway company is to have a forced loan of their neighbour's property without consideration—without any corresponding advantage to him, so long as he may be unable to work it or get it worked at a profit. The doctrine involved seems to me somewhat advanced, and I should hesitate to attribute it to the Legislature unless I found it clearly expressed in an Act of Parliament.

Observe how unreasonable the proposition is. The surface minerals must either add to the value of the lands at the time of the purchase or not. If they do not add to the value, why is the railway company paying the full value of the lands not to have the surface minerals? They may be useful for the construction of the line; they are necessary for its existence. On the other hand, if they do add to the value of the lands, why is the landowner not to be paid for them at once, though he may not be able for some time to deal with them profitably when they are separated in ownership from the surface? In the case of surface minerals there is no peculiar hardship in taking a strip of the minerals. If the landowner were selling a strip of his lands to an ordinary purchaser, he would in ordinary course sell the surface minerals too, and so get a better price. When he is made to sell for the benefit of the public, why should he be compelled to sell his property in slices, and to wait for half the price (to take the figures from the present case), until he is in a position to intimidate the railway company? This seems very unreasonable and very unfair to the landowner, who gets nothing by way of compensation if the Act, as interpreted by the respondent, be honestly carried out. But I must say I much doubt whether the Act so interpreted could be carried out honestly. There is no difficulty in valuing lands on the assumption that they contain no mines. But there would, I think, be considerable difficulty in arriving fairly at the value of lands required for a railway, treating them merely as so much surface, not entitled to any right of support, and as separated for the purpose of valuation from such ordinary constituents of the subsoil, as gravel, clay, and stone. If the decision under appeal be upheld, railway companies may, no doubt, protect themselves in future purchases. But I suspect that in many cases of past sales a railway company would be called upon to pay over again for what it has bought and paid for long ago.

It was said that unless the word "mines" be held to include surface minerals, railway companies may be exposed to the risk of having the safety of their works endangered by the removal of clay and gravel and other surface minerals in the immediate proximity of their lands. The answer is that railway companies must judge for themselves what extent of land is required, and take sufficient to ensure the stability of their works against accidents which can readily be foreseen when the nature of the subsoil is known.

I desire to base my judgment on what seems to me to be the plain meaning of the words of the Act, but at the same time it is satisfactory to find that the result is consistent with what may be presumed to have been the intention of Parliament, and not likely to lead to inconvenient consequences.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor under appeal should be reversed.

Bowie v. Marquis of Ailsa.

JAMES BOWIE, (Pursuer) Appellant.
THE MARQUIS OF AILSA, (Defender) Respondent.

Appeal to House of Lords—Petition for leave to appeal in forma pauperis—Public right.—In an action for declarator that the pursuer as a member of the public had right to fish with rod and line in a river on the defender's property the Court of Session assoilzied the defender. In a petition for leave to prosecute an appeal to the House of Lords in forma pauperis, the Appeal Committee refused the petition.

Lord Watson.
Lord Macnaghten.

(IN the Court of Session 18th March 1887, 14 R. 649.)

James Bowie, who was an upholsterer in Glasgow, afterwards residing in Ayr, was apprehended on the night of 11th August 1884 by Robert Armour, water-bailiff to the Marquis of Ailsa, on a charge of poaching in the river Doon. In October following Bowie raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Ayr against the Marquis, calling Armour also as a defender, in which he prayed the Court "to find and declare that the pursuer as a member of the public has an undoubted right and privilege of fishing with single rod and line for trout, flounders, eels, and other fish which are not salmon, sea-trout," &c., "in the river Doon, at least in that part of it within the tidal influence of the sea,"—then followed a prayer for interdict.

The Sheriff (Brand) assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed.

The Second Division, having doubts as to the competency of the action in the Sheriff Court, agreed to allow the action to stand over, to give Bowie an opportunity of bringing an action in the Court of Session.

Bowie then raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for declarator "that the pursuer as a member of the public has right to fish with single rod and line for trout," &c.

The Second Division on 18th March 1887 assoilzied the defender in both actions.

The pursuer presented a petition to the House of Lords for leave to prosecute an appeal in forma pauperis.

The respondent's agent objected on the ground that the appellant was trying a question of public right, and that a committee had been appointed to collect subscriptions to assist Bowie in the litigation.†

The agent for the appellant read affidavits to the effect that the appellant had raised this action for his own protection, and relying on his own resources, in consequence of the criminal process against him by the

† In the Sheriff Court action the pursuer when examined as a witness deponed,—"I gave instructions for carrying on this case, and it is carried on under my responsibility, and I am not aware that any subscriptions have been promised. I should be very glad of subscriptions."

Alexander Mitchell, fishing-tackle maker, in cross-examination deponed,—"I have agreed to subscribe to help to carry on this case. A subscription sheet was drawn up and I put my name to it. The sheet did not specify the sums I and the others who subscribed were to be liable for. Pursuer told me he was going to try this case, and I told him we would assist. I am not sure that I shewed this sheet to the pursuer. I handed the money that had been subscribed to the pursuer's agent. The pursuer knew that there was going to be a subscription. I cannot say if he knew that it had been actually subscribed. . . . The subscribers, so far as I can remember, are, in addition to myself, Mr Hanley, pipe manufacturer, and William Douglas, grocer. Re-examined.—I cannot say how much has been subscribed for this action, it is not much."

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY,

Robertson v. H. M. Advocate.

Alexander Robertson, Petitioner.—Party.
Her Majesty's Advocate.—Lord-Adv. Macdonald—Blair, A.-D.

Procedure—Private Prosecutor—Concurrence of Lord Advocate.—Circumstances in which the Court, while indicating that in very exceptional circumstances they might authorise a private person to prosecute without the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, refused to grant such authority.

High Court.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Craighill.
Ld. M'Laren.
Justiciary Clerk.

This was a bill at the instance of Alexander Robertson, residing in Glasgow, praying for criminal letters to institute a prosecution against Robert Thomson, inspector of police, Glasgow, for perjury. The perjury was alleged to have been committed by Thomson on 11th November 1885 in the Sheriff Small Debt Court, Glasgow, as a witness in a cause at the instance of the complainer against the Magistrates of Glasgow for payment of £12 as damage and solatium on account of the complainer having been unlawfully extruded from the Circuit Court at Glasgow, on 30th August 1885. The bill set forth that Thomson had sworn that he had refused the complainer admittance to the said Circuit Court on account of there being no room therein, whereas there was not (as the bill set forth), during any of the sederunts of the said Court, any pressure or crowd, and particularly when the complainer applied for admittance in order, as he intimated to Thomson, that he might make an application to the Court. The bill further stated that the concurrence of the Lord Advocate had been applied for, and that no reply had been given.

The Court ordered intimation to be made to the Lord Advocate.

At the calling on 28th October the Lord Advocate appeared personally, and stated that he had very carefully considered the case, and had come to the conclusion that it would be oppressive to prosecute or to grant his concurrence to a prosecution. His Lordship then withdrew, and the complainer was heard personally in support of his application.[1]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It is always a matter of regret to this Court, as it must be to everyone, that any of the citizens of this free country should think that he is deprived of redress when he considers that a wrong has been done to him. I have considered very carefully the application which has been made here. It is an application of an unusual kind, although not without precedent, and I am not aware that there is any instance of such an application having been granted since the Revolution. The principle upon which this matter has been considered by the Court and by our most eminent lawyers is simply this,—that criminal procedure in Scotland is conducted by the hand and at the discretion and on the responsibility of the Lord Advocate, whose duty it is to superintend prosecutions of crime, and who has very large powers and very large assistance in the conduct of this important matter. We have, I think fortunately, been under this system during many years—many centuries, I may say—and my impression is, having had some experience of the matter, that on the whole a more efficient and a more satisfactory mode of conducting criminal affairs,—charges of crime against the citizens of this free country,—does not exist in any country in the world. Of course, there are now and then instances where doubts and difficulties are raised, but I think I am right in stating that as the general result of the system. But then it may be asked, "If the Lord Advocate refuses to prosecute, is there any remedy? and if so, what is the remedy?" Now, that question came up in a case seventeen years ago, in which I was one of a very full bench. It was raised by a gentleman of the name of Mackintosh, who presented an application to this High Court for criminal letters against a medical man who, he said, had been instrumental in having him confined in a lunatic asylum. The Lord Advocate did not concur in the prosecution, but we ordered the application to be intimated to him, and he appeared and stated very fully the grounds upon which he proposed not to concur in the prosecution. And then we had to consider and decide, which we did after a very full argument, whether in such a case we could either compel the Lord Advocate to give his concurrence, or permit the private party to prosecute without that concurrence. The conclusion to which we came was this: not that the Lord Advocate is the absolute despot of the case, but that in the ordinary case, unless some very special cause is shewn for our interference, we will not permit a private party to proceed if the Lord Advocate does not give, and states his reasons for refusing to give, his concurrence. I shall just quote one paragraph from the opinion of Lord Ardmillan, a very experienced criminal Judge, which states very simply and very accurately the principle upon which, I think, this Court ought to proceed, and always has proceeded:—"The concourse of the Lord Advocate is not a mere form. I am quite satisfied that the Lord Advocate is not bound to give his concourse in every case to every person applying for it, and desiring to prosecute—not bound to aid the prosecution by every reckless accuser, by every angry or spiteful person. The right and duty of prosecution for crime is, according to the law and constitution of this country, primarily in the hands of the public prosecutor; and a very great trust is necessarily implied in that office and reposed in the Lord Advocate. I think it is according to all our past experience and practice that the giving of the concourse to the public prosecutor is not a matter of form or a matter of course, and the Lord Advocate is not bound to give it when he thinks it his duty to refuse it." In that case we declined to allow Mr Mackintosh to prosecute by himself, and we declined to require the Lord Advocate to concur in the prosecution, although he intimated, as such an officer was sure to do, that if it was the opinion of the Court that he ought to prosecute, he was ready to carry out that opinion. In the present case, I have come to the same conclusion. I do not think there is here at all the kind of case which was reserved in our opinions in the case of Mackintosh. What we had in view there was, that if a case of oppression occurred, or a clear miscarriage of justice, where a party was deprived of his legitimate remedy—there may be such case, although none such has yet appeared in our

Robertson v. H. M. Advocate.

Courts as far as I am aware,—in that case we may allow the party to prosecute himself, or require the Lord Advocate to grant his concurrence. In the case of Mackintosh the wrong complained was a very great and grievous one, and we refused either to allow the party to prosecute alone, or to require the Lord Advocate to concur. The injury to which this application refers is of a slighter kind certainly, but still one of materiality and importance. My opinion here is, as it was in the case of Mackintosh, that no ground—no exceptional ground—has been shewn to entitle this petitioner to the exceptional remedy which he asks for.

Lord Craighill concurred.

Lord M'Laren.—With reference to the requirement of our law that the Lord Advocate should concur in private prosecutions, I venture to ask whether it would be consistent with order or with the true liberty of the subject that any citizen, however high his position, however estimable his character, however ireproachable his conduct, should be liable to be placed in the dock of a criminal Court at the suit of a private individual upon charges which might be frivolous, and the motive of which might be prejudice, ill-feeling, or spite. I say that such a state of things would be intolerable, and I am not aware that there is any civilised country in which the unlimited right of private prosecution exists. In every country of whose laws I have any experience some provision is to be found by which a check is put on the unlimited right of private prosecution. In England the Attorney-General by an entry on the record can always stop a private prosecution which, in his opinion, is frivolous or prejudicial to the public interest. In this country the check is that the preliminary consent of the Lord Advocate must be given. This is a most wholesome check, and one which I am sure this Court would be very sorry in any way to relax. Judging from past experience, the action of the office of the Lord Advocate has been so salutary that private prosecution in this country may be said to have almost ceased to exist. In every case where there was a reasonable ground for prosecution the public authorities, acting under the Lord Advocate, have been found ready to undertake it, and where the authorities were satisfied that there were no sufficient grounds for a prosecution the parties interested, with few exceptions, if any, have acquiesced in the decision. Nevertheless, the right of private prosecution does exist, and one sees that there may be cases in which the public prosecutor may not think fit to undertake the responsibility of directing a prosecution, although he may consider it his duty to give his concurrence to a private prosecution. Apparently this is not a case of that description, because the Lord Advocate has informed the Court that after full consideration he found that there was no prima facie case such as would justify him in giving his concurrence. In such circumstances, without doubting the complainer's sincerity, without doubting that he believes he has some grounds for a prosecution, I should have expected of the petitioner as a reasonable man that he would have acquiesced in the decision of the authority to whom the law has given a certain jurisdiction in this matter. I trust that on reflection he may yet see that it would have been better to have acquiesced in that decision. The complainer, however, has come here, and is entitled to our judgment. All I can say, concurring with your Lordship and Lord Craighill, is that I can see no ground whatever for interfering with the decision of the Lord Advocate in this matter in the only way in which we can interfere, namely, by authorising a prosecution without the Lord Advocate's concurrence. I should be very sorry were a case to arise in which the Court should feel itself obliged to exercise its discretion in that way, and certainly this is not such a case.

WILLIAM WYLIE HOOD, Appellant.—Fleming.
JOHN MALCOLM (Procurator-Fiscal of Dumfries Burgh Court), Respondent.—Young.

Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 49), sec. 59—Proof —Onus.—The Weights and Measures Act, 1878, sec. 59, enacts that where any false weight is found in the possession of any person carrying on trade, such person shall be deemed, for the purposes of the Act, until the contrary is proved, to have such weight for use for trade. Evidence stated by magistrates in a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, which was held (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) not to warrant the magistrates in convicting a trader of a contravention of the above Act, and conviction quashed accordingly.

Per Lord Young—The preliminary necessity is that the magistrate shall be satisfied that the weights were used, or intended to be used, and if the magistrate is satisfied that they were not, or is not satisfied that they were used, or intended to be used, he is not to convict merely because the accused has led no evidence, or has not proved, that they were not used, or intended to be used.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

WILLIAM WYLIE HOOD, grocer, Dumfries, was charged in the Burgh Court there at the instance of the procurator-fiscal on a summary complaint setting forth a contravention of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 49), in so far as upon the 15th July 1887, within his shop in Dumfries, he "did unlawfully use, or have in his possession for use, for trade four weights which were false or unjust."

The accused was convicted, and fined 2s. 6d., with expenses.

He obtained a case. The facts stated by the magistrates were:—"On the date libelled, within the appellant's premises libelled, an inspector of weights and measures and his assistant found and seized four 56lb weights, all of which were deficient in weight. Two of them were deficient to the extent of one ounce each, one of them was deficient to the extent of 3 ounces and 8 drachms, and the fourth was deficient to the extent of 3 ounces. The weights which were deficient were in the appellant's back shop, immediately communicating with the front shop. His weights in the front shop were found correct. It was also proved that there were no scales on which the weights could be used, but that there was a beam from which they could be hung. It was further proved that the weights were rusty, and that the appellant regularly got heavy goods weighed at Messrs Ballantyne & Brown's premises next door.

"The appellant's allegation in defence was that the false weights were not in use, and had not been used by him, but the evidence did not satisfy us that the said allegation was proved."

The question of law was,—"Whether the facts found proved are sufficient in law to warrant a conviction under the charge libelled?"

Argued for the appellant;—There was no evidence, legally sufficient, of the weights being in possession of the accused; at all events, there was no such evidence of any intention on his part to use them.

Argued for the respondent;—The statute by its 59th section * created a presumption which the accused, on whom the onus lay, had failed to rebut. Whatever inferences favourable to him might be drawn from certain of the facts stated in the case, there was no statement that the weights had never been used by him; on the contrary, there was a statement that he had attempted to prove non-use, but failed. These being facts, it was impossible to say that the magistrates were not legally entitled to convict, and if so, this Court had no jurisdiction. It might, no doubt, have been better to libel possession only, not use, but the objection of an alternative charge and a general conviction had not been taken, and was in the present case unsound.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have a very strong feeling that this is a very hard case on the evidence so far as we see. I say nothing about the first alternative, because no question has been raised in regard to it, but I shall assume that the charge here was that of having in the possession of accused false weights intended for use. That is under the statute a sufficient allegation of fact to infer crime; and I shall assume that such was charged. The question is whether there has been shewn any ground for setting the conviction aside, and this we can only find on the case stated; and the case stated shews that these alleged false weights were kept in a back shop, that they were rusty, and that there were not there any ordinary means for using them for the purpose of trade. There was a beam in the back shop to which they might have been attached, but there is no evidence that they ever were used, and it is proved that the heavy goods were weighed at a shop next door. In this state of the facts, and with the addition that the magistrates say they were not satisfied with the evidence adduced for the purpose of shewing that the weights were not intended for use, the magistrates have convicted the appellant. My Lords, I am not altogether satisfied with that. The statute, it is quite true, lays the onus on the accused in the first instance of shewing that weights which are false and are in the possession of the accused were not so possessed with the intention of using them; but I think that onus may be shifted. Here they were not proved to be used. They were not in an ordinary place for use. That is not alleged; and apparently they were not in a state to be used owing to their rustiness. Under these circumstances I should have desired some evidence, if any could be procurable, that they had been used or that the accused intended to use them, and the entire absence of it inclines me to doubt if such was the fact. I have very considerable hesitation, but I think that the evidence here and the grounds on which the magistrates proceeded were slender; and I am disposed to cast the balance in favour of the appellant.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The case is not unattended with difficulty, I own, but I am persuaded that we shall do justice by setting aside this conviction. I rather think too—it is the conclusion at which, on the whole, I arrive—that the magistrates convicted under an erroneous impression of the law, and that is precisely the ground for an appeal on a case stated. I think that upon the case stated it appears that the magistrates were under such an erroneous impression. I think that the true view of the law is that the magi-meaning of this Act, or on the premises of any person, which, whether a building or in the open air, whether open or enclosed, are used for trade within the meaning of this Act, such person shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act, until the contrary is proved, to have such weight, measure, scale, balance, steelyard, or weighing-machine in his possession for use for trade."

strate before he convicts of this statutory offence must be satisfied in point of fact by the evidence laid before him that the false weights found in the shop were used, or were intended to be used—were there for the purpose of use. There may be more or less importance in the provision of the statute that it shall be for the accused party to shew that the weights were not used, and were not intended to be used, but I think the preliminary necessity is that the magistrate shall be satisfied that they were; and that if the magistrate is satisfied that they were not, or is not satisfied that they were used or intended to be used, he is not to convict merely because the accused party has led no evidence, or has not proved, that they were not used or intended to be used. Now, taking the facts as laid before us here in the case, they all go to the conclusion that the weights were not there for use. I think every one of the facts stated, without exception, points in that direction. The weights were rusty, shewing not only no appearance of having been used, but every appearance of not having been used; they were in the back shop, where there were no scales in which they could be used, although it was physically possible that they could be attached to the beam so as to weigh heavy goods, but the heavy goods were regularly weighed elsewhere. These facts point to the conclusion that they were not used, nor intended to be used. And the magistrates do not tell us by any means that they were satisfied of the fact that they were used or intended to be used. They say they convicted because they were not satisfied with the accused party's evidence that the weights had never been used. I think that shews that they proceeded on an erroneous view of the law—the view, namely, that they were bound in law, on a correct view of the statute, to convict, although not satisfied that the weights ever had been used or were intended to be used, if the accused party did not succeed in proving by evidence of his own that they never had. I think that is an erroneous view of the law. It is only put on the accused parties to prove that the weights had not been used in order to meet a prima facie case against them that they had; and it would be monstrous to put any other construction on it, for it would come to this, that even if it appeared on the prosecutor's evidence, clearly and satisfactorily, that the weights had never been used and were not intended to be used—although the prosecutor's evidence led to that result—yet because the statute says so, you are to hold the contrary unless the accused by his evidence shews the opposite. That is the legal error into which I think the magistrates have fallen. It is not for the accused party to lead evidence in order to avoid a conclusion unless there is prima facie evidence for that conclusion, and certainly not if there is prima facie evidence against it; and to say that we must arrive at that conclusion in the teeth of the prosecutor's evidence, because the accused has led no evidence to combat a conclusion which the prosecutor's evidence by itself negatives, is a palpable absurdity. On the whole matter I am inclined to sustain the appeal and set aside the conviction, which I think is tainted by the legal error in the minds of the magistrates to which I have alluded.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am sorry to say that I differ from the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. It appears to me that we are bound to sustain the conviction. The appellant is charged under the Act of 1878 with having false weights and measures in his possession intended for use. It is not disputed that he had four false weights in his possession. The magistrates state some circumstances which were proved at the trial. They say the weights were rusted, that there was no proper scale for them, though they might be used by means of a beam, and that heavy goods belonging to the appellant were regularly weighed on the premises of a neighbour. They further state that the appellant attempted to satisfy them that the false weights were not in use, and had not been used by him, but that he failed in this attempt, from which I should infer that they did not believe the witnesses adduced for the appellant. The only question which they submit to us is whether the facts found proven are sufficient in law to warrant a conviction, or in other words, were the magistrates on that state of the facts legally entitled to convict. If they were legally entitled to convict, the conviction will stand, if not, it must be quashed, but on that ground only. I cannot see how it is possible to hold that they were not legally entitled to convict, for the statute says that the possession of false weights raises a presumption that the trader possessing them intends to use them. I read the statute as meaning that if false weights are proved to be in the possession of a trader, and nothing more, the magistrates are entitled to convict. That is exactly what we have here. False weights were found, and the statute has created a presumption that warrants the magistrates in convicting. It is, therefore, impossible for me to set aside the conviction. The case goes further. The magistrates had before them not only the fact that the weights were false but also the fact that the appellant had attempted but failed to prove that they were not intended for use. How is it possible to say that they were not legally entitled to convict, or that the facts found proven did not warrant a conviction, unless, indeed, we say the magistrates were not entitled to proceed on the statutory presumption? I am therefore of opinion that we should refuse the appeal. I may add that I am bound to take the case as it stands, and to decide the question which it presents and no other. I cannot presume that the magistrates intended to raise a different point for our decision than that which is stated in the case, or to inquire how far they were bound to proceed on the statutory presumption, or in what circumstances they might disregard it.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, reversed the determination of the inferior Judge, and found the appellant entitled to expenses.

Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875. Held that the objection could no be sustained, because the proceedings against him under the new citation we fundamentally null, and therefore liable to suspension.

THOMAS COLLINS, a cattle-dealer, was on 8th August 1887 charged i the River Baillie Police Court, Glasgow, with the crime of assault to th injury of the person, the time of the alleged crime being 7th August, an the place a vessel in the harbour of Glasgow.

Collins pleaded not guilty, and the case was continued till 10th Augus The interlocutor contained a warrant to detain Collins meantime i custody. He was, however, liberated on a pledge of £2, 2s.

On 10th August Collins appeared, but in consequence of the absenc of witnesses the procurator-fiscal was not in a position to proceed to tria He did not ask a warrant to compel the attendance of the absent witnesse and Collins was allowed to go, and his pledge of £2, 2s. was returned t him by the police.

On that date, however, there was made a note in the books of Court "Diet deserted pro loco et tempore." It was also noted that the pledge wa given up. Thereafter Collins was again cited on the old complaint, t appear on 22d August for trial. There appeared in the Police Cour books, under date 15th August, opposite the name of Collins, the word "Re-cite." The citation was made by an officer of Court. Collins did no appear, and on the 22d, the citation having been proved, warrant to apprehend and bring him for trial was granted by the magistrates. The entr in the books of Court at this date was "Absent, citation proved, warran granted to apprehend." He was apprehended, but again liberated on a pledge of £2, 2s., by the police.

On 26th August Collins again appeared, and with him there appeared an agent, who objected to the trial proceeding, on the ground that the original complaint had fallen, and that no proceedings upon it were now competent. The objection was repelled, and the case went to trial. On the evidence the magistrate convicted Collins, and fined him £3, 3s., with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment.

This suspension was then brought. The suspender pleaded that in the circumstances his arrest, trial, and conviction were incompetent and irregular, and that the whole proceedings were inept.

The respondent objected to the competency of the appeal. Argued for him;—The complainer, if he had suffered any injustice, had his remedy by (1) an appeal on a stated case setting forth the facts, and the question of law; or (2) an appeal to the next Circuit under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 154 et seq. Now, the complaint here made was one of deviation from form. It was said that there ought to have been a formal continuation of the diet. If that was the objection it fell to be dealt with under section 131.* And then the statute went on by the next section, 132, to provide that the only appeal was to be by way of appeal to the next Circuit Court at Glasgow. To that mode had since been added that of appeal by stated case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875. But neither of these modes had here been taken, and there was no other. To meet that, it would have to be said, on the other side, that there was a fundamental nullity in the proceedings, but there was none. The new citation needed no special authority from a magistrate, but might be merely served by the police, since the Glasgow Police Act[1] gave warrant to them, "without any other authority than this Act," to cite any person accused of an offence to appear before a Police Court. When the libel in a criminal proceeding is deserted by the prosecutor pro loco et tempore he may raise a new libel exactly the same. Indeed, that is the usual case, the desertion being because of the absence of material witnesses or the like. If then a libel exactly the same might be raised there could be no objection to serving anew exactly the same libel which had been deserted pro loco et tempore.[2]

The suspender was not called on.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have listened to Mr Ure with attention, but not, I confess, without some impatience, because I could not avoid forming the opinion from an early stage of his argument that in the circumstances of this case the objection to competency could not be sustained.

This complaint was presented under a local statute to a magistrate in the River Baillie Court, who granted warrant to cite the complainer in this suspension. He appeared, and on the first occasion, the witnesses not being in attendance, the case was continued till the 10th October, when he again attended. Again no witnesses against him were in attendance, and so completely did those in authority seem to hold that further proceedings were not to be taken, that he had his pledge of £2, 2s. returned to him and went away.

Thereafter he was cited to attend again on the old complaint, which had been deserted pro loco et tempore, and which, according to the formalities which I had understood to be long well settled, was at an end altogether as a judicial proceeding, and incapable of having any further proceedings taken upon it. What was done, however, was apparently to enter the words "continue," "recite" in the books of Court, and then to cite the complainer again on the old complaint.

That citation, I think, was an absolute nullity. According to universal practice a desertion pro loco et tempore puts an end to a libel, but, unlike a desertion simpliciter, leaves the prosecutor able to defend himself against a plea of res judicata and to prosecute again on a new libel for the same offence. That was not done, and the proceedings were therefore illegal.

I think, therefore, that the objection to the suspension, that the remedy ought to have been by way of appeal to Circuit or appeal on a stated case to this Court, ought to be overruled, since a suspension is competent where the proceedings are ex facie without foundation.

Lord Young.—(After concurring with the Lord Justice-Clerk on another ground not necessary to be here reported)—I must say I thought it long settled that when the Court deserts a diet pro loco et tempore it destroys that libel and instance utterly, but leaves the prosecutor at liberty to raise another to the same effect. Accepting that view, it is argued,—"Well, if the prosecutor gets possession of the old complaint and cites again upon it, that is equivalent to raising a new one." Now, that has never yet been attempted. I understand it as an argument, but am little inclined at the end of this year 1887, and in this petty case, to raise or determine the question whether when a diet is deserted pro loco et tempore the prosecutor may do what he has never attempted yet—get hold of the old libel and use it for further proceedings. If I had to consider that question I think I should adhere to the old rule and not interfere with a practice so unbroken and so continuous.

On the whole I think there has been a blunder here, and that no great harm will be done by letting the complainer have the benefit of it and be set free. I think the suspension should be sustained.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The objection to this conviction is that the proceedings are funditus null. If they are so in law, there is no doubt that suspension is a proper remedy. The objection to competency of discussing whether this nullity exists depends on whether the libel is dead so that it could not be revived. Now, the practice has been uniformly to the effect that after a desertion pro loco et tempore it was impossible to proceed on the libel on which an interlocutor deserting the charge pro loco et tempore had been pronounced. No such attempt to revive a libel has ever been made. Therefore I am of opinion that the existing practice should be followed and that this libel must be held to have been altogether dead. I therefore agree that the suspension should be sustained.

The Court repelled the objections to the competency of the suspension, passed the bill, and suspended the conviction and sentence, with modified expenses.

Procedure—Appeal—Bond of caution—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 3, subsec. 1.—In a note to have a Sheriff ordained to state a case for appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, it appeared that the bond of caution required by the Act to be lodged by a party desiring to have a case for appeal stated reached the Sheriff-clerk on the morning after the statutory period of three days had expired (having been posted the evening before), but no special circumstances were stated. The Court declined to ordain the Sheriff to state a case.

Question whether the Court has power in special circumstances to authorise a bond to be received after the lapse of the three days.

High Court.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

On 5th September 1887, Archibald M'Gregor and others, all residing in Paisley, were convicted by the Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie), at Dumbarton, on a summary complaint at the instance of David Rose, fish-watcher, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire, of a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries Acts, 1828 and 1844 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 39, and 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 95), committed on the river Clyde, near Dumbarton. They subsequently craved the Sheriff-substitute to state a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 62), but the Sheriff-substitute refused to do so, on the ground that they had failed to comply with section 3 of the Act, in respect that they had not found caution by lodging a bond within the three days prescribed by that section, the bond having been tendered to the Clerk of Court only on the 9th September.

The appellants then presented a note to the High Court of Justiciary to have the Sheriff-substitute and Rose, the prosecutor in the Sheriff Court, ordained to shew cause why a case should not be stated, which note was appointed to be intimated to the Sheriff-substitute and Rose.

No. 4.

Nov. 3, 1887.
M'Gregor v. Rose.

In the note the appellants gave this account of the circumstances connected with the lodging of the bond of caution:—"The trial of the appellants took place on 5th September 1887, at half-past 11 o'clock A.M. A verbal appeal was made by the appellants' agent at the conclusion of their trial. Following upon said verbal appeal, the appellants' agent, on 8th September 1887, intimated his intention of becoming cautioner for the expenses in connection with the said appeal. A copy of said letter is herewith produced.* On the evening of said 8th September 1887, the Sheriff-clerk dispatched the bond of caution for the appellants' signature, which letter and said bond did not reach the appellants' agent until the morning of the 9th September 1887, when it was duly signed and attested, and forwarded to the Sheriff-clerk."

The appellants therefore submitted that "the bond of caution having been dispatched on the third day after the trial, and not having, as already stated, reached the appellants' agent until the morning of the fourth day, and no undue delay having taken place, the appellants should have a case stated for appeal."

It further appeared from the case that the question to be raised on the merits was whether the Sheriff-substitute was in error in convicting the appellants of fishing for salmon merely on evidence that they were shooting their nets in a way calculated to take salmon, while, as the appellants maintained, they were in fact fishing for herring and other white fish.

The appellants argued that the Court had power in special circumstances to authorise a bond of caution to be received even after the lapse of the three days,[1] and that the circumstances brought the case within that rule.

Counsel for the respondents was not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that this application should be refused. I was rather under the impression that when the appellant had in exceptional circumstances been accidentally prevented from lodging his bond of caution in the hands of the Clerk of Court until the fourth day, we had, notwithstanding the words of the Act of Parliament, allowed the appeal to proceed. It seems that that is not so, but only that after the Sheriff had stated a case, and the appellant had been allowed to open without any objection being taken to the competency of the appeal, we held that he was not to be thrown out on the technical ground that his bond of caution had not been timeously lodged. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion here as to our power to afford a remedy in a case of hardship, when there has been a failure to comply literally with the terms of the Act of Parliament, although there has been a substantial compliance. We must regard any such appeal as an appeal for indulgence, and so regarding it, must look to the nature and character of the case in which the indulgence is sought; and looking to the nature and character of the case here, I can see nothing to support the appeal to our indulgence. I can see nothing which might not be said in any case in which the lodging of the bond of caution was delayed till the fourth day. I think, therefore, that we should refuse the application, but I repeat that on the question whether we have a power in ex-

* In that letter the agent (who lived in Paisley) stated that he "confirmed in writing the verbal appeal," intimated his willingness either to sign a bond of caution, or to consign, and requested that a draft case should be prepared and sent to him. The Sherff-clerk's reply, enclosing a bond of caution for signature, but declining, in the meanwhile, to prepare a draft case, was dated "8th September 1887, 5.30 P.M."

ceptional cases to grant this indulgence I reserve my opinion until a case o hardship arises.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am of the same opinion. I think this question has already been decided by the case of Hutton v. Garland,[1] for I find that the opinion of the Court was that the party has no right to have a case stated unless within three days he either lodges a bond of caution or makes consignation of a sum to meet the expenses of the appeal. The case there was a hard enough one. The trial took place on a Saturday, and the question was whether the Sunday was to be counted as one of the three days. The Court held that the Act was so peremptory that they had no alternative but to include the Sunday, and the result was that the appeal was held to be incompetent because the bond of caution had not been lodged till the Wednesday following. That, I think, is conclusive of the present case, because I cannot doubt that if the Court thought they had power to grant indulgence in special circumstances they would have exercised that power there.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Your Lordships refuse the note.

The Court refused the note.

Fishing — Salmon-fishing — Weekly close time, calculation of — Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 7—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 24, and sched. D, bye-law.—The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, sec. 7, makes provision for a weekly close time for salmon-fishing, other than by rod and line, "from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning," but gives power to the Salmon Fishery Commissioners to vary the commencement of the period in any salmon-fishery district, or part of a district, in so far as they may think reasonable or expedient, provided that such weekly close time shall in no case be less than thirty-six hours.

The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, sec. 24, enacts that the proprietor or occupier of every fishery at which inter alia fly-nets are used shall, in regard to such nets, do all acts required by any bye-law in force within the district in which such fishery is situated for the due observance of the weekly close time.

Schedule D, bye-law, sec. 2, annexed to the last-mentioned Act (being one of the regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time in, inter alia, the Forth district), provides that fly-nets shall be thrown out of fishing order in a certain way specified so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon.

The occupier of a fishery in the Forth district was charged with a contravention of the 24th section of the Act of 1868, and the above bye-law, in so far as during the weekly close time, on a particular Saturday, he had failed to have three fly-nets thrown out of fishing order, in terms of the bye-law. It was proved that at six o'clock on the evening in question the tide had just begun to ebb; that at this state of the tide it was impossible to throw fly-nets out of fishing order so as to comply with the bye-law; that the earliest hour thereafter at which this could be done was between eight and nine o'clock p.m., being half ebb; that the nets in question were then thrown out of fishing order; that this state of the tide occurred once every fourteen days; that when it occurred on a Saturday it would be necessary to throw the nets out of order at the previous half tide, i.e., about eight a.m., so that they might be out of fishing order at six P.M., and that being thrown off fishing order at nine P.M. the nets could at soonest be put into fishing order again at the same state of the tide, i.e., between nine and ten A.M. on Monday following, and thus would necessarily be out of fishing order for upwards of thirty-six hours.

The Sheriff found the accused not guilty. On appeal the Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, holding that the practice of throwing nets out of fishing order after six P.M. on Saturday nights, when the state of the tide rendered compliance with the bye-law at that hour impossible, which was admitted to have existed in the Forth district since 1862, made it inexpedient for the Court to interfere with a judgment of acquittal.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

ANDREW GREIG ANDERSON, fish and game dealer, Edinburgh, tenant of the Dumbarnie salmon-fishings on the Firth of Forth, was, on 8th September 1887, charged in the Sheriff Court at Cupar, on a summary complaint at the instance of David Osborne, prosecutor on behalf of the Forth District Fishery Board, with a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 24, and sec. 2 of the bye-law schedule D annexed to the said Act, made by the Commissioners under the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Acts,* in so far as on the evening of Saturday 9th July 1887, and within or during the weekly close time for the district of the river Forth, he "did omit or fail to have raised and tied to the upper ropes, or lowered and tied to the lower ropes, the pouches, traps, or chambers of three fly-nets placed in the sea at a part thereof at or near the east end of Largo Bay, opposite the lands of Dumbarnie, situated in the parish of Newburn and county of Fife, so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon by said nets."

Anderson pleaded not guilty. Evidence was led, and thereafter the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson) found the accused not guilty.

Osborne obtained a case.

The following were the facts stated by the Sheriff-substitute:—"At the trial of the cause it was proved that at six o'clock on the evening in question the tide had just begun to ebb, and that there would be from sixteen to eighteen feet of water above the highest part of the seaward end of the nets. That at that state of the tide it is impossible to throw fly-nets out of fishing order so as to comply with the provisions of the bye-law above referred to. That the earliest hour thereafter at which this could be done was between eight and nine o'clock P.M., being at half

* The Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 7, enacts,—"The annual close time for every district shall continue for 168 days; and the weekly close time, except for rod and line, shall continue from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning, but the Commissioners shall have power, on the application of the district board, or of any two proprietors of fisheries in any district, to vary the period at which the weekly close time shall commence in any district, or any part thereof, in so far as they may think reasonable or expedient, provided that such weekly close time shall in no case be less than thirty-six hours."

The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 24, enacted,—"The proprietor, or when let, the occupier, of every fishery at which stake, weir, or stake-nets, fly-nets, or bag-nets are used, shall in regard to such nets do all acts required by any bye-law in force within the district in which such fishery is situated for the due observance of the weekly close time." Then followed a provision as to penalties.

The following was sec. 2 of the bye-law, schedule D (being "regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time," in, inter alia, the Forth district), "that the pouches, traps, or chambers of each and every fly-net shall be either raised and tied up to the upper ropes of the same, or lowered and tied to the lower ropes, so as effectually to prevent the capture or obstruction of salmon."

ebb, and that the nets which up to that time had been in fishing order were then thrown out of fishing order. That this state of the tide occurs once every fourteen days during the fishing season, and that in order to ensure the nets not being in fishing order after six P.M., when such state of tide occurs on a Saturday, it would be necessary to throw them out of fishing order at half tide, about eight A.M. of that day. That as fly-nets can at soonest be thrown out of fishing order at half tide, so they can at soonest be put again in fishing order at the same state of the tide, and on the occasion in question the nets could not be put in fishing order till between nine and ten A.M. on the following Monday. That the space of time during which fly-nets are thus necessarily out of fishing order is upwards of thirty-six hours."

The following was the question of law:—"Whether in the circumstances held as proved the respondent was bound by the terms of section 7 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, to have his fly-nets out of fishing order as directed by the bye-law, schedule D, from six o'clock on Saturday evening till six o'clock on Monday morning, or whether he had not sufficiently complied with the requirements of the bye-law by having the nets out of fishing order as soon as he possibly could without losing a tide, namely, at half tide on Saturday night, and leaving them in that state till half tide on Monday morning, thus observing a weekly close time of upwards of thirty-six hours?"

Argued for the appellant;—The provisions of section 7 of the Act of 1862 were unambiguous and imperative, and left the Judge no option but to convict in a case like the present. The respondent ought to see whether some mechanical alteration of fly-nets could not be invented which should make it possible to throw them out of working order at any state of the tide; or if that was impossible, and a case of real hardship existed, he ought to apply to the Fishery Commissioners to have the bye-law altered. Possibly a deviation from the letter of the Act by a quarter of an hour might not be regarded as of importance, but three or four hours was another matter. The Sheriff-substitute seemed to have thought that there was a sufficient compliance with the Act if these particular nets were out of fishing order for a period of thirty-six hours. But the policy of the statute was not merely that a period of thirty-six hours should be the weekly close time, but that the same thirty-six hours should form that period—at least in each district. But the respondent's construction ignored that consideration, inasmuch as the tide varied at different places, and so consequently on his construction would the time of putting the nets out of fishing order. Further, bag-nets which were put out of order at six o'clock exactly might be used alongside of fly-nets, which could not—indeed they were so used in the present instance. This would introduce another variation, and would practically lessen the period of the weekly close time. It was an error to suppose that no fish were caught after 6 P.M. during the period in dispute. Salmon were commonly caught for some hours on either side of high-water, and therefore for a part at least of the period here. The policy of the Act was to lay down a hard and fast rule, and not to make the question of whether there had been any contravention or not depend on whether fish were being caught or were likely to be caught. It was true that in this district the mode of fishing complained of had gone on without objection since 1862, but that was because the inspector did not make his inspection till Sunday, when of course everything was in apparent compliance with the Act.

Argued for the respondent;—In the first place, as a matter of common sense the question came to this, Was this a reasonable compliance with the Act? The Sheriff-substitute had decided that it was, and looking to the practice of twenty-five years, and in the whole circumstances, that judgment ought not to be interfered with. The appellant had admitted that a reasonable construction was to be put on the Act when he conceded that a quarter of an hour would not amount to a contravention. The question was one of degree, and the Court would be slow to interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff on such a point. But secondly, if a strict interpretation was to be put on the Act by the appellant, the respondent was entitled to the same privilege. Now, looking to the strict letter of the complaint, he had not contravened section 7 of the Act of 1862, but only section 24 of the Act of 1868 and the relative bye-law, and in neither of them was any mention made of a time within which the operation enjoined was to be performed. The prosecution was a prosecution for not performing an operation in connection with the weekly close time, not for violating the close time itself. It was an implied condition that these operations should be performed at such a time as should not interfere with the weekly close time, but there was nothing to shew that they must be performed by 6 P.M. if in point of fact no practical injury, i.e., no fish were caught, by postponing the operation to a later period. That was the case here; few, if any, fish were taken (i.e., would enter the nets) after 6 P.M., when the tide was in the state it was on the occasion complained of.

LORD YOUNG.—In this case the respondent in the appeal—for he was acquitted in the lower Court—was brought to trial before the Sheriff-substitute at Cupar on a charge of having contravened a certain bye-law which has been passed by the Salmon Fishery Commissioners under the Act of 1868, having reference to the weekly close time. That necessarily takes us back to the Act of 1862, which prescribes the weekly close time, and in these words:—"The weekly close time, except for rod and line, shall continue from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning." The bye-law said to have been contravened is to the effect that the nets shall be thrown out of fishing order in a certain manner. The charge therefore is that on a certain occasion the nets of the respondent were not out of working order between six o'clock on Saturday night and six o'clock on Monday morning. The Sheriff-substitute states this case for our opinion on a question of law, and this is his statement of the facts which he held to be proved:—"At the trial of the cause it was proved that at six o'clock on the evening in question the tide had just begun to ebb, and that there would be from 16 to 18 feet of water above the highest part of the seaward end of the nets. That at that state of the tide it is impossible to throw fly-nets out of fishing order so as to comply with the provisions of the bye-law above referred to. That the earliest hour thereafter at which this could be done was between eight and nine o'clock P.M., being at half ebb, and that the nets which up to that time had been in fishing order were then thrown out of fishing order. That this state of the tide occurs once every fourteen days during the fishing season, and that in order to ensure the nets not being in fishing order after 6 P.M., when such state of tide occurs on a Saturday, it would be necessary to throw them out of fishing order at half tide, about 8 A.M. of that day. That as fly-nets can at soonest be thrown out of fishing order at half tide, so they can at soonest be put again in fishing order at the same state of the tide, and on the occasion in question the nets could not be put in fishing order till between 9 and 10 A.M. on the following Monday. That the space of time during which fly-nets are thus necessarily out of fishing order is upwards of thirty-six hours." Upon that state of the facts he found the respondent not guilty, but at the request of the prosecutor he has stated this case for our opinion, the legal question being,—"Whether in the circumstances held as proved the respondent was bound by the terms of section 7 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, to have his fly-nets out of fishing order as directed by the bye-law, schedule D, from six o'clock on Saturday evening till six o'clock on Monday morning, or whether he had not sufficiently complied with the requirements of the bye-law by having the nets out of fishing order as soon as he possibly could without losing a tide, namely, at half tide on Saturday night, and leaving them in that state till half tide on Monday morning, thus observing a weekly close time of upwards of thirty-six hours?"

It was stated to us by way of explanation that according to the construction of the statute contended for by the respondent—viz., that the nets should be thrown out of working order at six o'clock, or as soon thereafter as possible—there would be no injury to the fish or to anyone, the postponement of the beginning of the weekly close time being commensurate with its corresponding postponement at the end, and in this way giving a weekly close time of thirty-six hours in any event; while the contrary interpretation of the statute—that the nets must be absolutely out of fishing order when the hour of six strikes on Saturday night—would every fortnight impose the necessity of throwing them out of such order on the preceding tide or at the preceding ebb, and in this way they would be out of fishing order of absolute necessity for many hours before six in order that they might be out of fishing order at six. It is stated that this would be a grievance to the fishermen occurring once a fortnight, and that there is nothing in the statute to signify that that was contemplated. It was indeed said, or suggested in argument, that it was very important to have the nets both at the mouth of the river and all up the river thrown out of fishing order during the same thirty-six hours. I do not quite see the difficulty. The nets in the estuary are affected by the consideration which gives rise to this case, but not those higher up the river, where the tidal influence is less important. But the construction of the statute by which, if the view of the respondent is well founded, nobody is injured and the fish have a full period of Saturday night and Sunday slap, has been the interpretation that has been acted on since the Act was passed twenty-five years ago, and that without observation or question. I quite see the argument upon a close and literal construction of the statute by which the penalty will be incurred if throwing the nets out of fishing order is postponed for three hours, just as I see the argument upon a close and literal interpretation of the statute by which the penalty will be incurred if throwing the net out of fishing order is postponed for half an hour or for a quarter of an hour or any other short period. I think we are dealing with a short period, and not dealing with a matter which is very substantial on the one view, although it would be substantial on the other by depriving the fishermen of their legitimate fishing during a period of which it was not, as far as I can see from anything in the statute, the intention of the Legislature that they should be deprived. I think we should be imputing an idea to the Legislature which it had not entertained if we are to suppose that it was intended that the fishermen should be deprived of an extra tide's fishing once a fortnight. I do not think that that was at all in contemplation, and except in the view which would lead to that result we are dealing with a very trifling matter. Now, looking to what I am disposed to regard as the good sense of the matter, which is in accordance with the practical construction which has been put without question on the statute for a quarter of a century, and to the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, whose judgment we are reviewing here, and who tried the case and acquitted the man, I think we are not warranted in disturbing that acquittal. For my own part, I think the Sheriff-substitute was right, but I think we had better do no more than refuse the appeal and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, because if there be anything in the view which is suggested on the part of the local Commissioners, the prosecutors here, that there will be a real injury to a legitimate fishing interest, the most legitimate of all being the interest of the public, by reason of the weekly close time not being observed in the way the prosecutors contend for, the matter may be made quite clear and removed out of the region of controversy altogether by an order of the General Commissioners upon an application to the Secretary for Scotland, and therefore I think we shall sufficiently deal with this case in the manner I have suggested by affirming the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I cannot concur in the judgment proposed by Lord Young, because I think in doing so we should be doing violence to the plain words of the statute. The statute says that there shall be a close time, from six o'clock on Saturday night till six o'clock on Monday morning. I think that these words are capable of one meaning only, and that they are not open to any construction. I am bound to follow the plain words of the Act according to the only meaning of which they are susceptible, and I therefore think it illegal to have any obstruction in the statutory close time. It is said that this is a strict construction. I think it is the only admissible construction. It is said that the spirit of the Act is otherwise. I must say I cannot see that it is so. But, as I have said, I am bound to give effect to the words of the statute according to their natural and only meaning, and I am not entitled to set the statute at naught.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think there is a great deal in the observations of Lord Rutherfurd Clark on the construction of the words of the statute as they stand; but I am not prepared to differ from Lord Young's suggestion. I think we should not interfere with the judgment of acquittal by the Sheriff, after full investigation, except on clear considerations. Now, here, I think, the considerations are mainly in the opposite direction. For twenty-five years the way in which the weekly close time has been observed in this district has been that which is now challenged as illegal, and a certain customary understanding has grown up that, looking to the nature of the engines used for the catching of the salmon, it is sufficient if the nets are closed at a later period on the Saturday night than six o'clock, and upon this ground, that, according to the construction of the net, it is impossible at certain times of the tide to comply literally with the words of the statute. If this question had arisen shortly after the statute was passed I should have thought it a very grave one; but it is perfectly plain that no material injury has been done during the quarter of a century for which this custom has prevailed, and therefore, with these facts, I am not prepared to interfere with the judgment which the Sheriff-substitute has pronounced. I think the suggestion that parties should combine in going

Police—Road—Exposing goods to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers—Aberdeen Police and Water-works Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. cciii.), sec. 134.—The Aberdeen Police and Water-works Act, 1862, sec. 134, enacts,—"Every person who, in any street or in any public place within the limits of this Act, to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents or passengers, commits any of the following offences, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty" specified, "(that is to say), inter alia, every person who places, hangs up, or otherwise exposes to sale any goods, wares, merchandise, matter, or thing whatsoever, so that the same project into or over any footway, or beyond the line of any house, shop, or building, at which the same are so exposed, so as to obstruct or incommode the passage of any person over or along such footway."

Held that a shopkeeper who was proved to have had, during a whole day, a quantity of drapery goods hung over the front of his shop, except the windows, so that the goods projected over the footway of the street to an extent varying from six to eleven inches, within six feet from the level of the footway, had rightly been convicted of a contravention of the foregoing enactment, although it was not proved that any persons had actually been obstructed by the goods.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

WILLIAM TAYLOR, draper in Aberdeen, was charged in the Police Court there, on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, with a contravention of section 134 of the Aberdeen Police and Water-works Act, 1862 (which is quoted in the rubric, and is substantially in the same terms as the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 251), in so far as on 19th September 1887, in or near Castle Street of Aberdeen, he did place, hang up, or otherwise expose for sale, a quantity of drapery goods, or other wares or merchandise, on the front of the shop or premises in said street occupied by him, so that the same projected over the footway of said street, or beyond the line of his said shop or premises, to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers.

The accused was convicted, and fined 20s.

He obtained a case. The Magistrate stated:—"It was proved that on the day libelled, and during the whole course of that day, the appellant hung up a quantity of drapery goods, or other merchandise, on the front of the shop or premises in Castle Street occupied by him—over the whole surface of the shop front, except the windows—so that the goods projected over the footway of said street, or beyond the line of his said premises, to an extent varying from six to eleven inches, within six feet from the level of the footway. Incidentally the appellant proved that he had been in the habit of so exposing his wares for some time past. In exculpation six persons were examined, who stated that they themselves experienced no obstruction in passing the appellant's premises. It appeared to me that the nature and character of the act, which had been proved, made it an obstruction in the sense of the statute, irrespective of the actual results, and I accordingly convicted the appellant."

The appellant argued;—(1) The complaint ought to have charged that the exposure of the goods was to the "danger" as well as to the "obstruction" and "annoyance" of the residents or passengers. (2) The facts stated did not amount to the obstruction or annoyance of the residents or passengers in the sense of the statute.[1]

The respondent was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that the difficulties in the cases to which Mr Kennedy has referred arise here. This was something more than mere obstruction; it was the actual taking possession of a part of a public footway. The appellant has no right so to limit a footway which the public are entitled to use. On that simple ground I am for refusing the appeal.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same simple ground.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the inferior Judge.

Question, whether a mere rent-collector could have been prosecuted as "owner."

ON 1st July 1887, Alexander Forbes was charged in the Edinburgh Police Court, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, with a contravention of section 95 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, and section 41, subsection 2, of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Extension Act, 1882, in so far as he, being the owner of a common stair in Dumbiedykes Road, Edinburgh, did, on and since the 10th day of May 1887 years, fail to provide the necessary supply of gas for lighting two lamps in the said common stair.*

Forbes, while admitting that he drew the rents from the tenants of the tenement, objected to the competency of the complaint, and submitted that he was not liable in respect that he was not the true owner of the common stair, and the owner was resident in Edinburgh, and he founded on section 334 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879.*

The prosecutor submitted that in respect Forbes drew the rents of the property in question, he was the true owner within the meaning of section 5 of the Act.†

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd) repelled the objection, and the case went to trial.

The Sheriff-substitute found the charge proved, and fined the accused 5s., with the alternative of one day's imprisonment.

Forbes obtained a case. The facts stated were,—"That the appellant drew the rents from the tenants of the said common stair, and signed receipts therefor; that on the 10th of May 1887 the Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh authorised the inspector of lighting and cleaning to order the owner of the said common stair to provide a supply of gas therein; and that the appellant had failed to provide the said supply of gas, although ordered to do so by the inspector of lighting and cleaning."

The question of law was,—"Was the appellant the owner of the common stair referred to within the meaning of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, section 95?"

After a hearing before the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Rutherfurd Clark, on 4th November, the case was put out on 10th November to be heard before a bench of five Judges.

At the second hearing it was admitted at the bar that the appellant did not merely draw the rents of the property, but managed it for the owner. It was also admitted that the owner was resident in Edinburgh.

Argued for the appellant;—Literally construed, the interpretation clause of the Act (sec. 5) included factors within the definition of gas; and the occupiers of such lands and heritages shall be bound to clean, light, and extinguish such lamps or lights" as the magistrates may direct.

The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Extension Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. clxi.), sec. 41, enacts,—"The recited Act [of 1879] shall be and is hereby amended as follows:— . . . (2) In section 95, in addition to the obligation on every owner of any common stair, passage, or court, to provide the necessary lamps, brackets, or other means of lighting, and providing the necessary supply of gas, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. for not providing such supply of gas, provided always that the owner so providing a supply of gas" should have a right of relief against the occupiers for the amount so expended in proportion to their rents.

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 334, enacts that in all proceedings under the Act against owners of houses "where all or any of such owners reside beyond the jurisdiction of the Judge of police, such owner may be cited by delivering the citation to his known factor or agent or person drawing the rents; or, if there be no factor or agent or person drawing the rents, the occupiers of the premises, or any of them, may be cited, and shall take burden for the owners, with relief as before provided."

† The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 5, enacts,—"In this Act the following words and expressions shall have the several meanings by this section assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction—that is to say, . . . the word 'owner' shall include joint owner, fiar, liferenter, feuar, bondholder, or other person in the actual possession or receipt of the rents of lands and heritages, and the factor, agent, or commissioner of such persons, or any of them, or any other person who shall intromit with or draw the rents."

"owner"; but section 334 made it plain that the policy of the Act was to treat factors as owners only when the true owner was not resident in Edinburgh, and the true owner here was resident in Edinburgh. This view was confirmed by section 313 (1).* To read section 5 in the way contended for by the respondent would be to give the magistrates at least two "owners," against either or both of whom they might bring a prosecution for the same offence.

Argued for the respondent;—The policy of the Act was to ensure the due lighting of common stairs by those actually in charge of the stairs. It was for the advantage of the municipal authorities that they should have power to proceed against the actual manager of the property, and it was for the advantage of the true owner also, who might know nothing about the details of the management of the property, though his own. The word "owner" was unambiguously defined in section 5, and nothing in the other clauses of the Act controlled that definition. "Owner" at the end of section 313 (1) meant "owner" in the wide sense of section 5. The Act did not give the authorities a right to prosecute both the true owner and the factor; they had a right of election merely.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case was appointed to be heard before five Judges, because it was thought to be one of very considerable importance in the management of municipal affairs; for there can be no doubt that the lighting of premises such as the premises referred to in the complaint is a matter of very considerable moment. We apprehended that if there was any doubt as to that matter it might throw an impediment in the way of the magistrates or the authorities in enforcing very necessary provisions. Some difficulty arose in the consideration of the case the other day, which we thought it would be desirable to have deliberately considered and decided. Accordingly, to-day we have a full bench of five to deliberate upon this question.

For my own part, my opinion has been from the first that the provision of the statute here which defines the word "owner" to include factor, or the person drawing the rents, must be enforced to the full extent implied by the words. I see nothing in the kind of duty imposed upon the factor in any case like the present which should exempt him from the operation of the clause. I think the case is well directed against the factor, independently of the question which gave rise to the difficulty when the case was last before us. That difficulty has to a great extent been relieved by the admission that not only does the factor draw the rents, but he also substantially manages the property for the owner. That being so, we are now agreed that the factor was rightly served with this complaint, and that he is answerable to the authorities for obedience to the provisions of the statute.

Lord Young.—I had doubts upon the question as it was presented to us on the case, but as the facts are now presented at the bar I confess I have none.

I have difficulty in seeing why such a question should have been raised under the circumstances which occurred here. It seems such an obvious and simple course that the owner of property resident in Edinburgh—the single owner of the tenement in which this common stair is—neglecting to have a light in the stair, and to maintain it, should be proceeded against so as to be punished for failure to perform his duty in the past, and compelled to discharge his duty in the future. There could have been no question whatever had the proceedings been against him. Except, therefore, to raise a legal question before us, it does not occur to my mind why the proceedings were not taken against the owner resident in the town, and why a preference was indicated for a rent-collector or factor.

The purpose of the case, so far as the magistrates are concerned, is to get our judgment upon the interpretation of the section upon which we have heard so much argument. That is the object as it was explained to us by the Dean of Faculty the other day. Now, I think that clause presents not one difficult question merely, but a variety of difficult questions. I think there is room for construction in every one of the expressions used in the clause in question. The clause is prefaced in the usual way by the phrase "unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction," and declares that "the word 'owner' shall include the factor, agent, or commissioner of such persons" (that is, owners in the strict sense), "or any of them, or any other person who shall intromit with or draw the rents." Now, take the very common case that may occur of the owner of a house being obliged to pave the part of the street opposite the property of which he is the owner, and to keep the foot-pavement in order, and his liability to be prosecuted for a penalty if he fails, and also his liability to be sued for the expense of doing it by the magistrates in consequence of his failure. The owner of premises in a private court is bound to keep the court in good order, and liable in a daily penalty if he fails. He is also liable to pave it, and so on. Again, if the house is in a dangerous condition, the owner is bound to take it down, and is liable in a penalty if he fails, after a notice has been sent to him to that effect. Then an owner is bound to have proper means of ventilation in his property, and is liable in a penalty if he has them not. Now, I should not be prepared to hold, on the interpretation of this clause, that a factor or rent-collector, merely because he is included in this clause, is bound to take down the tenement if it is in a ruinous state. In every case you must consider whether it is sensible and rational to hold that the provision with which we may be immediately dealing can be enforced through the medium of a rent-collector. I should not myself be of opinion, with great deference to anyone holding a contrary opinion, that the mere fact of anyone having collected rents is enough to subject him in this kind of liability in all cases—in liability to pull down a tenement for instance if it happens to be dangerous. I could not so regard him as an offender, if he said, "There is the owner of the tenement in the next street, go against him for this purpose." Nor could I say to him that, according to my interpretation of this statute, the mere fact that he has collected the rents of the property gave the magistrates the right to go against him for penalties and the cost of the operations.

But to confine one's attention to the case which we have in hand—that of lighting a common stair—I should think that by the mere fact of having collected the rents the collector was guilty of no offence if he said to the inspector of streets and cleaning, "I cannot do this; I have collected the rents, no doubt, but I have handed them to the proprietor. I am in no default, I have not a shilling in my pocket, and if I had I should not apply it in any way except to hand it to the person for whom I have collected it. I am not manager for an absent owner, or anything of that kind." Therefore, upon the case as it was stated here, I should not merely have doubted whether a rent-collector in such circumstances could not be prosecuted, but I should have solved that doubt by finding that the rent-collector could not be prosecuted. What he is charged with is an offence against the statute in not having the stair lighted. How long is his obligation to continue?—as long as the rents are in his pockets? But as soon as he hands them to the owner the stair goes into darkness, and the question comes up, who is answerable for the delinquency? It is now explained to us that this rent-collector holds the office of factor—that he takes the management of the property in lieu of the owner. Well, applying that judgment which I indicated would require to be applied in each individual case, and having regard to the facts on which I have just remarked, I think this rent-collector may be an offender, and may be proceeded against as an offending owner for having neglected the particular duty here in question. I doubt if he can be proceeded against for not pulling down a tenement, or not supplying water-closets, or not providing ventilation, and so on; but in this matter of lighting this common stair, so long as he remains the factor in the management of the property in lieu of the true owner, I think that he must comply with the police regulations in that respect, and having got notice to light the stair, and having failed to do so, I am inclined to think he is an offender, and may be fined 5s. I do not know that upon the view I take the judgment will be of much value to anybody, and I rather think that where we have a contumacious owner who will not consent to be at the expense of lighting a common stair, it would be better to proceed against him directly instead of raising questions as to whether the interpretation clause will or will not in a particular case bring in a rent-collector as being equally responsible with the owner.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the conclusion at which both your Lordships have arrived. I confess that for one I should have been sorry if the Court had been under the necessity of coming to a different conclusion. Upon the facts as they are presented to us I have no difficulty whatever. The statute appears to me to be perfectly plain with regard to the owners and with regard to the offenders who may be prosecuted for penalty. The obligation created by the section of the statute which has been under the notice of the Court is the failure to light the stair of the property which belongs to the appellant's constituent. It is not said that the appellant was not in the management of the property, and I do not think it can be contended that, if there has been a failure to do what the statute imposes, he may not be prosecuted for the penalty provided for in the Act of 1882. The contention is that the wrong party has been brought here—that the appellant whom we have here is only the factor of the property,—and that taking the different clauses referred to by Mr Orr into consideration, we must hold the factor to be out of the definition clause, and that looking to the circumstances of the case, the plain words of the clause defining the word "owner" are to be overridden by the others. Well, if that had been established, there would have been no option but to adopt that construction, and hold that to a person in the position of the appellant the clause had no application, and that the word "owner" meant the person who had a property right to the subject where the failure to light had occurred.

But we must turn to the definition and other clauses of this statute to find out its true meaning—to see who may be owners in the sense of the Act of Parliament. We have a whole series of them—a whole series of persons included in the term "owner." One of these is the person in receipt of the rents, another is the person who collects the rents, and there are a number of others who may be each and all of them owners in the sense of this Act of Parliament. I think the provision is a wise one with reference to persons in the situation of the appellant. The great thing in the view of the magistrates is to have the lighting of common stairs readily, easily, and speedily carried out. The person who most naturally would attend to this duty is the person in the management of the property, the person into whose hands come the receipts of the property. I must say I do not think there can be the least difficulty with reference to a provision of this kind, when we see how wide the definition is. I am not going into any speculation to what we would do if the appellant were only rent-collector for a proprietor of a court or anything of that kind. But with reference to the case before us, which we have to decide without any regard to such speculations, I do not think there can be the least difficulty. The appellant is an owner in one of the most obvious senses of the word. The Magistrate it seems to me is quite right. The appellant received notice to light this stair, and he failed to do so, although he had money in his hands. No doubt his justification is, "It is quite true that I am the manager of this property, but you have got the true owner—the owner in the ordinary sense of the word, why don't you go to him?" Now, that is an intelligible position to take up, perhaps, but we cannot in my view give it effect. I do not seek to be wiser than the Act of Parliament, nor do I desire to give an Act of Parliament the go-by. But giving the Act a not too literal but a natural explanation, I have no difficulty whatever in applying that construction for which the respondent contends.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It was admitted at the bar, and I think properly admitted, that the appellant is the manager of the property, and the factor of it. I should have inferred that from the facts presented to us, and in that state of the facts I have no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordship.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur. As this case may be held as ruling the construction of the word "owner" in the interpretation clause, and as affording a guide to the authorities in enforcing the statute, I venture to add that, in my opinion, the question submitted to us for decision is not open to any real difficulty. The statute provides that certain things are to be done by the "owner," and that unless he does them he shall be subject to a penalty. Now, what is the meaning of the word "owner" as here used? The interpretation clause in the statute affords the answer to this question, and its terms are clear and distinct. By it the word "owner" is said to include "factor." The appellant is admittedly "factor" of the property in question. He is therefore, so far as this statute is concerned, the "owner," and responsible for the performance of the statutory duties imposed upon the owner. The appellant pleads,—"I am not the owner; the real owner lives within the burgh." I think that is absolutely no defence. A doubt has been suggested whether a mere rent-collector, as distinguished from a factor, or one who had the whole management of the property, would have been liable to be punished as owner for failure to comply with the police regulations under this statute. So far as I am concerned, I think there is no room for such doubt. The statute enumerates among the persons who shall be regarded as "owner" anyone "who shall intromit with or draw the rents." That, I think, plainly covers a mere collector of rents, and it is right that anyone accepting such a position should know that by collecting the rents on behalf of the owner he thereby renders himself liable for the performance of the duties which the statute provides shall be performed by the "owner."

The Court answered the question in the affirmative, dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the inferior Judge, with five guineas of expenses.

tember 1887 years, or about that time, the said accused, being all know thieves, were all, and each, or one or more of them, found frequentin Princes Street, South Saint Andrew Street, and Meuse Lane, or one more of said places, all in Edinburgh, with intent to commit theft."

The Sheriff-substitute (Sym) acquitted the accused.

The Procurator-fiscal obtained a case. The case bore:—"It wa proved by evidence adduced, that upon the date libelled, about 10.3 P.M., the police observed the respondent Clark at the West End Princes Street, Edinburgh; she was then going eastward along Prince Street; near the University Club, between Charlotte Street and Castl Street, she accosted a man who was coming westward, turned, an walked a few steps with him. He left her, and she then stood a fe minutes in Castle Street, then again went eastward, and accosted anothe man, and then stood a minute or two near the Mound, then moved o again, and accosted a man a little to the east of the Mound, and the again proceeded eastward, and accosted another man near Saint Andre Street, and presently went with him up the street and into Meuse Lane She had, in her progress along the street, accosted either four or fiv men.

"The respondents Kane and M'Donald were during her whole progress along Princes Street seen passing along the other side of that street keeping watch upon her, stopping when she stopped, and moving when she moved, and when she went with the last-mentioned man towards Meuse Lane, they crossed Princes Street, and followed her and the man into Meuse Lane. The police then followed, and between 11.0 and 11.5 P.M. arrested all the three respondents.

"It was proved that the respondent Clark had been convicted of theft in Edinburgh in 1879, and that the respondent Kane had been convicted of theft in Glasgow in 1879, and of a contravention of section 272 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, in Edinburgh in 1882. Both Clark and Kane were known as thieves to Edinburgh and Glasgow detective officers, who were examined, and it was proved that they had been, immediately previous to the date of this prosecution, cohabiting in Glasgow. It was proved that M'Donald was known as a thief and the associate of thieves. No conviction was proved against him.

"No evidence was led to shew that the accused, or any of them, were in Princes Street, Saint Andrew Street, or Meuse Lane at any other hour of the day libelled, or on any prior day.

"I held in point of fact, that the respondents were all known thieves, and were found in Princes Street, Saint Andrew Street, and Meuse Lane, with intent to steal, on the day libelled.

"On the reasoning, however, which was applied to the construction of a similar statutory provision, in Regina v. Clark,[1] I held that proof that the prisoners had once in the period of about half an hour, to which the evidence related, passed along the streets already named with intent, if opportunity offered, to commit the crime of theft, was insufficient for a conviction on a charge of being found frequenting those streets with that intent."

The question of law was:—"Whether the facts proved constitute an offence against section 272 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879?"

Judge of police, it appears to such Judge of police that his intention was to commit a crime. For the purpose of this section the word 'crime' shall mean any description of theft, robbery, housebreaking, reset of theft, and any similar offence involving dishonesty. . . ."

[1] Regina v. Clark, Dec. 1, 1884, L. R., 14 Q. B. Div. 92.

Argued for the appellant;—All that Clark's case decided was that one who, on a single occasion, made use of a public street as a place of passage was not guilty of a contravention of the statute merely because he had the intent to commit crime. The facts here were of a totally different complexion from those in Clark's case, and warranted a conviction. The statute, by using the word "frequent," struck at loitering in a street with a criminal intent.

Argued for the respondents;—"Frequent" in the dictionaries was always defined so as to include the idea of "often," and being once in a place was not being often there, and consequently was not frequenting the place. If the Legislature had meant "loiter" it would have said so; if it had meant merely being "in" the street it would have said so likewise, as it did in the immediately following clause of the section with reference to houses. How many times were necessary to come up to a case of frequenting was a question difficult to solve in the abstract, and not necessary to be solved here.

Lord Young.—I sympathise with the Police Magistrate in assenting to the prosecutor's motion that a case should be stated for the opinion of this Court as to the meaning of the word "frequenting" as used in the statute. No doubt the Police Magistrates will have to determine its application to the facts of each individual case, but I think it is possible for us to state generally our opinion as to the import and meaning of the term with a view to its application to individual cases, leaving the Judges of police in these individual cases to determine whether the facts which they present satisfy or do not satisfy that meaning, so as to enable them to affirm or deny "frequenting" in the individual cases. Now, I have to observe that the statute here makes that a punishable offence which is not a crime at common law, for it is certainly not a crime at common law to be on a street, or to be anywhere else, with an intent to steal. That may be a defect in the law, although I rather think that any other law would interfere very much with the liberty of the subject, and would expose perfectly honest persons to great risk and annoyance, through the possibility of error on the part of Magistrates and others engaged in the administration of the law. But be that as it may, the rule of the common law is, that a man shall not be punished for being on a street or in any other place where he lawfully may be merely because of any intent which may have been in his mind. The Legislature in interfering with that rule of the common law in the case of public streets uses the word "frequent," and declares that he shall be regarded as guilty of a crime who is "found frequenting" any street with intent to commit a crime. The Legislature has declined to make it a crime merely to be in a street with the intent to commit a crime when that intent has led to nothing criminal being done or attempted to be done; but the Legislature thought that, with reasonable safety to honest people, the intent to commit crime might be made punishable, provided that before a conviction can be sustained it must be shewn that the accused "frequented" the street with this criminal intent. No one who is making use of a public street is to be exposed to the risk of miscarriage which would be involved in permitting Magistrates to convict when they think that on one occasion, or on two, the accused was on the street with the criminal intent in his mind. But if the number of times is such as to satisfy the word "frequent," then there is no reasonable risk of miscarriage. There is no reasonable risk of miscarriage in convicting when the accused is found in a house, or other private place, with an illegal intent, although he is found there only once. The public street is another matter; he is entitled to be there; and the statute recognises this distinction by omitting the word "frequent" in the case of houses, and requiring proof of "frequenting" where the place is public. I am not going to suggest the number of times which I think would be sufficient to satisfy the word "frequent." I could easily give a very large number which would certainly be sufficient, but the minimum is another thing. The act must be often done—not once, certainly, or even twice, but if the Magistrate is satisfied that the act has been done often, and with the full intent to commit crime, then I think he may reasonably convict; otherwise there is the intent only, against which there is the rule of the common law that no man shall be punished for a criminal intent which he did not—perhaps because he could not—carry into execution.

Lord Craighill.—I am of a different opinion from that which has been expressed by Lord Young. I think that the facts proved constitute an offence against section 272 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act of 1879. There are several elements necessary for the constitution of that offence, and one only is said to be wanting. The absent element is the want of proof that the persons taken into custody had ever been in Princes Street before the occasion libelled. For the want of such proof the Magistrate refused to convict. The procurator-fiscal appealed, and the question before us is, whether in the circumstances proved, and despite the want of proof desiderated, there ought not to have been a conviction. If the matter be doubtful, much more if the words "found frequenting" have a fixed meaning, involving the idea of previous presence, the judgment is right; but if there be no fixed meaning attached to the expression "found frequenting," and if the meaning of that expression, as used in the statute, cannot reasonably be held to be subject to the limitation by which in this case it is sought to be circumscribed, then the deliverance now complained of by the fiscal ought to be reversed. The cardinal inquiry in a case like the present is the meaning of the words as used in the Act libelled. If that be demonstrated by the words themselves,—that is to say, if the meaning ascribed to them by the Magistrate is the only one which can be put upon the words, the thing is settled. But that is not a result which can here be predicated. There are few words of which a larger number of definitions have been given than the word "frequent"; and this is true of the word as used in English as of the word as it occurs in Latin. No doubt many of these imply that the thing said or done occurred more than once, but all of them do not involve such an implication. To see this, all that is necessary is reference to a dictionary. In dealing with the question, however, it must be borne in mind that "frequenting" does not stand alone. "Found frequenting" is what must be proved. For that there is no dictionary nor any other accepted definition. These things being so, the expression is open to construction, and necessarily introduces as the question for decision, whether the limited meaning adopted by the Magistrate is that in which the expression is used in the Act of Parliament, according to any reasonable interpretation. Of course there must be a use of the street different from that which is taken by a mere passenger; otherwise the thing struck at could not be charged as an offence; use in furtherance of the forbidden purpose is the gravamen of the charge. If there be that, there occurs all that can reasonably be required. Here the three accused were in company, though not walking together. They were on the same errand, though the men were on the one side of the street and the woman on the other. They spent half-an-hour between the west end of Princes Street and St Andrew Street. The men regulated their motions by the proceedings of their female companion, and what were these? She walked, she watched, she waited, she accosted, she turned, she returned, and at length, near the end of their course, she inveigled, near the corner of St Andrew Street, the fourth or fifth of the men, whom she accosted, into the meuse lane behind, where she was joined by her associates, who had all along been on the watch. In considering whether all this was "frequenting" it is not immaterial to bear in mind that there were three concerned in the operation, numbers being an element in some of the definitions of "frequent"; and moreover that the party were five times off Princes Street on their way east. They crossed on their way the streets by which the several sections of Princes Street are separated from one another. This last circumstance might of itself be enough to satisfy the definition which was made by the Magistrate his ground of judgment. But apart from this, were the other facts not proved a statutory offence? They were using Princes Street at the time libelled not as a street or thoroughfare, but simply as a field of operations for the commission of crime, and their presence on the street being for that purpose, and seeing the time that was occupied, and that three persons were engaged, the facts disclose all that I think is required to fill up the meaning of "frequenting" as used in the statute. This much I say in support of the general interpretation of the expression. Against the more limited interpretation these considerations may be urged. In the first place, if the latter be accepted, not one policeman out of a hundred, though there are the most manifest signs that an offence is intended, will be entitled to lay hold of the person suspected, for want of knowledge that they have been at the place before. In the next place, we should have to sanction the construction that all who visit Princes Street or any other street as a field of criminal operations, however plainly their purpose be exhibited, must have leave or license for one at least, if not for several, opportunities before the clause of the statute can be brought into operation against them. Such a result appears to me to be repugnant to the true reading of the clause, and therefore I am for quashing the judgment of the Magistrate.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think this case has been very properly stated by the Police Magistrate for the decision of this Court, and I think we may give our opinion upon the question stated to us, and on that question only. The question is,—"Whether the facts proved constitute an offence against section 272 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879?" That may be stated in other words, whether a person who on one occasion loiters in a public street during the space of half-an-hour, and with intent to steal, is a person who "frequents" the street within the meaning of the statute. We must keep in view that we know nothing more of the history of these persons than that they loitered for one half hour, and on one occasion only, in Princes Street. Is that frequenting?

The statute makes a strong distinction between being found "in" a building and found "frequenting" a public place. In the one case mere presence may be an offence. In the other there is no offence unless there is "frequenting." I do not think we can read that word as equivalent to loitering. If the Legislature had intended that loitering should be an offence, the word loitering would have been used. The word "frequent" implies the habit of being in a place, and a person being once in a place, although loitering in it, cannot be held to be "frequenting" it. I therefore think that the decision of the Magistrate is right.

Lord Trayner.—I agree with Lord Young and Lord Rutherfurd Clark in thinking that this was a proper question to state for the opinion of the High Court, and I am not without hope that the judgment now to be pronounced may be of some practical service. I entertain no doubt that the judgment of the Magistrate is right, and that the question now put to us should be answered in the negative. The reasoning upon which I proceed has been shortly stated by Lord Rutherfurd Clark, and also by the learned Judges in the case of The Queen v. Clark. It occurs to me only to observe that if there had been any ambiguity in the terms of the Act, our leaning in interpreting that ambiguity ought rather to be in favour of the accused than otherwise. But I think there is no ambiguity. The statute says the accused must be found "frequenting." I think the Legislature could not have employed a more inappropriate word than "frequenting," if it meant that being once in a place was to constitute the offence. I am not going to discuss the various definitions given in the dictionaries which have been cited. Both etymologically and in common parlance, the word "frequenting" involves the idea of "often." How often is a different question, and one we are not called upon to answer. But it would not be giving the word its proper meaning to read it as implying "loitering," or being in a place on one occasion only.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I could have wished that this question had arisen in a case in which our judgment would have had some practical effect. As it is, the parties are simply consulting the Court, and we are asked to lay down a general rule, as a guide for future cases, in answer to the question whether the facts here proved constituted an offence against the statute. The views which your Lordships have expressed will have different effects in different circumstances. All will depend on the circumstances of the particular case. I have no vote, and I desire to express no further opinion. Your Lordships answer the question put in the negative.

The Court answered the question in the negative, dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the inferior Judge.

Sentence—Culpable Homicide.—Circumstances in which a person who had pleaded guilty to a charge of culpable homicide by shooting a fellow clerk with a revolver, was dismissed (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) without a sentence.

High Court.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Justiciary Clerk.

On 21st November 1887, A B (who had been admitted to bail), clerk in an accountant's office, was indicted in the High Court, before the Lord Justice-Clerk on the following charge, viz.:—"That on 17th October 1887, within the office in St Andrew's Square, Edinburgh, occupied by, &c., you did discharge a chamber of a revolver pistol loaded with powder and a bullet in the direction of C D, clerk, whereby the said C D was mortally wounded and died on 17th October, and you did thus kill the said C D."

A B pleaded guilty.

The Lord Advocate moved for sentence.

Darling, for the panel, in mitigation of sentence, stated:—

The fact that the panel had pleaded guilty precluded him from saying that he was entirely free from blame. But he hoped to satisfy the Court that the blame was of the slightest and most venial kind that fell within the cognisance of the law. In the morning of the day on which the occurrence took place the revolver in question was brought out, and was handed about among the young men in the office. Its locks were examined and a cartridge was inserted. Some hours afterwards there was some conversation about the sighting of the weapon, and it was again produced. It was then that the panel, in entire ignorance or forgetfulness that there was a cartridge in one of the chambers, put the revolver in the direction of the deceased man, and the weapon went off with the result known. There was in this case nothing of the nature of evil intent on the part of the accused. He was on the most friendly terms with his fellow-clerks.

The Lord Advocate said that he was able to confirm in every particular what Mr Darling had said regarding the accused.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK adjourned the diet.

At a later hour of the same day—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it necessary to explain the grounds for the course which I intend to pursue in this case, which is not quite in the usual course of procedure.

The charge which is made in the indictment is that of discharging a pistol, loaded with powder and ball, in the direction of the person named in the indictment, whereby he was mortally wounded, and died on the 17th October following. The prisoner pleaded guilty to that charge, and accordingly I must assume that it amounts to a relevant charge of culpable homicide. But, according to the present form of indictment, I could not have discovered from the indictment the circumstances under which this crime was committed. It gives me no information, and I could only assume from the nature of the facts set out that it was a charge of culpable homicide—that is, of culpably and recklessly having killed the man in question. It was said by a predecessor of mine in the position that I occupy, that the crime of culpable homicide varied from a merely nominal crime to the very confines of murder,[1] and that therefore it became essential that the Judge, to give effect to the plea of guilty recorded on the part of the prisoner, should have some information to guide him in knowing in what stage of culpable homicide the crime was properly to be reckoned. I have had a very full statement on the part of the prisoner to-day, and I have also had on the part of the Lord Advocate a full and equally complete assent to the statement of facts so put before the Court. And the result is, that this unfortunate and unhappy occurrence was caused by the prisoner taking up this revolver—which it was very foolish of him certainly to have in his possession at that time—and, not knowing that it was loaded, presenting it at one of his fellow-clerks in the room. Now, that statement really reduces the act of the prisoner here to a piece of foolish and senseless bravado. He not only did not intend to injure anybody, but he did not suppose at the time that he had the means of injuring anyone, and that places it, I think, within a category which I have not known to be the subject of a criminal sentence. I see in the case I have referred to where Lord Justice-Clerk Hope laid down that doctrine, that he dismissed the prisoner with a fine of 1s., so well convinced was he that there was no criminal element in it. I mean to follow a similar and perhaps a stronger course. I do not intend to pronounce any sentence at all, but simply to dismiss the prisoner from the bar, in the belief that the memory of this event will follow him to the last day of his life. He will not go unpunished, as far as the reckless display by him has been followed by results that must undoubtedly tinge all his reflections. I shall not say a word to aggravate them. I am not inclined to make a nominal sentence where I really do not intend to pronounce any sentence at all. I think the more straightforward and the more becoming course is not to inflict punishment when I think there was no criminal intent in the case, and therefore the prisoner is now at liberty to go.

THE COURT dismissed the panel from the bar.

HER MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Blair, A.-D.

Indictment—Latitude in time—Incest.—Question whether an indictment charging the panel with having committed incest on several occasions during a period of seven years was relevant.

Proof—Witnesses—Particeps criminis—Incest.—Where a father was charged with incest committed with his daughter, held (per Lord Young) that the daughter was not competent as a witness for the Crown, she being of full age and not having been herself charged with the crime.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Justiciary Clerk.

ON 5th December 1887 A E was indicted in the High Court, the charge against him being (1) that on several occasions between 1st January 1880 and 18th October 1887, in the dwelling-houses (named) occupied by him, he did have incestuous connection with B E, his daughter, then residing with him; and (2) that on several occasions between 24th December 1885 and 18th October 1887, places above libelled, he did have incestuous connection with C E, his daughter, then residing with him there, all contrary to the Act James VI. and the 18th chapter of Leviticus therein referred to.

On the case being called,

LORD YOUNG observed that he was not satisfied with the relevancy of the libel, in so far as it charged the panel with committing the crime on several occasions during a period of seven years.

Blair, A.-D., accordingly craved leave to amend the libel by restricting the time in both charges to the period between Whitsunday 1887 and the 18th October following.

LORD YOUNG allowed the amendment, and the amendment having been made, found the libel relevant.

A jury having been empanelled,

Blair, A.-D., called B E, named in the indictment, as the first witness for the Crown.

Patrick Smith, for the panel, objected to the examination of this witness, and argued;—She was twenty-two years old, and was consequently liable to be charged with the crime as well as her father. As a particeps criminis, therefore, she could not be examined unless as Queen's evidence, but this was not the footing on which it was proposed to examine her. The same objection applied to the examination of the other daughter, who was twenty years of age.

Dec. 5, 1887.
Her Majesty's Advocate v. A E.

Blair, A.-D., replied;—The daughters were admissible as witnesses. Without their evidence the case could not be made out. They might have been charged as participes criminis, but in all cases it was in the discretion of the public prosecutor, when he thought the interests of justice required it, to take a particeps criminis as a witness. This was frequently done in other cases, and the procedure was specially proper in a case like the present, where, from the character of the crime, it was almost impossible to bring it home to the accused without such evidence. It was not necessary that the accomplice should first have been formally charged with the crime. Such a witness by giving evidence obtained protection from prosecution. The evidence of the accomplice by itself might not be sufficient to prove the charge, and might require corroboration by other witnesses. Such corroboration would be given in this case.[1]

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that the daughters are not admissible as witnesses. The case of Simpson, 1 Coup. 437, which has been referred to, is not in point, because in that case no crime was or could be imputed to the daughters, who were children of seven and eight years of age. The same crime is here imputed to the daughters, and could have been charged against them, as is charged against their father, but they are not charged, and have not been charged, so that it is not a case in which they are treated as co-delinquents, and are taken as Queen's evidence. That is a matter of compact which the person may or may not enter into, but if he agrees to give, and gives, evidence, he is freed from prosecution. Here no charge has been made against them, and they have not been told that if they would give evidence there would be no charge made against them. I confess I should greatly regret having to allow a daughter to give evidence as to a crime committed by her father and herself, and if there is no evidence but this to prove it I think it had better be left alone. In point of law I determine that the daughter is not admissible as a witness.

Blair, A.-D., then stated that he did not propose to call any other witnesses.

LORD YOUNG thereupon directed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty, which was accordingly done.

THE panel was discharged.*

crowd exceeding a hundred persons who in the day-time entered upon an extensive deer forest and openly marched across it, shooting the deer thereon as they went; that they were seen by the keepers of the forest, who were unable to interfere with them on account of their numbers, and that they continued so acting for two days. The Lord Justice-Clerk directed the jury that such conduct, if proved, amounted to the crime of mobbing and rioting.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Lee.
Justiciary Clerk.

DONALD MACRAE, Roderick Mackenzie, Murdo Macdonald, John Matheson, Malcolm Mackenzie, and Donald Macmillan, all belonging to the parish of Lochs, Ross-shire, were indicted before the High Court of Justiciary under the Criminal Procedure Scotland Act, 1887. The indictment set forth that "the charge against you is that you Donald Macrae, Roderick Mackenzie, and John Matheson and others having formed a scheme that the persons living in the neighbourhood of the Forest of Park in said parish, occupied by Joseph Arthur Platt, residing at Eishken Lodge in the said parish, should in large numbers and armed with guns trespass in the said forest and destroy deer therein; and you the said Donald Macrae, Roderick Mackenzie, and John Matheson having at a meeting held on 11th November 1887 at Balallan (in said parish) instigated and incited the said Murdo Macdonald, Malcolm Mackenzie, Donald Macmillan, and other persons there assembled to form part of a riotous mob for the purpose of carrying out the said scheme, a riotous mob, armed with firearms and other weapons, and acting of common purpose, did, in pursuance of said scheme, and instigated and incited thereto by you Donald Macrae, Roderick Mackenzie, and John Matheson, on 22d and 23d November 1887, trespass on said forest, and did intimidate those who were employed by the said Joseph Arthur Platt to protect the deer therein against unlawful destruction from so protecting them, and fire at and kill or wound a number of said deer; and you Murdo Macdonald, John Matheson, Malcolm Mackenzie, and Donald Macmillan did form part of and were actively engaged with the said riotous mob in its acts aforesaid; and you Donald Macrae and Roderick Mackenzie were art and part with the said riotous mob in its acts foresaid."

The prisoners pleaded not guilty.

The evidence shewed that the deer forest of Park, which was believed to contain about 500 or 600 deer, extended to about 30,000 acres. It was partly surrounded by water, and where it marched with other land was enclosed by a fence.

On 22d November several keepers and gillies were on duty watching the forest about 9 A.M. when a crowd of about 120 to 130 persons approached from a village near the boundary of the forest. A number of the men carried guns. They were joined by another crowd of persons from the village of Balallan, many of whom had guns. The crowds having joined, extended in open order, and marched across the forest firing at intervals at the deer. The crowd remained out all night, and next day, 23d November, acted in a similar manner. In the afternoon of that day the Sheriff-substitute of the district arrived and addressed the crowd, calling upon them to disperse and quit the forest, which they did.

The keepers were aware from report that a meeting had been held in the district a few days before the 22d November at which it had been decided that such a "raid" should take place, the object of which was to call attention to certain alleged grievances in connection with the land laws, and prevent the land being let as a deer forest. There was evidence that those of the prisoners who were accused of having incited the others to assemble and take part in the raid were at the meeting and advised that the "raid" should take place. The keepers did not, owing to the number of the crowd, endeavour to stop them from carrying out their intention, but went on before them endeavouring to drive away the deer so that they might not be shot by the armed men in the crowd.

The prisoners' counsel argued that if the panels were guilty of any crime, it was of the contravention of the Day Trespass Act, 1832 (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), and not of mobbing and rioting as charged.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK charged the jury as follows:—

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a case of importance in more aspects than one. In the first place, it is substantially the first important case that has arisen under the statute passed in the last session of Parliament, which made considerable alterations on some of the forms and some of the rules of this Court. In the second place, it is unquestionably of importance to the prisoners, who no doubt do not belong to the ordinary criminal class, and were till this occurrence apparently well-behaved peasants. I think it also proper, at the outset of my remarks, to say that a theme has been introduced into the case upon which you cannot legitimately express any opinion. The only question which you have to consider is whether the prisoners are guilty of the crime charged—that is to say, whether they are proved to your satisfaction to be guilty. The pleadings have without doubt been very able. I hope I do not go too far when I say that perhaps the eloquence was sometimes a little perfervid, and that it would not have lost any force or effect, and might have gained in dignity, had the colouring been a little more subdued. This is not a political meeting, but a Court of law. What you have to try is entirely a question of fact. You will pay no heed to the criticisms you have heard on the public prosecutor. It is to be assumed that he has brought this case in the discharge of a public duty, and no one who has heard the evidence to-day can doubt the propriety of his having done so. I know very well—I have had some experience of it myself—that the public prosecutor is considered a fair target for rhetorical javelins, and within proper limits there is nothing wrong in that. But, as I have already hinted to you, we are not here to try any question of political economy, still less one of politics, but a question of fact, upon which I shall make to you a few observations. The first question is, what is the charge against the prisoners? An indictment in the old form was a syllogism, and it was necessary to set out the category of crime of which the accused was said to be guilty, and then to state facts which logically led to that conclusion. Under the new forms that is not necessary, but it is sufficient that the indictment should set out facts which in law amount to an indictable offence. It is my duty now to call your attention to what this indictment says about these prisoners, and to tell you in point of law how far the alleged facts, if proved, lead to the inference that they have been guilty of an indictable offence.

The facts set out in the indictment are that a number of the persons at the bar concerted together a scheme for making a raid in the deer forest of Park, and that they then instigated and incited others, some of whom are prisoners here, to make the raid which had so been arranged. The indictment says that Donald Macrae, Roderick Mackenzie, and John Matheson, and others, instigated and incited Murdo Macdonald, Malcolm Mackenzie, Donald Macmillan, and others, to "form part of a riotous mob, for the purpose of carrying out the said scheme," and that they, "armed with firearms and other weapons, and acting of common purpose, did trespass," &c. Now, it has been said for the prisoners that this was only a poaching expedition, and that a prosecution for a contravention of the Day Trespass Act would have been the proper charge to bring against them, and by some not very lucid reasoning it was attempted to shew that a charge, upon the facts as libelled, of mobbing and rioting was excluded. That is an entire and absolute mistake, as I shall explain to you. Deer are not private property while running wild. Neither are grouse nor any other wild animal. But a proprietor is entitled to prevent strangers coming on his ground. That is his right, and persons who come upon his ground must shew their legal right to be there, otherwise he is entitled to exclude them. Trespass constitutes in the general case a civil wrong and not a criminal act, and the proprietor's remedy is by civil writ or action of damages. The Day Trespass Act was passed for the purpose of rendering the state of the law more stringent, and made it a criminal offence for anyone, without the leave of the proprietor, to go upon land for the purpose of destroying game. But that has nothing to do with this prosecution. The charge in the indictment is that of mobbing and rioting, not one of poaching. The prisoners assembled in those numbers for the avowed purpose of overpowering opposition, and intimidating the watchers. If they did so, their purpose was illegal. Even if it had been a legal act to go for the purpose of shooting deer, which it clearly was not, if they did it in a riotous manner, so as to interfere with those who had a right to prevent trespass, that would amount to the crime of mobbing and rioting. Here it has not been suggested that they were performing any legal act whatever, and there is no doubt in law that for a number of people to enter upon lands in the numbers spoken to by the witnesses for the purpose of overpowering and intimidating the servants of the owner in the discharge of their duty constitutes the crime of mobbing and rioting. I think I shall best discharge my duty by reading to you part of the charge of the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope in the case of Gordon Robertson in the year 1842 (Broun, vol. i. p. 192),—"I have to state to you in point of law that an illegal mob is an assembly of people acting together for a common and illegal purpose, effecting or attempting to effect its purpose either by violence or demonstration of force, or numbers, or by any species of intimidation, impediment, or obstruction calculated to effect their object, and to impede, obstruct, and defeat others employed in discharge of duty"; and further on he says,—"The essence of mobbing and rioting is (taking terms applicable to this case) the exhibition, demonstration, and use of the power of numbers to overcome, obstruct, impede, and defeat those employed in the discharge of duty entrusted to them." Such is the nature of the crime of mobbing and rioting, and thus even in a legal act there might be an attempt to enforce it in an illegal manner. The abstract legality of the object in hand therefore will not defend the parties if they attempt to enforce what they think are their rights in an illegal manner. But here there is no pretence or colour of right for what was done. The people who entered the forest of Park had no legal right to be there, and were not performing any legal act, and it is not suggested that they were there for any lawful purpose. The pursuit of the deer is not the principal element of the crime in this case; it is the pursuing by a large assembly of about from 120 to 150 people, a number of them being armed with guns and rifles, and the members of which could not be resisted by those whose duty it was to protect the deer forest. That was an exhibition, demonstration, or use of the power of numbers to obstruct and impede those employed in the discharge of duty entrusted to them in the sense of the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope's opinion, and amounted in law to mobbing and rioting, and the question is, has this charge been proved? (His Lordship then referred to the evidence, and pointed out that no one had denied that there was an assembly of people in the forest on the days mentioned in the indictment, and that Murdo Macdonald, John Matheson, Malcolm Mackenzie, and Donald Macmillan were clearly identified as having been present.) Donald Macrae and Roderick Mackenzie were not at the actual raid, but were present at a meeting at Balallan held for the purpose of collecting money to enable the crofters to get an agent to appear for them before the Crofters Commission, but at which the raid upon the forest was freely talked about, and I am of opinion that it was the duty of Macrae and Roderick Mackenzie, when they heard it referred to, to say "I am no party to this," if they disapproved of it. This they did not do. Macrae, Roderick Mackenzie, and John Matheson were charged with instigating and inciting others to make this raid, and you will have to consider the evidence on this point, as there certainly is a contradiction as to their conduct. Macrae and Roderick Mackenzie, if you believe the witnesses for the prosecution, though not actually present in the raid, are in law guilty of mobbing and rioting if the raid, which was actually carried out, was part of the common object which they, along with the others, concerted, and which, in pursuance of this concerted action, was carried out.

THE JURY returned a verdict of "not guilty as libelled," in respect of which verdict the panels were assoilzied simpliciter, and dismissed from the bar.

PETER MILLER, Appellant.—R. V. Campbell—Baxter.
THOMAS LINTON (Procurator-Fiscal in the Edinburgh City Police Court), Respondent.—D.-F. Mackintosh—Boyd.

Public-house—Certificate—Transfer—Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, sec. 19.—Sec. 19 of the Act (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58) enacts,—"That if any person duly authorised to keep a common inn, alehouse, or victualling-house . . . shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house and premises for which such certificate shall have been granted, it shall be lawful for two or more Justices of the Peace or magistrates respectively as aforesaid, sitting publicly in their ordinary place of meeting, to grant to any new tenant or occupier of such house and premises upon such removal, a transfer of the certificate to keep such house and premises, as a common inn, alehouse, or victualling-house as before such removal, until the next general or district meeting to be held under the authority of this Act."

Held that such removal and transfer absolutely divests the original holder of all right of trafficking in exciseable liquors under the certificate.

A transfer of a public-house certificate running from May 1887 till May 1888 was granted in July 1887, but was not confirmed at the ensuing Quarter Sessions in October, the transferee having been guilty of a breach of the certificate. The original holder then resumed possession of the premises, and proceeded to traffic therein in exciseable liquors without obtaining a new certificate. Held that he had been rightly convicted of trafficking in exciseable liquors without a certificate.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

PETER MILLER was charged in the City Police Court, Edinburgh, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, with having on 1st and 3d December 1887 trafficked in exciseable liquors in premises occupied or used by him in Canongate, Edinburgh, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of the Public-Houses Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 35).

He pleaded not guilty, but was convicted by the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd), and fined £1, 5s.

He obtained a case. The facts stated were,—On 12th April 1887

Miller v. Linton.

Miller obtained from the Magistrates of Edinburgh, at their general half-yearly meeting for granting publicans' certificates, a renewal of his then existing certificate for premises in Canongate, said renewed certificate to be in force from 15th May 1887 until 15th May 1888.

On 16th July 1887 Charles Rattray, by arrangement with Miller, applied for and obtained from two of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, in virtue of the powers contained in section 19 of 9 Geo. IV., cap. 58,* a transfer of Miller's certificate for the premises in Canongate aforesaid, the said transfer bearing "to be of force only until 18th October 1887, being the next general meeting to be held for granting such certificates." Rattray, immediately upon the transfer having been granted, entered into possession of the premises, which was ceded to him by Miller.

On 8th August 1887 Rattray was convicted in the Edinburgh Police Court of a breach of his said public-house certificate by selling and supplying exciseable liquor to a man who was in a state of intoxication.

On 18th October 1887 Rattray applied to the Magistrates of Edinburgh, at their general half-yearly meeting for granting publicans' certificates, for a renewal of the certificate transferred to him from Miller, which renewal was refused by the Magistrates, to whom the aforesaid conviction had been intimated. On the 29th day of October 1887 Rattray appealed to Quarter Sessions against this refusal, but his appeal was dismissed.

Miller did not thereafter apply for or obtain a new certificate in his favour; but on 28th November 1887 he applied for and obtained from the town-clerk a duplicate of his said certificate from the register of licences, which duplicate was produced and proved to be correct. The register of licences kept by the town-clerk, in accordance with the Public-Houses Acts, bore that on 12th April 1887 Miller was granted a renewal of his existing public-house certificate from 15th May 1887 until 15th May 1888, and the register contained no entry cancelling said certificate.

Then followed a statement of facts inferring the trafficking libelled.

The questions of law were,—"Was the appellant, in view of the facts stated, the holder, within the meaning of the said Public-Houses Acts, of a certificate for the said premises on the dates libelled in the complaint? or was the appellant, by the transfer of his certificate in favour of the said Charles Rattray, divested of any right thenceforth to traffick in exciseable liquors under the said certificate?"

Argued for the appellant;—The transfer of a public-house certificate under section 19 of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 58, was not complete until confirmed by a full bench at the half-yearly meeting. The original holder himself had no power to transfer,[1] and all that the two magistrates could do was to grant a temporary and conditional permission. Rattray's breach of certificate probably caused him to forfeit his temporary permission, but however that might be, as the temporary permission was never confirmed by a full bench, there was no effectual transfer from Miller. Miller therefore was entitled to trade in virtue of his radical right, the temporary burden of the permission granted to Rattray having been removed. Miller was not responsible for any fault Rattray might have committed.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have in vain endeavoured to find any ground in support of this appeal. Divested of its surrounding circumstances the case is very simple. The appellant upon the 12th of April 1887 obtained a certificate from the Magistrates of Edinburgh for the sale of exciseable liquors for certain premises in the Canongate, and upon the 16th of July one Rattray, by arrangement with the appellant, applied for and obtained a transfer of this certificate till the 18th October, when it would in ordinary course have to be confirmed. Rattray immediately entered into possession of the business premises previously occupied by Miller. Unfortunately Rattray was convicted of a breach of his certificate upon the 8th of August, and on the 18th of October when he applied to have his certificate completed and renewed it was refused, for the reason I suppose just indicated. Upon the 29th of October he appealed to Quarter Sessions to have this decision reversed, but his appeal was dismissed. The result of these proceedings, in my opinion, is that the certificate transferred by Miller to Rattray ceased to be available to Miller. He, however, did not apply again to the magistrates, and without obtaining a new certificate began to sell exciseable liquors in his old premises on the strength of a duplicate of the original certificate. I think that the Sheriff-substitute was perfectly right in holding that Miller's certificate was at an end, and that he had no authority to trade on it.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses, which modify," &c.

Proof—Competency—Evidence of accused in previous civil action.—Opinions that in a criminal trial statements made by the accused as a witness in a previous civil action, relating to the same subject-matter, may be used as evidence against him.

Question, whether it is a competent ground of suspension that a Sheriff's charge to the jury at a criminal trial was erroneous in law.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk.
Ld. Craighill.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

ON 13th December 1887, Patrick Banaghan was tried before the Sheriff-substitute (Speirs) and a jury at Jedburgh, on an indictment charging him with having sent a threatening letter to the Rev. Father O'Kane, Roman Catholic clergyman at Jedburgh.

Banaghan was convicted and sentenced to one month's imprisonment. He brought a suspension.

The grounds of suspension as stated in the bill were,—"(1) That the whole proceedings were irregular and oppressive. (2) That competent evidence was rejected. (3) That the verdict was truly one of acquittal."

In consequence of the course which the case took at the hearing it is unnecessary to state the specific averments on which these pleas were based. The material questions (which were not raised in the bill) came to be (1) Whether the evidence of Banaghan given at a previous civil tri to which he was not a party, but relating to the letter in question, w competent evidence at the criminal trial? In this evidence, which w proved at the criminal trial by the short-hand writer speaking to tl accuracy of his notes, Banaghan admitted that he was the writer of tl letter. (2) Whether, if competent, this evidence was sufficient corrob ration of Banaghan's declaration (in which he also admitted writing tl letter) there being, according to the statement made for him at the ba no other evidence corroborative of the declaration?

Banaghan maintained;—(1) That the evidence in question was incon petent, and (2) that if competent it was insufficient corroboration of tl declaration.

The respondent maintained;—(1) That the evidence was competent and (2) that whether there was sufficient corroboration of the declaratio or not, the soundness of the Sheriff's charge in law on that point coul not be raised in a suspension.[1]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The point as to the verdict of the jury in this case i somewhat unusual in its character. While the declaration of a prisoner is no sufficient of itself to warrant a verdict of guilty, yet it is competent evidence and if it is supported and corroborated by other competent evidence, it may b sufficient. It is alleged here that the complainer had given evidence as to th same threatening letter on a former occasion, in a civil action in which the sam parties were implicated, and had admitted the writing and sending of th threatening letter with which he was charged in the criminal prosecution, and of which he was convicted. We are also told that this admission by him was proved in the criminal trial by the oath of the short-hand writer and his notes.

This, it is said, was the whole evidence upon which the jury decided against him.

Now, there is no such statement in the bill of suspension. It is not stated in the bill that there was no other evidence led except the deposition of the suspender in the civil case and his declaration, yet that is the objection to the proceedings now insisted on.

I think it is enough for the decision of this case to say that no such ground is stated in the bill of suspension. The contention before us has been that to admit the evidence given by a witness in a civil cause as against him in a criminal trial is incompetent. I am of opinion that this evidence is competent. If the ground of suspension had been that the evidence was not sufficient to go to the jury, that would have raised a different question, and we should have had to go more minutely into the principles applicable to such a case, but there is no such allegation. We do not know what evidence the witnesses gave, nor are we in a position to say what amount of corroboration there was, but we are bound to believe that the Sheriff-substitute in charging the jury stated to them that the evidence laid before them was sufficient to entitle them to convict the prisoner if they believed it.

In these circumstances I do not think it necessary to go into the more difficult questions raised in the argument. I think it is competent to use as evidence in a criminal prosecution a statement made in a former civil process, and that therefore there was no irregularity in this trial. According to the case of Little v. Smith, Dec. 9, 1845, 8 D. 265, it is entirely different when it is proposed to use as evidence in a civil action a declaration emitted in a previous criminal prosecution. But we have nothing of that kind here.

Lord Craighill.—I am of the same opinion. The complainer in this appeal was tried for sending a threatening letter. There is no doubt that he sent the letter, for when he was apprehended he was examined in the usual way and emitted a declaration in which he admitted writing and sending the letter. If therefore such an admission be sufficient, he was properly convicted. An admission in a declaration however is not of itself sufficient evidence upon which to convict a prisoner, but if further evidence is offered to corroborate this declaration the questions arise, first, whether that corroborative evidence is in itself competent, and secondly, whether it is, along with the declaration, sufficient evidence upon which to convict. In this case, the farther evidence which was offered consisted of the report of a deposition by the complainer in a civil process, in which he in so many words stated that he wrote and sent the letter which he was afterwards charged in the criminal complaint with writing and sending. He made a full confession, exculpating the man who in that case was charged with writing and sending the letter. Whether in thus acting he came forward as a volunteer, or was adduced in the usual way as a witness, we do not know; all we know is that he on that occasion fully confessed that he was the guilty person. Armed with this deposition the prosecutor called the short-hand writer to swear to the accuracy of his report, and in this way the complainer's admission in the civil case was made evidence in the criminal proceeding. The question is whether that evidence so given was competent. I agree with your Lordships that upon the authorities it beyond all doubt was competent evidence, but while this question was very fully argued to us, it is not made a ground of suspension in the bill, and I therefore agree with your Lordships that the suspension should be dismissed, no ground of suspension upon which we can interfere having been stated.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I also agree. There are three grounds of suspension stated in the bill. The first is, that the whole proceedings were irregular. That means nothing, and may be dismissed at once. The second is, that competent evidence was rejected. It does not appear from the bill what the competent evidence was which was rejected, nor have we been informed from the bar. We must therefore reject that plea. The third ground of suspension is, that the verdict was truly one of acquittal. I am of opinion that that plea also is not well founded.

These are the only grounds of suspension stated in the bill, but in the course of the discussion some entirely different questions were argued. One of these was whether an admission by the accused made by him as a witness in a civil cause may competently be used against him when tried upon a criminal charge. I am disposed to think that the Sheriff did quite right in admitting that evidence, but I do not express a final opinion, for as I have said, the objection is not one of the grounds of suspension. Another objection which was argued to us was whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury convicting the accused. If the evidence was not sufficient, the Sheriff-substitute ought to have directed the jury to that effect; if he did not do so, there was a bad charge, but no question about the charge being a bad charge is raised in the bill here, and if such an objection had been raised I doubt whether it would have been sustained. I doubt whether it is a good ground of suspension that the Sheriff's charge was erroneous in law. I think that was settled in the case of Quarns v. Hart, June 4, 1866, 5 Irv. 251.

THE COURT refused the bill, and granted warrant to re-imprison.

ON 17th December 1887 Robert Niven, butcher, and Andrew Nicholson, a labourer or flesher, both residing in St Andrews, and Peter Paton, residing at Downfield, Dundee, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Cupar on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, setting forth that they did on the 13th October 1887 commit a trespass by unlawfully entering or being in the day time,—that is, between the beginning of the last hour before sunrise and the expiration of the first hour after sunset,—upon the farm and lands of Drumcarro, tenanted by David Horn, farmer there, in the parish of Cameron, and county of Fife, belonging to James Home Rigg, Esq. of Tarvit and Drumcarro, without leave of the said James Home Rigg, in search or pursuit of game, &c. contrary to the Act 2 and 3 Will. Niven and Nicholson pleaded not guilty. Paton did not appear, having gone abroad some time prior to the date of the trial, and the case was deserted pro loco et tempore as regarded him. Niven obtained a case. The case stated,—"At the trial of the cause it was proved that on the afternoon of the day in question, between one and three o'clock, Andrew Leitch, gamekeeper to James Home Rigg, Esq. of Tarvit and Drumcarro, heard three shots fired on the lands referred to. He proceeded to the place where the shots had been fired, and found the appellant, who has been a master butcher in St Andrews for a considerable number of years, along with the respondents, Andrew Nicholson and Peter Paton, beating a turnip field. They had a pointer dog with them. The appellant and Paton had guns, and Nicholson was carrying a hare and a rabbit which had been shot by the appellant on the lands in question. The appellant was not over two hours on said land. Mr Leitch asked appellant if he had written permission from Mr Horn to shoot, and the appellant stated that he had.

"Leitch went with the appellant and the two other parties to Mr Horn, who stated that he had given the appellant leave to shoot ground game on his farm on the day in question.

"At the trial written authority to the appellant to shoot ground game on said lands, dated 3d October 1887, and signed by Mr Horn, was produced, and Horn deponed that it had been granted of the date it bore, and that the appellant was on the day in question availing himself of that permission, which is in the following terms, viz.:—'Drumcarro Farm, St Andrews, Oct. 3d, 1887.—I hereby give Mr R. Niven liberty for a day's shooting on Drumcarro Farm to kill hares and rabbits.—DAVID HORN.' It was admitted and proved that the appellant held a licence to kill game, which was produced at the trial, which licence is dated 24th August 1887, and expires on 31st July 1888.

"The appellant at the time in question was not a member of Horn's household, resident on the land in his occupation, nor a person in Horn's ordinary service on said land, nor bona fide employed by Horn for reward in the taking and destruction of ground game, all as defined in subsection (b) of subsection (1) of the Ground Game Act, 1880.[*] The Sheriff-substitute held that the appellant was thus not in a position to plead that Act in defence to the trespass libelled, and accordingly convicted him of the contravention of the Act 2d and 3d William IV. cap. 68, sec, 1, libelled."

The questions of law stated were,—"1. Whether the appellant, not being one of the persons defined in subsection (b) of subsection (1) of section 1 of the Ground Game Act, 1880, could be authorised by the tenant to kill ground game? and 2. Whether the appellant in the circumstances stated committed a trespass within the meaning of the Act 2d and 3d William IV. cap. 68, sec. 1?"

Argued for the appellant;—Subsec. (1) (a) of sec. 1 of the Ground Game Act, 1880, was independent of and not limited by the limitations of subsec. (1) (b). The former dealt with killing game with firearms, the latter with killing game otherwise. The sole limitation on the former was that one person only might be authorised, the limitations on the latter were the three therein stated. The written permission, therefore, which the appellant had was within the terms of the Act. The case was within the principle of Stuart v. Murray,[1] for if a friend from a distance coming to stay for the night might lawfully be authorised, surely a friend from the neighbourhood might equally be so, although he did not happen to stay all night. At all events, the appellant having acted in bona fide, ought not to have been convicted.[2]

Niven v.
Renton.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—This appears to me to be a very clear case. The appellant was on the ground in question, part of the farm of Drumcarro occupied by Mr Horn, the tenant, for the purpose of shooting ground game. He had obtained the authority of Mr Horn for a day's shooting on Drumcarro farm, authority to "kill hares and rabbits," and his defence to the complaint which was brought against him in the Sheriff Court of Cupar was that this written authority was sufficient to exclude the charge of day trespass in pursuit of game which was afterwards raised against him by the procurator-fiscal. It has been found by the Sheriff that the appellant was not a member of Mr Horn's household; that he was not resident on the land in Horn's occupation, nor a person in Mr Horn's ordinary service on the land, nor bona fide employed for reward in the taking and destruction of ground game, all as defined in subsec. (b) of subsec. (1) of sec. 1 of the Ground Game Act, 1880, and that this leave granted by Mr Horn was not an authority by which the alleged trespass was justified.

The appellant's counsel contended that the Act must receive a liberal interpretation for the purpose of extending its operation. What is liberal is not easily defined, but it appears to me that there can be no liberal interpretation which is equivalent to a nullifying of a material portion of the statute. Words in such a statute as the Ground Game Act, as well as in other Acts, must receive their ordinary and natural interpretation, and it will never do to put a construction upon an enactment which is equivalent not to an interpretation but to a repeal of the clause which has come to be in controversy.

The appellant further contended that subsec. (a) and subsec. (b) are independent enactments, and that accordingly we must read the former as if the latter never had been enacted. The effect of that of course would be to render the authority given by Mr Horn to the appellant as operative as it would have been if the appellant had been a member of one of the classes specified in subsec. (b). But this plainly would be not a reading, but a misreading, of the statute. The conditions in subsec. (b) qualify what has gone before, and this being so, Mr Horn was not competent to give, and the appellant was not competent to receive, a permission to kill ground game which would exclude the commission of trespass.

It was also contended for the appellant that as he had leave to come upon the land he ought to be held to be a member of Mr Horn's household resident on the land in his occupation. But this was a ludicrous contention. The appellant had never been in Mr Horn's house, and any purpose that he had in going to the farm was to kill ground game. He had no invitation to the farm, he had only a permission. So far as appears he had never been on the farm except on the occasion of the day in question, nor had he been nearer the house on the farm than the field in which he was walking for sport. The most liberal interpretation, to say nothing of the natural and ordinary interpretation, of the words would be far within the interpretation which has been suggested on behalf of the appellant. Better repeal the clause at once, or deal with it as blotted out of the Act, than force from the words of the clause that for which the appellant's counsel so earnestly contended. These being my views, I think the answer to the first question must be in the negative. The answer to the second question ought to be in the affirmative. The authority granted by Mr Horn not being valid, the appellant's presence on the farm for the purpose of killing game could not thereby be excused. He might or might not believe that what he had received was sufficient authority, and this perhaps not unreasonably might be taken into consideration in determining the punishment with which the trespass should be visited, but there was a trespass all the same, and therefore the Sheriff did right in convicting the appellant and in imposing a fine, for the recovery of which warrant was granted by the sentence passed upon the appellant.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

ON 17th January 1888 Frederick Bewglass, Samuel Brown, and Peter M'Millan were charged before the Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson) at Greenock, on a summary criminal libel under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, setting forth that the accused "did on 5th December 1887, in or at New Highlanders Academy, situated in Dempster, Mount Pleasant, and Holmscroft Streets, Greenock, form part of a disorderly crowd of persons, and behave in a disorderly manner, and annoy and disturb the lieges, and commit a breach of the public peace."

The relevancy of the libel was objected to for the accused in respect of insufficient specification of the crime alleged, and in particular in respect that the libel did not "set forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime as required by section 5 of said Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887."*

The objection was repelled, and the accused having pleaded not guilty, the case went to trial. The accused were convicted and fined.

They obtained a case. The case stated;—"It was held proved that the accused had taken a prominent part in the proceedings of the crowd libelled; that they had forced their way into the building mentioned, and encouraged others to do so; that many of those who so entered behaved themselves in a disorderly manner—did damage to the premises, annoyed and disturbed the proper occupants, and committed a breach of the public peace."

* The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 5, enacts that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to specify by any nomen juris the crime which is charged, but it shall be sufficient that the indictment sets forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime."

No. 15.

Feb. 10, 1888.
Bewglass v. Blair.

The question of law was,—"Was the crime of which the accused were convicted relevantly libelled, and were they legally convicted?"

Argued for the appellants;—The new Act dispensed with the nomen juris, it did not dispense with a specification of facts sufficient to infer a crime. Here in point of fact the nomen juris was given, but there was an entire want of specification of the modus. Section 2 of the Act it was true permitted the forms in schedule A of the Act to be used, but schedule A contained no form for breach of the peace, which consequently must be libelled according to the old practice, and judging by the old practice this libel could not stand.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The libel was relevant looking to the terms of the new Act. Its object was to dispense with specification as far as possible. There was no form for breach of the peace in schedule A, but the forms given, particularly that for the cognate offence of mobbing and rioting, shewed that all that was now necessary was to give the accused fair notice of the nature of the crime, when committed, where, and on whom.[2]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Our ideas of relevancy have been very much altered by recent legislation, and we cannot now apply the same strict rules to indictments as we were accustomed to do before the Act of last session was passed. It appears to me that on the face of this indictment there is a sufficient disclosure on the part of the prosecutor of what he intends to prove against the appellant, and that if what is disclosed be proved the facts amount to a criminal offence. He means to prove that the accused formed part of a disorderly crowd which went to this school and committed a breach of the peace, behaving in a disorderly manner. We have in the case a condensed account of the evidence, and assuming its accuracy, it is perfectly clear that the averment of the indictment was proved, and that a breach of the peace was committed. I cannot say that the indictment is a model of logical sequence, but it appears to me that under the statute so much is allowed to be implied or supplied that we cannot interfere.

Lord Craighill.—I confess that it is difficult for an old Justiciary hand, accustomed to the old forms of procedure, to approve of this complaint, but we are now under the new Act, and it appears to me that there is on the face of this complaint a sufficiently specific statement to entitle us, looking to the forms provided by that Act, to hold the complaint to be relevant.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—As an old Justiciary hand, I rather think that under the old forms this indictment would have required a somewhat more specific statement, but all that has been changed, and I think we are bound to work the new Act fairly. I think the meaning of that statute is that specification is to be avoided as far as possible, and looking to the forms provided in schedule A for other crimes, I am of opinion that what is set forth in this indictment is sufficient notice to the accused of what he is charged with.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern."

WEST CIRCUIT (GLASGOW).
Lord Trayner.
Justiciary Clerk.

CHARLES M'DONALD, broker, Saracen Street, Possilpark, Glasgow, was indicted at the Glasgow Circuit Court held in February 1888, the indictment bearing—"The charge against you is that between 1st October 1886 and 15th January 1888, at your premises in Saracen Street aforesaid, you did reset 100 tons of pig-iron, the same having been dishonestly appropriated by theft."

It was objected (1) that the latitude of time taken in the indictment was too great, and (2) that the indictment was irrelevant in respect of not giving fair notice to the accused of the charge he had to meet.

The Advocate-Depute obtained leave to amend the indictment by inserting in it before the words libelling the time the words "on several occasions," so as to make it read "on several occasions between 1st October 1886 and 15th January 1888."

LORD TRAYNER.—This indictment, as now amended, charges the prisoner with having resetted, "on several occasions between 1st October 1886 and 15th January 1888," 100 tons of pig-iron; and it is objected that the latitude of time taken is too great, and that there is such a want of specification in the indictment that the prisoner is not bound to go to trial upon it; that without something more precise being stated than is given, the prisoner is not in a position to defend himself. I think the objection, so far as regards the latitude of time taken, must be repelled. In cases of reset—especially where continuous acts of reset are averred—very considerable latitude is allowed, and for the latitude here taken I think precedent might be found.

The other objection stated I sustain. It is said by the Advocate-Depute that what he proposes to prove is that the prisoner, within the dates specified, resetted various quantities of pig-iron, amounting in all to 100 tons. This is not what the indictment says; for the indictment may be read as amounting to a charge that the prisoner resetted several parcels of pig-iron of 100 tons each, some time within the dates libelled. This, however, is not the most important aspect of the objection, for this might be remedied by amendment, which I would allow. The important matter is that under this indictment the prisoner is not afforded any information concerning his alleged offence, such as would enable him to answer the charge, if he has an answer to it. To illustrate what I mean: Suppose that at the time of the prisoner's apprehension there was found on his premises a bar of pig-iron which is in the course of the evidence shewn to have been stolen. The prisoner must account for its possession so as to avoid the pains of reset. But how can he do so under an indictment like the present? The bar of pig-iron is part of the 100 tons libelled; but without any notice that it is so, until the proof has been led by the prosecutor, the prisoner is unable then to offer evidence that he acquired that particular bar of pig-iron innocently. Even if his evidence was at hand, not having given in a list of witnesses as required by law, the prosecutor might object to the examination of any witnesses the prisoner proposed to call. The want of such list of witnesses, and consequent loss of evidence in defence, could not be said to be matter for which the prisoner was responsible. Having no information from the indictment as to any particular charge, or part of the general charge, which he would be required to meet, he cannot be blamed if he is not ready to meet it. Such an indictment as the present puts a burden on the prisoner which he is not bound to bear. I think it would be unfair to the prisoner to go to trial on this indictment, and I accordingly sustain the objection.

Fraud—Bankruptcy—Credit obtained by undischarged bankrupt—Bankruptcy, Frauds, and Disabilities Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 16), sec. 4.—Circumstances in which an undischarged bankrupt, who had obtained credit to a considerable extent without disclosing that he was an undischarged bankrupt, was proved to have so acted with intent to defraud, and convicted of an offence under the Bankruptcy, Frauds, and Disabilities Act, 1884, sec. 4.

WEST CIRCUIT (GLASGOW).
Lord Fraser.
Justiciary Clerk.

JOHN LIVINGSTONE was indicted before the Court of Justiciary at Glasgow, under an indictment setting forth that being an undischarged bankrupt within the meaning of the Act, first hereinafter mentioned, "you did in your premises in Buchanan Street, North Frederick Street, Glasgow, with intent to defraud (1) between 28th May and 2d July 1887, obtain credit to the amount of £148, 16s. 2d. from the firm of H. W. Caslon & Company, typefounders, Chipwell Street, London; (2) between 20th May and 16th June 1887 obtain credit to the extent of £151 from the firm of Payne & Sons, printers' engineers, Atlas Works, Otley; and (3d) between 19th June and 5th August 1887 obtain credit to the extent of £27, 17s. 6d. from the firm of C. T. Jefferies & Sons, wholesale stationers, Blackhall, Bristol, without informing any of the said firms that you were an undischarged bankrupt, contrary to the Acts 47 and 48 Vict. cap. 16, sec. 4,* and 43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34 (Debtors Scotland Act, 1880)."

It was objected for the panel that the reference to the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, was too general, and that the indictment was therefore irrelevant.[1]

The Advocate-Depute moved for leave to amend the indictment by making the reference to the Debtors Act, 1880, read as follows:—"And you have thereby incurred the penalties provided by 43 and 44 Vict. c. 34, sec. 13."†

* The 4th section of the Bankruptcy, Frauds, and Disabilities Act, 1884, provides that "where an undischarged bankrupt obtains credit to the extent of £20 or upwards from any person without informing such person that he is an undischarged bankrupt, he shall be guilty of a crime and offence, and may be dealt with and punished as if he had been guilty of a crime and offence under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, and the provisions of that Act shall apply to proceedings under this section."

Her Majesty's Advocate v. Livingstone.

Lord Fraser allowed the proposed amendment, and sustained the relevancy of the indictment as amended. His Lordship, however, expressed the opinion that the indictment, as originally framed, was relevant since intent to defraud was libelled, and the Debtors Act, 1880, was merely referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the penalty.

The prisoner pleaded not guilty.

Evidence was led for the prosecution. It was proved that on 29th June 1886 the prisoner was, on a creditor's petition, ordained to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of a trustee. In September 1886 the trustee resigned his appointment as there was no estate to administer, but the prisoner was never legally discharged. Thereafter in the summer of 1887 the prisoner obtained credit—(1) to the amount of £148, 6s. 2d. from Messrs H. W. Caslon & Company, typefounders, London; (2) to the amount of £151 from Messrs Payne & Sons, printers' engineers, Atlas Works, Otley; (3) to the amount of £27, 17s. 6d. from Messrs C. T. Jefferies & Sons, wholesale stationers, Blackhall, Bristol. He did not inform any of these firms that he was an undischarged bankrupt. He had written to Caslon & Company for an estimate, and they instructed their traveller to call for an order. In reply to questions put by the traveller he mentioned that he had had correspondence previously with the firm, and that "it was all right." In dealing with Payne & Sons, he stated that Caslon & Company were supplying him with type, and when asked for a reference he gave the name of the manager of a branch bank in which he had had an account. To C. T. Jefferies & Sons he stated that he was being supplied with goods by Messrs Payne & Sons and Caslon & Company. The firms in supplying the goods were largely influenced by these statements, which were correct in point of fact. In August panel sold about 300 lbs. of the type which he had purchased from Caslon & Company to James M'Lay, general dealer, Glasgow, for £15, 10s. to whose niece he was married. It was proved that his bank account had always been of very small dimensions, and that there had been no operations upon it since December 1886, when the account was closed. His business was of a very limited character. The prisoner was sequestrated on 7th November 1887, and in the state of affairs his liabilities were set down at £1116 and his assets at £317, but the trustee had only been able to recover £124, 5s. 2d. of the latter, including a sum obtained for the machinery supplied by Payne & Sons.

For the defence evidence was led to the effect that the panel was preparing to issue a monthly time table and diary, and that the type and other material supplied to the prisoner were got for the purpose of publishing the diary.

The Advocate-Depute argued that he had succeeded in establishing the three necessary elements of the offence charged, viz.:—(1) that when the goods were ordered the panel was an undischarged bankrupt; (2) that he did not inform the firms from whom he ordered the goods that he was an undischarged bankrupt; and (3) that in so ordering the goods he was guilty of an intent to defraud. It was not necessary to prove false representations on the part of the prisoner, but the intent to defraud might be gathered from all the surrounding circumstances. As Lord Young had pointed out in Duncan v. Cooper, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 36, direct evidence of such intention was not necessary, fraudulent intent might be inferred, and the circumstances of this case warranted such an inference.

Counsel for the prisoner argued that fraudulent intent on the part of the prisoner was not proved. The cessio had practically come to an end in September 1886 when the trustee resigned, and though the prisoner had not been legally discharged, it might reasonably be supposed that he fancied himself a free man. Further, his object in obtaining the goods was a perfectly honest one—namely, to bring out a time table and diary, which he expected would be a very profitable piece of business, and enable him to meet all his obligations.

Lord Fraser, in charging the jury,—In recent years great alterations have been made in the law of debtor and creditor. The powerful means of enforcing payment of debt, which imprisonment allowed a creditor, are gone, and now in giving credit one must trust very much to the representations of the intending customer. But the Act of Parliament imposing penalties upon an undischarged bankrupt who goes to a tradesman and orders goods without disclosing that he is an undischarged bankrupt was intended somewhat to give protection to traders in the place of that which was abolished. The Act is quite explicit that a bankrupt must have a discharge from a competent Court before he can trade in the customary way. It is of no moment in the present case that the trustee had resigned. Another might be appointed on the application of any creditor; and until the bankrupt is discharged by a Court of law he remains an undischarged bankrupt. There is no doubt in fact that the panel is an undischarged bankrupt, and there is also no doubt that he succeeded in getting goods to an amount considerably above £20 in value without disclosing that fact. The question is, quo animo? In the Act of 1884 the clause under which the case is brought does not contain one word about intent to defraud. Section 13 of the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, with regard to some other offences, lays the onus on the panel to shew that he had no intent to defraud; and the punishment to follow on conviction in such cases as the present is regulated by that section. And by a decision of two of the Judges of the Justiciary Court, a third dissenting—Small v. Hart, March 12, 1886, 13 R. (Just. Cases) 45—it has been held that intent to defraud is of the essence of the crime. For my part I cannot follow the reasoning on which the learned Judges arrived at that conclusion. In this case, however, the prosecutor has libelled intent to defraud, and he must therefore prove it. It is quite impossible to give a precise definition of what is fraud. But this may be said, that it may be any deception by which one man makes another believe, to the latter's injury, something that really does not exist. It may be done either by direct assertion or by a suggestion, not amounting to direct assertion, of something which was untrue. What did the prisoner do in this case? He went to various people and ordered goods without saying one word about his being an undischarged bankrupt. He referred one of them to his banker, as if he was a man of means, but his banker, had he been applied to, could have given only a pitiful account of his affairs. He played off one person against another in a very astute manner. To Payne & Sons he stated that Caslon & Company were supplying him with type; to Jefferies & Sons he said that he was a customer of Payne & Sons. There was no assertion certainly that he was not an undischarged bankrupt, but, on the other hand, he kept back the important fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. He knew perfectly well that if he had told that fact he would not have got credit for a single sixpence. It has been said that he had incurred the credit from good motives; that he wished to publish a diary, the profits of which would have enabled him to clear his feet and pay off his debts, which he looked forward to doing. The object of getting the type and machinery was to make his fortune. But, alas! that was no excuse. A man who obtains goods from another, even if it were to keep his wife and family from starvation, or to enable him to pay 20s. in the pound, does wrong if he knows he has not the means of paying for them. The panel had set out on a speculation for publishing a railway guide, which in these days of travelling might have succeeded, or might have ended, as it did, in disaster. In August of 1887 he sold a large portion of the unpaid for type—the type by which he was to make his fortune—to his wife's uncle for £15, 10s. That certainly does not look a very nice transaction. It is said that the object of selling the type was to get money to pay his workmen. There was no proof of how the £15, 10s. had been spent. It may have been laid out in wages or it may not. There is no means of knowing. It is for you to consider whether all these things taken together shew intent to defraud on the part of the prisoner.

THE JURY unanimously found the panel guilty as libelled, and he was sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

HIGH COURT.

Ld. Craighill.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

ON 17th November 1887 Thomas Gairns, hackney carriage driver, Leopold Place, Edinburgh, was charged in the Leith Police Court on a complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, which set forth that the accused, "between the hours of eleven and twelve of the clock on the forenoon of Sunday 13th November 1887, in Commercial Street, Leith, did, while passing the place of public worship known as Free Saint Ninian's Church, and while divine service was being conducted in said church, fail to drive a horse and hackney carriage under his care at a walking pace, and did drive said horse and hackney carriage at the rate of eight miles an hour, contrary to section 8 of the Amended Bye-Laws for regulating Hackney Carriages, made in terms of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' by the Magistrates of Leith," whereby he became liable in a penalty.*

* The bye-law libelled was in the following terms:—"Every driver shall, during the hours of divine service on Sundays, or other days set apart for public worship by lawful authority, drive at a walking pace while passing any place of public worship."

The following provisions of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), were referred to at the hearing:—

Sec. 278.—"The magistrates may from time to time license to ply for hire within five miles from the principal post-office of the burgh such number of hackney coaches or carriages, of any kind or description, adapted to the carriage of persons, as they shall think fit."

Sec. 279.—"Every wheeled carriage, whatever may be its form or construction, used in standing or plying for hire in any street within such prescribed distance, and every carriage standing upon any street, public or private, within Gaiins v. Main.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined 10s., with the alternative of five days' imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The facts stated were,—"(1) That the appellant was an Edinburgh hackney carriage driver, licensed by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, and that the hackney carriage which he was driving was also licensed by the Magistrates of Edinburgh; (2) that neither the appellant nor the hackney carriage he was driving was licensed by the Magistrates of Leith; (3) that on the forenoon of Sunday, 13th November 1887, being the occasion referred to in the complaint, the appellant's carriage was hired, as a hackney carriage, at a stance in Union Place, Edinburgh, to carry, and did convey, certain persons to the docks at Leith, for which the appellant was paid the usual fare from that stance to the docks; (4) that the appellant on the said occasion, in the course of fulfilling that engagement, drove at the rate of about eight miles an hour past Free Saint Ninian's Church (near the docks) in Commercial Street, Leith, when divine service was being conducted in that church at the time libelled; (5) that the bye-law libelled was in the following terms,— . . . (6) that a constable, seeing the appellant was driving what he (the constable) took from the hackney carriage name-plate on the vehicle to be a hackney carriage, and was not acting upon the bye-law, held up his hands, and called to the appellant to go at a walking pace, but the appellant drove on at the rate libelled; (7) that the congregation in said church were disturbed in consequence."

The questions of law were, inter alia, the following:—"(2) Does the bye-law libelled apply to the appellant although he was not licensed by the Magistrates of Leith? (3) Was the carriage driven by the appellant a hackney carriage within the meaning of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' and of the said bye-law?"

Argued for the appellant;—The bye-law here founded on was a condition of a Leith hackney carriage licence, not a rule for the regulation of public traffic in the streets of Leith. That was plain from section 308 of the Act. The bye-law did not apply to private carriages, and hackney carriages from Edinburgh were in the same position in this respect as private carriages, provided they did not "ply for hire" in the sense of section 308 and of section 279, which defined "hackney carriage"; but a hackney carriage did not ply for hire unless it was held out as open to hire by any member of the public who chose to take it.[1] The appellant's cab was not in this sense plying for hire in Leith on the occasion libelled; it had been hired in Edinburgh. It therefore was not a hackney carriage which the magistrates were entitled to require to be licensed under section 278 of the Act, and if not then its driver could not be guilty of a breach of the bye-law.

such prescribed distance, having thereon any numbered plate required by this Act to be fixed upon a hackney carriage, or having any plate thereon resembling or intended to resemble any such plate as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be a hackney carriage within the meaning of the Act." The section then went on to except stage-coaches duly licensed from the definition of hackney carriage.

Sec. 308.—"The magistrates may from time to time (subject to the restrictions of this Act) make bye-laws for all or any of the purposes following—that is to say, for regulating the conduct of the proprietors and drivers of hackney carriages plying within such prescribed distance in their several employments, and determining whether such drivers shall wear any and what badges, and for regulating the days and hours within which they may exercise their calling. . . ."

[1] Bateson v. Oddy, May 27, 1874, 43 Law Jour. Mags. Cases, 131.

Argued for the respondent;—This was undoubtedly a hackney carriage; it was plying for hire in Leith, and consequently was within the bye-law. The case was not put so high as to say that all Edinburgh cabs coming into Leith on hire must take out a Leith licence, but they must, when in Leith, do as the Leith cabs were obliged to do.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The appellant, notwithstanding a warning from a policeman to the contrary, drove his cab at more than a walking pace past a church in Leith during divine service. He was charged before the Magistrate with having committed a breach of the bye-law made by the Magistrates of Leith in the following terms:—"Every driver shall, during the hours of divine service on Sundays, or other days set apart for public worship by lawful authority, drive at a walking pace while passing any place of public worship." The Magistrate convicted, and hence the appeal.

There are several questions raised in the case. But the most important is the second.

The bye-laws in question were made by the magistrates under the 308th section of the Police Act of 1862, which provides:—"The magistrates may from time to time (subject to the restrictions of this Act) make bye-laws for all or any of the purposes following—that is to say, for regulating the conduct of the proprietors and drivers of hackney carriages plying within such prescribed distance in their several employments, and determining whether such drivers shall wear any and what badges, and for regulating the days and hours within which they may exercise their calling."

The appellant is a licensed cab-driver. But his licence was not obtained from the Magistrates of Leith, but from the Magistrates of Edinburgh. The question is whether the bye-law which I have quoted is applicable to the appellant.

I am of opinion that it is not. I think that it is clear that the bye-laws apply only to the licences of the Magistrates of Leith. The Act enables the magistrates to make bye-laws to regulate the conduct of the proprietors and drivers of hackney carriages plying within the limits fixed by the Act, and for determining the badges the drivers shall wear. This is just a part of the system of licensing established by the Act in each burgh, and the breach of the bye-laws is nothing more than a breach of the licence granted by the magistrates. It cannot therefore apply to the appellant.

The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill, who had also heard the case, were absent at advising, but Lord Rutherfurd Clark intimated that they concurred in his opinion.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Reverse the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern," with seven guineas of expenses.

Proof—Competency—Statement by prisoner volunteered to policeman.—Held that a statement voluntarily made by an accused person while out on bail to the policeman who had apprehended him regarding the crime with which he was charged was competent evidence against the accused, although the policeman had not cautioned the accused.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

CHARLES SMITH was convicted of assault in the Police Court at Aberdeen on 1st February 1888. He obtained a case. The Magistrate in the case stated, inter alia,—"When the witness constable Alexander Finlay [who had apprehended the accused, as appeared from the previous part of the case] was under examination by the procurator-fiscal, he related a statement with reference to the case volunteered to him by the appellant, who accosted him on the street on the evening of the day upon which he, the appellant, had been liberated on bail. The law-agent of the appellant objected, on the ground that the constable had not cautioned the appellant; but I repelled the objection, on the ground that it was volunteered by the appellant when he was not in custody."

The question of law stated with reference to these facts was,—"(3) Whether the statement volunteered to the constable by the appellant after liberation on bail should have been admitted in evidence?"

Argued for the appellant;—The statement made to the constable ought not to have been admitted in evidence. The law was very jealous of statements by accused persons to officers in authority.[1] If an accused person insisted on making a statement, the officer ought to caution him before listening.

The respondent was not called on.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. The case is too clear for argument. (After dealing with grounds of appeal which need not be reported)—It was further stated for the appellant that the magistrate ought to have rejected the evidence of the policeman as to a statement volunteered to him by accused while out on bail. It was argued that the constable ought to have warned him—that he ought to have said, "Take care, don't make any statement to me, for I shall remember it, and it will be used against you."

In my opinion there is no rule of our law requiring a constable, under ordinary circumstances, to give any such warning, and it seems to me ridiculous to say that a constable by not giving warning failed in his duty. I desire to say with regard to the authorities cited that there is no such rule in my opinion. It is a matter of everyday practice to ask a policeman, "What did the prisoner say when you charged him?" It never crossed my mind, nor I should think the mind of any other Judge, to object to the question. A Glasgow Circuit never passes but such statements are made by constables as "He said he wasn't there"—"He admitted the theft, and gave me the purse"—and so on. The idea of rejecting such evidence because no warning was given appears to me extravagant. No doubt when a man is in durance, in jail, the law is jealous of conversations between him and his warders. It is not the business of a jailer or a turnkey to go into the cells and converse with the prisoners about the crimes with which they are charged. The law guards a prisoner against confessions or statements induced by promises made to him by his jailers, and the Court will inquire into confessions and statements made by persons in custody in order to see that no undue advantage is taken over such persons by reason of the opportunities possessed by their custodiers. The natural incidents of an apprehension or statements made by accused persons when not in custody are a totally different affair. In the present case I see nothing to suggest that any undue advantage was taken of the accused. Being thus of opinion that this last ground of appeal is also a bad one, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur. (After adverting to the other points)—On general principles it is evident that the rules as to admissibility of evidence of voluntary statements by accused persons apply to the evidence of police-officers as well as of members of the public. There are cases where the relation between the witness and the accused constitutes an objection, as where the witness is in a position of authority and has the opportunity of using pressure from which the accused requires protection. No such case is presented here. The appellant went up to the constable and spoke about his case. It is no part of the duty of a police-constable to warn every person who casually addresses him not to say anything in case it may be used in evidence against him. I think the evidence was properly admitted, and that the appeal should be refused.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I agree. On the question of the competency of the evidence it is sufficient for me that the statement was in the fullest sense volunteered. I do not think it doubtful that in such circumstances the evidence is competent.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

High Court.
Lord Young.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

On 9th December 1887, John Campbell was charged in the Sheriff Court at Portree, before the Sheriff-substitute (Glegg) on a summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, the charge against him being that "having on the 14th November 1887, within the inn at Dunvegan, found in money £1, he did deny having found the same, and did appropriate and thus steal the same."

The accused pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led, was found guilty of the crime of theft as libelled, and sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment.

Campbell obtained a case.

The Sheriff-substitute in the case stated that no objection had been taken to the relevancy of the complaint, and that he had found the following facts proved, viz.,—"That John Campbell, shoemaker, Hamuraviren, Glendale, had lost a £1 note on 14th November, which was a public market day, in or about the hotel at Dunvegan; that on the same day the appellant found a £1 note in one of the public drinking rooms of said hotel in which the said John Campbell, with others, had previously been; that the finding of the £1 note had been witnessed by several persons, one of whom asked the appellant to report his having found the note; that on 17th November the appellant denied to the said John Campbell having found a £1 note in said hotel on said day; that on the 18th November the appellant denied to one of the witnesses present at the finding that he had found a £1 note on said occasion; that prior to this, on said 18th November, the appellant's brother Murdo Campbell had told the said John Campbell that the appellant had found the money; that the appellant never returned a £1 note to Campbell; that on the last-mentioned date the appellant's brother Donald Campbell, on hearing that the police were making inquiries into the matter, sent a £1 note by the appellant's son to the said John Campbell."

The question of law was,—"Whether the facts above stated amounted to the crime of theft?"

At advising,—

Lord M'Laren.—This is an appeal on a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, and the question which we are asked to consider is whether the charge, upon which a conviction has followed, is a relevant charge. The complaint charges the accused with the theft of a £1 note. Under the recent statute it is perfectly clear that a case of this description might have been tried on a complaint which simply set forth that the accused did steal a £1 note without stating that the note was the property of anyone. But it appears to me, on a fair reading of the charge, that the Procurator-fiscal has not availed himself of the abridged forms provided by the new statute, and that in framing this charge he has undertaken to set forth a circumstantial case of theft, defining the charge by circumstances of time and place, such as are essential to a relevant charge under the old form. The charge stated that the accused "having, on 14th November 1887, within the Inn at Dunvegan, found in money one pound, he did deny having found the same, and did appropriate and thus steal the same." Now, in my opinion, that is not a relevant charge of theft, because everything set out might be true, and yet the accused might not be guilty of theft. I am not prepared to affirm that the mere finding of a £1 note coupled with a denial of having found it is tantamount to felonious appropriation. One would like to know who the owner of the note was, and whether the person to whom the accused is said to have denied having found it had a right to ask the question. The circumstances set out are only these two—that the accused found a £1 note, and that he denied having found it. Now, it may be morally wrong to deny having found a £1 note; on the other hand, such a denial, if addressed to a person who had no business to put the question, does not raise a presumption of theft.

In the result my opinion is that the Procurator-fiscal having undertaken by the form of the charge to set out such particulars as would amount to a charge of theft has failed to do so. He has, in the terms of the charge, given an argumentative statement of circumstances which he considers amount to theft, but which are also consistent with a possible case of innocence.

As the conviction proceeds on a charge which is not relevantly stated, it follows, in my opinion, that it ought to be quashed.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am sorry to be obliged to differ, but I differ entirely. We have here nothing to consider but whether this complaint is or is not relevant. The complaint states merely these two facts—that the accused found a £1 note, and that he appropriated it to his own use. Under the new Act "appropriate" is to be read as "feloniously appropriate," but that is really of no importance, for if a person finds a £1 note, and appropriates it to his own use, I think that is plainly theft, and nothing else.

LORD YOUNG.—Your Lordships have differed in opinion, and that, according to the constitution of this Court, gives me a vote.

I ventured to point out in the course of the discussion that the charge here is an argumentative charge, and that it is against the rule of our law to state charges argumentatively. It sets out that the accused found a £1 note, that he denied having found it, and that he appropriated it, and the argumentative conclusion from these facts is that he did steal the same. Now, I agree with Lord M'Laren that this conclusion does not necessarily follow from the facts on which it bears to proceed. A man may find a £1 note, and finding it, may deny having done so, and may appropriate it, and yet not be a thief. He may be a thief no doubt, but on the other hand, he may not—the conclusion of theft is not the necessary inference. There must be circumstances entitling a jury to attribute to the accused the animus furandi. A man of large property may find money in the street, and may give it in the way of alms to the next beggar: that is undoubtedly appropriation. Yet who would call it theft, even if the finder had denied having found it? His denial may be a very important circumstance, and if the whole other circumstances point to the conclusion of theft, then he may be rightly convicted. Another important circumstance is that the finder knew who the true owner was, but in this indictment it is not suggested to whom the £1 note belonged, or even that the prosecutor knew to whom it belonged. That is all the more inexcusable here, since according to our law—our common law, and apart from the recent statute—the modus of theft does not require to be set out in the indictment. All that our law requires is that the indictment should bear that accused "did steal" the article mentioned. But the particular circumstances being here set out, but insufficiently set out to warrant the inference of theft, there is or is not an act of theft according to the evidence. I am not prepared therefore to sustain this indictment, and I am the more disposed to take this strict course—if indeed it be a strict course—because I have grave doubts whether this case should ever have been prosecuted.

THE COURT sustained the appeal and quashed the conviction, with five guineas expenses.

Opinions, that in refusing access to the other two rooms he had not contra vened the statute, but that his conduct in doing so would have justified th magistrates in cancelling the licence.

High Court. Lord Young. Lord M'Laren. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Justiciary Clerk.

Robert Gunn, keeper of a common lodging-house at 12 Burnett' Close, Aberdeen, was charged in the Police Court of Aberdeen with havin "refused free access to part of his house" to two officers of the Loca Authority "on 30th September 1887 when required by them to give suc access, contrary to sec. 68 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867."*

Gunn pleaded not guilty, but was convicted. He took a case fo appeal.

The facts stated by the Magistrate were,—"A plan was produced by the complainer shewing two rooms, 2 and 2A on the ground floor, with a door of communication between them, and a door of communication between room 2 and the interior of the main house, and an outside door to Burnett's Close. The lodging-house register was produced, and it was proved that in May 1887 the appellant had fourteen rooms registered as each capable of accommodating lodgers, and that the above-mentioned two rooms were amongst that number. It was proved that upstairs, in the main house, was a room which was not in the register, and it was proved that at the registration of the house the said room had not been disclosed or shewn to the inspector. The only access to this room was from one of the registered rooms.

"It was proved that in August 1887 the tickets pertaining to rooms 2 and 2A, indicating the number of lodgers they were licensed for, had been returned by the appellant to the inspector, and that the appellant had then stated to the inspector that said two rooms were let to a monthly tenant, but that the inspector had refused to take the tickets.

"It was proved that the appellant's wife was in use to take the actual management of the lodging-house, and had at times the sole control of it in the absence of her husband.

"It was proved that between one and two o'clock in the morning of the date libelled two officers of the Local Authority called at the appellant's house for the purpose of inspecting it. On entering, they saw the appellant's wife, who, in answer to their inquiry for her husband, told them he was ill in bed. The officers explained to Mrs Gunn the object of their visit, and required her to give them access to rooms 2 and 2A. They found the door of communication between No. 2 and the main house locked, and Mrs Gunn refused to give access there, as she said these two rooms were let to tenants. One of the officers, on being cross-questioned, said that he believed said door was nailed up.

"The officers then proceeded upstairs, and required Mrs Gunn to give them access to the above-mentioned room there which was not in the register, and in the keyhole of the door of which they saw the stem of a key, shewing that the key was inside. Mrs Gunn answered that she could not give them access to that room, as the key was lost, and they did not get access to it.

* Sec. 68 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 101, provides that "the keeper of a common lodging-house shall at all times when required by any officer of Local Authority give him free access to such house and every part thereof."

"The officers admitted that in their previous visits to the house they had never asked access to said room, because they had not been aware of its existence. As to this room, it was proved in exculpation that some articles of lumber were kept in it, or had been seen in it by the witnesses.

"During the time the officers were insisting for access to said last-mentioned room, the appellant appeared. The officers did not ask him directly for access, but I held it as proved that he knew of their demand, and that he did not satisfy it.

"In exculpation it was proved by Robert Matthew and another that the former had occupied rooms 2 and 2A, as a tenant of the appellant, at a monthly rent since August; that the inner door of communication was locked and nailed up; that Matthew entered to these two rooms by the outside door from Burnett's Close; and that so long as the inner door of communication was nailed up access could not be had through the common lodging-house to said two rooms; but one of them admitted that he had only heard that it was nailed up."

It was further stated at the bar that the appellant applied in April 1887 to have his house, described as consisting of fourteen rooms of specified dimensions, licensed as a common lodging-house. In May the licence was granted, and an entry of the licence being granted was made in a book kept by the Local Authority, while the appellant had delivered to him a ticket for each room specifying its dimensions and the number of persons who were to be allowed to sleep in it.

The Magistrate held that the room on the first floor and the rooms 2 and 2A were parts of the licensed lodging-house. He convicted the appellant of "the contravention charged, viz., a contravention of the 68th section of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1887," and fined him 40s.

Argued for appellant;—The officers had a right of access only to the lodging-house, i.e., to the part of the building licensed as such. The definition of a common lodging-house in the Public Health Act, 1867, shewed that the lodging-house might be only part of the premises.* The statute could not be construed so as to give the officers right to enter the private dwelling-house of the keeper of a common lodging-house, if within the same building, at any hour of the night, and here the visit was after midnight. The lumber-room on the first floor was not separately licensed, nor was it part of the licensed rooms, and the refusal, or rather inability, to open it was not unreasonable even if the officers had a right to seek admission to it. As to the rooms 2 and 2A, the demand to enter them was a demand to enter the premises of the appellant's tenant, to whom he had let them after giving notice to the officers. The tenant might have prevented such access, and the appellant had no right to demand it. By having a licence as a common lodging-house keeper a man was not disabled from letting part of his house for a long perio though it might be that the magistrates might regard that as a reaso for not renewing the licence. Besides, the thing demanded was physi cally impossible. The door of communication had been nailed up. Th Magistrate had been satisfied of the bona fides both of the letting t a tenant and the completeness of the closing up the door of communi cation.

Argued for respondent;—(1) As to the room on the first floor, n reason could be given for the refusal of access to this room. It was jus part of the room which formed the only access to it, and was licensed (2) As to rooms 2 and 2A, a licence was given for a house after inspection of it as a whole, because it was thought suitable as a whole for the purpose. It did not appear that the magistrates would have licensed the house with these two rooms cut off it. A man could not get a licence for a house with many rooms, and then cut off a number and leave it a licensed house with few rooms. He must, if he wished to do that, come back and get a new licence for the diminished common lodging-house. If the appellant's contention were allowed, a man could easily overcrowd his licensed house, and if any fear of a visit of the officers arose, remove a number of guests to the unlicensed part of the house. One great object of the inspection would thus be defeated. The statute gave the officers free access to every part of the house. These words gave them right to inspect both 2 and 2A, and the room on the first floor.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a case of some interest, and one not unfitting to be brought to this Court by appeal. The appellant is a common lodging-house keeper, who holds a licence from the magistrates, obtained in May 1887. In the preceding month he had applied for a licence for his house 12 Burnett's Close, Aberdeen, and he obtained it in May, after inspection of the house, which is described as consisting of fourteen rooms. The dimensions of each room are specified. We are informed in the case that two rooms, distinguished as 2 and 2A, have a separate entrance from the close, and that in August after the licence was granted the appellant let these two rooms to a man named Matthew, as a monthly tenant, and that Matthew entered into occupation of them and continued to occupy them in September, when the inspectors visited the premises and desired access with a view to inspecting them. They were refused access to these rooms, on the ground that they were let to Matthew and he was in occupation of them, and the door of communication was nailed up. It was said that access could not be given in these circumstances.

On the same occasion the inspectors discovered another room which was not mentioned in the licence, but was obviously part of the same house. It was locked from the inside, as it appeared, for they saw a key in the lock which had been turned from the inside. They could not get into it, and admission was refused. Thereupon a prosecution was raised under section 68 of the Public Health Act for the offence of refusing admission to the officers of the Local Authority. The defence as to the two rooms was what I have already stated as the reason given to the inspectors for their not obtaining admission at the time, along with the other fact that in August, when the two rooms were let to Matthew, the appellant had returned to the inspector the tickets belonging to these rooms, stating that he had let them, and was not to use them in future as a part of the lodgings. The inspector refused to receive the tickets, or to regard the two rooms as other than part of the lodging-house.

The defence as to the other room was, that it was never included in the lodging-house, and was not one of the rooms specified in the licence.

The important question is as to the former rooms, No. 2 and No. 2A. It is, whether the keeper of a lodging-house, after having got a licence for his house, is entitled to cut off two rooms, shutting up the communicating door and leaving them to be entered from the close by the separate access. For my own part, I incline to think he was not, consistently with retaining the licence which he held. While it is not necessary to decide the point, that is the inclination of my opinion. I think so, because when the magistrates gave the licence they licensed the whole premises, so far as appears, and they might not have been willing to license the premises at all with these rooms cut off and separately occupied. I think the appellant was not at liberty to cut some rooms off and hold the licence as applicable to the rest.

But another question of interest arises. Did the licence disable the appellant from entering into the contract of lease with another party? I incline, on this question, to the opinion that it did not, and that (assuming the bona fides of the contract, which the Magistrate says nothing against) the appellant was at liberty to contract with Matthew. That being so, and the rooms having been cut off, and Matthew occupying them, I think the appellant was, in a question with Matthew, not only not bound, but not entitled to give the inspectors access. Matthew could have prevented the access being given, and a Court would give an interdict at his instance to prevent it. A third question arises connected with the others, on which also I shall only state the impression I have formed. What was the effect of letting the rooms to Matthew upon the licence? My impression is that the magistrates, when the appellant intimated what he had done, were entitled to cancel the licence as one the terms of which had been broken, for I think it was a violation of the implied understanding on which the licence was granted that several rooms were cut off from the house. If it had been then intimated to the appellant that if these rooms were cut off the rest could not be regarded as licensed, that would have founded another prosecution.

I have thought it right to indicate these views, impressions though they are, because the case has been argued to us and the questions are of public interest. But it is sufficient for my judgment that it is clear that the upper room was part of the house, and that there was no disability to give the access to it which the inspectors required, and which it was the appellant's duty to give. I am of opinion, without deciding as to the two rooms, that we ought to hold the evidence as to the upper room to be sufficient to warrant the charge and the conviction.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. As to the room which was never licensed I need say nothing, except that when such a room is not specified in the application for licence it is treated as an unoccupied room, and every unoccupied room is to be open to the inspection of the authorities.

As to the rooms described as 2 and 2A I have had some difficulty. On the whole I am of opinion that the statutory offence was not committed by refusal of access to these two rooms. If the keeper of the lodging-house simply let any other two rooms, which had no separate access to the street, to a monthly tenant, and intimated that he claimed to withdraw them from the licence, such would, I think, have been no good intimation at all. The rooms in the case supposed would be de facto part of the lodging-house, and could not be let except so to be under inspection. But here the case is different. The two rooms had separate access and the door of communication was nailed up. I think we mu read the case as if it had been built up with brick, for there is no suggestio that the nailing up was a sham. In these circumstances, the appellant was n longer in a position to give the access demanded. It was physically impossibl to do so without breaking into his tenant's house.

On the other questions I am inclined to agree with your Lordship. I thin it clear that the keeper of a common lodging-house cannot alter the condition of his licence by using a part of the house as was done here.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—On the point as to the upper room I see no difficulty. I think that unoccupied room was part of the licensed room with whic alone it had any communication, as much as if it had been a press off that room, and was to be treated as one and the same with it.

On the other points argued I prefer to say nothing.

The Court refused the appeal.

Soutar v. Stirling.

Soutar and Brown presented a bill of suspension and liberation against the Procurator-fiscal and the Magistrate.

They stated that the offence for which the Procurator-fiscal had asked that they should be punished, and for which the Magistrate had sentenced them, was perjury; that the conviction and sentence were wholly unwarranted; that they had not committed perjury; that they had told nothing but the truth; that the Magistrate had given effect to their evidence by dismissing the complaint; that no notes were taken of their evidence; that no complaint was brought against them charging them with perjury; that they were not asked to plead to such a charge; that no opportunity was afforded them of defending themselves; that no evidence was brought against them; and that the whole procedure was grossly irregular and illegal, and the sentence null and void.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The complainers having been convicted and sentenced for having committed perjury when there was no complaint before the magistrate charging them with such a crime, suspension and liberation should be granted as craved. (2) The said sentence having been pronounced incompetently, suspension and liberation should be granted as craved.

Argued for the complainers;—The offence which the magistrate really had in view in pronouncing this sentence was perjury, not prevarication,* and under the 27th section of the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1862 he had no power to sentence a witness summarily for perjury, nor had he such a power at common law, for perjury was a crime which could be punished only after trial on an indictment.[1] Further, the 27th section of the statute required that the nature of the offence should be set forth in the sentence. The "nature" of the offence could not possibly be merely its name. The particulars of the individual act of prevarication, as these appeared to the magistrate, were to be set forth. It would be impossible to set forth the name "shortly." The intention of the Legislature was to ensure that the magistrate when exercising this power of summary punishment for prevarication should let the Court have the means of judging whether what he regarded as an act of prevarication really was so, and of giving the witness redress if it was not. In Lawrie v. Roberts[1] the Court had so judged and given redress, which they would have been unable to do had the sentence been as bare of specification as it was here. In the case of Baxter[2] the deposition of the witness was ordered to be recorded at length, although that was a sentence by the High Court, from whose judgment there was no appeal. Whether Macleod v. Speirs[3] was rightly decided or not, it was a case at common law, and not under this statute.

Argued for the respondent;—The Magistrate had jurisdiction under the statute to sentence a witness for prevarication and wilful concealment of the truth, and the sentence here, which alone the Court could consider, bore to be for that crime. It was out of the question to maintain that the Magistrate meant perjury when he said prevarication. It was contended, however, that the sentence was invalid because it did not set forth "the nature of the offence" as required by the statute. But "nature" of the offence meant the "class" of offence to which the particular act belonged and not the details which constituted that particular act. The 27th section gave the Magistrate power to sentence not merely for prevarication but for other offences. To require him to specify the details of the particular act of prevarication would result in most, if not all, of such offences going unpunished. For prevarication was an offence the proof of which largely depended on the impression made on the mind of the Judge by the conduct of the witnesses, and that usually did not admit of exact specification in words. In Macleod v. Speirs the sentence was sustained although no particulars were given.

Lord Young.—In this suspension it appears that the magistrate, proceeding under clause 27 of the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1862, after trying a complaint under the Public-Houses Acts, sentenced two men, who had been examined as witnesses in the case, to be imprisoned for ten days for prevarication and wilful concealment of the truth. It is not doubtful that the statute does give magistrates trying such cases power to sentence witnesses to be imprisoned for a period not exceeding sixty days for this offence, but I should hope that it is a power which is rarely exercised. This Court, as the Supreme Court, has the power at common law to punish witnesses summarily for the wilful concealment of truth or prevarication, and this power has been exercised, in more remote times, not infrequently. Baron Hume refers to such punishments for the offence of prevarication as slitting the ears and nose, sentence to the pillory, and whipping, as well as sending to jail. In later times—but still somewhat remote from the present—the sentence has never exceeded a short term of imprisonment—an improvement in that respect; but so rare has been the exercise of this power in modern times that in my whole experience—now amounting to nearly half a century—I have never once seen it exercised. I remember being present in this Court when the learned Judge who presided was inclined to pronounce such a sentence, but the other two learned Judges who were sitting along with him dissented, and I have reason to know that their reason for dissenting was that they took a different view from the presiding Judge of the conduct of the witness. While he thought the witness had prevaricated, they thought he had not. That illustrates the danger of proceeding in a shorthand way to pronounce a sentence involving serious punishment. There was a case some twenty years ago—the case of Baxter, March 4, 1867, 5 Irv. 351—where a witness was sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment for prevarication, but in that case the Court thought so ill of the witness that they stopped the ordinary course of procedure and directed the deposition of the witness to be taken down by the Clerk of Court, which was done, and it was signed on each page by the witness and by the presiding Judge. That shews that it is an unusual kind of proceeding, requiring unusual caution, but I cannot help thinking, at the close of half a century's experience, that it would have been well if that sentence had not been pronounced.

The only instance recorded of a Sheriff punishing a witness by imprisonment for prevarication on oath is the case of Macleod v. Speirs (5 Coup. 387); therefore of common or customary law giving such a power to inferior Judges, there can be none. Here, however, undoubtedly the power is given by statute. But the statute which gives the power requires that not only the name of the offence, which is prevarication or concealment of the truth, but also its nature, shall be set forth shortly in the sentence awarding punishment. It is said that this requirement of the statute may act as a serious check upon the magistrate exercising this power of summary punishment. I should not be sorry if it did so operate, for if the magistrate cannot make clear the nature of the offence in his own mind, and formulate it in language, he should abstain from whipping, or that which now takes its place, imprisonment. Now, when the statute says that the nature of the offence shall be set forth shortly, that does not mean that the name of the offence merely shall be given. It clearly means that the magistrate is to set forth the facts, shortly but intelligently, which go to constitute the particular offence which in his opinion was committed. How do you set forth "shortly" the name of an offence consisting of one word? The language may not be happy, but I cannot read "nature" as equivalent to "name."

Now, if that is the true construction of the statute, the nature of the offence has certainly not been here set forth. It is at least possible that the magistrate may have misunderstood the nature of the offence referred to in the statute, and confused prevarication with perjury. If a witness denies anything on oath, but the magistrate, looking to the evidence of other witnesses, does not believe him, that is perjury, if the magistrate is right, but it is not prevarication, and it is admitted that it would have been incompetent under the statute for the magistrate to sentence for perjury, so that if the magistrate had set forth shortly the nature of the offence here it might have appeared that the case was not within the power given to him by the statute. When the counsel who appeared for the magistrate and for the procurator-fiscal, upon whose motion the magistrate proceeded, was invited by the Court to state what the offence was which the magistrate had as a fact before his mind, he declined to do so, which, combined with the newspaper report, which was read to us, confirms strongly the suggestion put forward by the appellant's counsel, that what the magistrate had in his mind was not prevarication but perjury. It is not a light matter to send a witness from the witness-box to jail on the impression of a bailie. It is a very serious interference with the liberty of the subject, and may destroy a man for life. It is not sending him to prison after trial, in which, having had due notice, he may bring forward evidence in support of his defence; it is a summary proceeding without trial aud without evidence beyond the mere impression of a magistrate.

Soutar v. Stirling.

I am therefore of opinion that this sentence is illegal, and must be set aside, with expenses.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur in the judgment proposed, and on the same grounds. It appears to me that when the statute prescribes that the sentence shall set forth shortly the "nature" of the offence of which the accused has been convicted, something more is meant than that the sentence should merely state the name of the crime. It may be a little difficult perhaps to do this shortly, but if the magistrate in the exercise of his powers does set forth to the best of his ability the particulars of the prevarication, the Court will not be disposed to set aside the sentence merely on technical grounds. On the other hand, the Court must be able to understand the nature of the false evidence upon which the magistrate proceeded, and which he thought intrinsically incredible. If the evidence did not bear out the sentence there would then be an opportunity of giving redress. The magistrate may have difficulty in setting forth shortly the particulars of the prevarication of which the accused was convicted, but while this is true, the answer is that the statute does not contemplate that every case of prevariation should be followed by a conviction and sentence. Indeed it is not desirable that such sentences should be pronounced except in very clear cases. If it is a clear case, then I cannot see why there should be a difficulty in setting forth what the witness said which was considered to be contradictory or untrue. Here the sentence gives no information. It has been stated that the actual offence was perjury (though this is contradicted), and that the magistrate misunderstood the nature of the offence with which he was dealing. I do not assume that the magistrate did anything of the kind. It is a sufficient ground for setting aside the sentence that the statutory requirement as to setting forth the nature of the offence has not been complied with.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—The case of Speirs has been cited to us. I do not wish to make any observation upon it. It does not bear upon this case. The point here is the construction of the statute; for it is plain that if the construction which your Lordships put on the statute is sound, the magistrate did not comply with the requirements of the statute. I am disposed to think that that construction is sound, and I therefore agree in your Lordships' judgment.

The Court passed the bill, and suspended the conviction and sentence complained of, with five guineas of modified expenses.

guilty.* He was indicted and served with a notice, conform to schedule L of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. Thereafter he was brought before the Sheriff and pleaded guilty. The Sheriff remitted him to the High Court for sentence.

Lyon was brought before the High Court for sentence at a sitting thereof held at Glasgow on 26th December 1887. It was then stated to the presiding Judge that he desired to withdraw his plea given before the Sheriff, and to plead not guilty.

Argued for Lyon;—An accused who had pleaded guilty and been remitted to the High Court for sentence, under the 31st section of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, was in pari casu with an accused who had been cited to that Court for a second diet under the 41st section of that Act. The course followed should be the same. The Court had power to review what took place before the Sheriff. That the Sheriff had only remitted for a specific purpose—the passing of sentence—could not limit the power of the Court.†

Her Majesty's Advocate v. Lyon.

The Advocate-Depute argued that sec. 41 applied only where the accused was cited to a second diet, and not to cases in which he had been remitted for sentence.

Lord M'Laren.—When this case was called the prisoner stated that he desired to withdraw his plea of guilty. If the accused has the right of withdrawing his plea it must be under the 41st section of the statute; no other section gives this power, and the question is whether the 41st section applies to summary proceedings initiated at the desire of the prisoner himself in the statutory form.

The ordinary procedure under the statute is commenced by indictment, which originates in the Sheriff Court, but unless followed by a plea of guilty is carried at once into the High Court of Justiciary. It is not necessary that any remit should be made by the Sheriff for this purpose. On the contrary, it rather appears that in certain cases the case is predetermined from the beginning to be a High Court case. The details of this procedure are to be found in sections 25 to 30 of the Criminal Procedure Act, and in a subsequent part of the Act we are told how the case is to be dealt with when it comes into the High Court.

The present action, however, was instituted under section 31, the procedure under which appears to have been intended as a distinct form of summary conviction. The section begins—"Where a person accused shall give written notice to the crown agent through his own procurator that he desires to have his case at once disposed of, and declares his intention to plead guilty, it shall be lawful to serve such person with an indictment and a notice conform to Schedule L to appear at a diet not less than four clear days after such notice before the Sheriff before whom under this Act he would be cited to a first diet." This kind of procedure can only be instituted by consent of the prisoner, and in pursuance of his declared intention to plead guilty. The form prescribed by the statute is one which does not contain any provision for going to trial under the charge. Thus it is provided that "it shall not be necessary to lodge or give notice of any list of witnesses or productions, other than productions to prov previous convictions." But what makes the matter clear beyond doubt is tha in the case of the prisoner changing his mind when brought before the Sherif then "the diet shall be deserted pro loco et tempore, and thereafter the procedur against the person accused may be according to the other provisions of this Act. If it had been in the contemplation of the Legislature that such a thing coul take place as the withdrawal of the plea of guilty after the accused had bee remitted to the High Court for sentence, there would have been some provisio made for the disposal of the case in that event, but there is none. If I were allow this plea to be withdrawn, the case could not go to trial, and I see th greatest objection to a course which lays upon the Advocate-Depute the necessi of deserting the diet at the will of the accused.

Upon these considerations I have come to be clearly of opinion that the pr visions as to withdrawal of a plea under the 41st section have no relation to pr

Indictment—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35, secs. 5 and 8.—The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 5, enacts that it shall not be necessary in any indictment to specify by any nomen juris the crime which is charged, but it shall be sufficient that the indictment sets forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime.

Sec. 8 enacts that it shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done or omitted to be done "wilfully" or "maliciously," or "wickedly and feloniously," or "falsely and fraudulently," or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged, but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which according to the existing law and practice its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant.

A B was convicted before a Sheriff and a jury upon an indictment which bore —"The charge against you is that, on 10th March 1888, you did, in the shop . . . pretend to A S that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce the said A S to deliver to you at Elm Row, Edinburgh, on 18th March 1888 a piano, which you appropriated to your own use, without paying or intending to pay therefor."

At the trial it was proved that accused went to a shop, got possession of a piano at a price payable in quarterly instalments extending over three years, and, after paying one of the instalments of the price, sold it. The accused was found guilty as libelled, and sentenced accordingly.

The Court (diss. Lord Rutherfurd Clark) suspended the sentence, Lord M'Laren holding that falsehood and fraud were facts necessary to support the charge, and that as the indictment did not set forth these it was not relevant,—Lord Young, while concurring with Lord M'Laren, resting his judgment on the ground that the case proved was one of theft, and that the indictment was not fitted for the sole trial of a charge of theft.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Young.
Ld. M'Laren.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

JOHN MORGAN DINGWALL was on 10th May 1888 tried before the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles (Crichton) and a jury upon an indictment, at the instance of the Lord Advocate, in the following terms:—"The charge against you is, that on 10th March 1888 you did, in the shop in George Street, Edinburgh, occupied by the firm of Paterson & Sons, music sellers, pretend to Archibald Miller Dalrymple Sommerville, a partner of said firm, that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce the said Archibald Miller Dalrymple Sommerville, or his said firm, to deliver to you, at Elm Row, Edinburgh, on 13th March 1888, a piano, which you appropriated to your own use, without paying or intending to pay therefor."

The jury, by a majority, found the complainer guilty as libelled, and the Sheriff (Crichton) sentenced him to four months' imprisonment.

Dingwall thereupon presented a bill of suspension and liberation, in which he stated,—"The evidence disclosed that the complainer had obtained a piano from Messrs Paterson & Sons, mentioned in the indictment, at a price of £39, payable by quarterly instalments extending over a period of three years. He had duly paid the first instalment, and the second had not become due at the date of his trial. Only one witness, namely, Mr Sommerville, mentioned in the indictment, was adduced by the respondent in support of the false representation charged in the indictment. For the complainer evidence was adduced establishing (1) that he had been for many years a clerk in the branch of the Royal Bank at Perth, where he had discharged the duties of teller; and (2) that he had been for about a year prior to and including 10th March 1888, clerk in the branch of that bank at Leith."

These averments were substantially admitted, subject to the explanation that Mr Sommerville's testimony was merely a link in a chain of evidence, and that the accused had given up his situation at Leith on 10th March before going to Paterson's shop, and that there were other facts laid before the jury which plainly shewed the complainer's guilt.

The suspender pleaded;—(1) The charge against the complainer having been one of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and no sufficient legal evidence having been adduced against him of the false representations libelled in the indictment, he should have been assoilzied simpliciter and dismissed from the bar. (2) The complainer having been convicted of the crime charged upon the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness, the conviction should be set aside. (3) The complainer is further entitled to suspension and liberation in respect that, according to the evidence adduced, no crime was committed.

When the case came up for hearing, the question was asked from the bench, whether, apart from the other grounds of suspension, the indictment was relevant.

Argued for the suspender;—(1) The indictment was irrelevant. The recent Act, by section 8,* had made it unnecessary to use qualifying words such as "falsely and fraudulently," but it was only intended that these words should be implied where the words of the indictment of themselves necessarily involved a criminal charge. Section 5 provided that the indictment must set forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime. It was not a crime by the law of Scotland to order and get goods not intending to pay for them—Hall, March 25, 1881, 4 Coup. 438, 8 R. (Just. Ca.) 28. But even if it were, this charge had been disproved, the accused having paid one instalment of the price. The crime charged was falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, or it was nothing, and to constitute that offence it was necessary that the representation made should be false, and should be made with intent to defraud. "Pretend" did not necessarily mean "falsely pretend," but was equivalent to "represent." All that the suspender had represented to Sommerville was true, except perhaps that he had just come from Perth. The truth was that he had removed from Perth a year ago. Then in addition it was necessary to set forth that the false statement was made with intent to defraud. The accused might have falsely represented himself to be a teller, but unless he did so with the purpose to defraud there was no crime. This additional fact of fraudulent purpose was not stated. It was absurd to say that a statement of it was implied by the statute. No charge of fraud was made in the indictment. The accused might, without intending to do so, have induced the shopkeeper to give him credit by the false statement, but unless he did so with the purpose to defraud there was no crime. The object of an indictment was to inform the accused of the charge against him, and it was therefore unreasonable to sustain an indictment which did not specify any criminal act. The statute could not be regarded as intended to provide a store of allegations of fact which the prosecutor could import into his indictments when it suited his convenience. The present indictment received no countenance from the form "Norah Omond" given in schedule A. That was a charge of theft. (2) Even if the indictment were held to be relevant, the sentence should be suspended, because the crime lay in the false and fraudulent statement made, and to that statement there was only one witness, Sommerville.

* The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 5, enacts that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to specify by any nomen juris the crime which is charged, but it shall be sufficient that the indictment sets forth facts relevant and sufficient to constitute an indictable crime."

Sec. 8 enacts that "it shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done or omitted to be done 'wilfully' or 'maliciously,' or 'wickedly and feloniously,' or 'falsely and fraudulently,' or 'knowingly,' or 'culpably and recklessly,' or 'having good reason to know,' or 'well knowing the same to have been stolen,' or to use any similar words or expressions qualifying any act charged; but such qualifying allegation shall be implied in every case in which according to the existing law and practice its insertion would be necessary in order to make the indictment relevant."

Schedule A gives examples of indictments, and, inter alia, the following—"You did pretend to Norah Omond, residing there, that you were a collector of subscriptions for a charitable society, and did thus induce her to deliver to you £1, 1s. of money as a subscription thereto, which you appropriated to your own use."

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The objection to relevancy should have been taken at the first diet.[1] (2) The indictment was not irrelevant. The Act of 1887, by sec. 8, supplied the words "falsely and fraudulently," and it supplied a form in schedule A (against Norah Omond), which precisely applied. (3) It was not the accused's statement to Sommerville which alone went to the jury, but the whole chain of evidence, in which it was only a link. The accused's story was false in several particulars. He had not just left Perth, he was not a teller at Leith, but had left his employment there that day. The jury were the proper judges of the sufficiency of the evidence and of the accused's criminality looking to all the circumstances of the case.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a bill of suspension of a sentence pronounced by the Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles on a charge which is fully set forth in the statement of facts. The first question argued was that of the relevancy of the charge, which is or professes to be in the form provided under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. It is not unnatural that in the working of a new statute such questions should arise. I shall preface what I have to say with one or two observations on what I conceive to be the scope and object of the provisions of the statute. It has abolished what was the major proposition under the old form, and not only so, but the statute makes it unnecessary that the indictment should set forth the particular denomination of the offence for which the accused is to be tried. For example, it is not necessary to say to the accused as formerly,—"You are accused of the crime of theft." The whole charge is comprised in the statement of the facts which constitute a crime. Now, I must qualify that to this extent, that it appears to me to be part of the plan of the statute that where a crime has a well-known name, that name should in some form be introduced into the charge,—for example, in a charge of theft, it is to be said that the accused did "steal" an article, and I should not support suc charge as relevant without the use of that word. And so with the crimes assault and murder. As to those crimes, however, in charging which it was custom in the old form in describing the offence to use expletive expressi such as wickedly and feloniously, wilfully and maliciously, or falsely and frau lently, it is provided that all such expressions shall be implied. The stat (sec. 8) calls them "qualifying" expressions, and gives the words I have quot and similar expressions, as illustrations of such qualifying expressions. Wh so interpreted, I can hardly doubt that the omission of such expressions is improvement, for it is an improvement to leave out superfluous words. But wh the crime charged consists of acts that might be innocent in themselves, and a case where the question whether or not they are criminal depends on t quality attaching to them, it is a totally different proposition to say that t words describing that quality may be omitted. For example, a person may s fire to property innocently, or wilfully in order to spite someone else or to defra insurers. In the last case the attempt to defraud insurers is a necessary ingredie in the offence, and must be set out according to this statute, for I find in one the examples in schedule A that in such a case the act is to be charged as do "with intent to defraud the Liverpool, London, and Globe Insurance Company

It therefore appears to me to be consistent with the principle of a libel in th new form that where fraud is an ingredient in the description of the offence must be set forth. Now, in this case the crime is what is called in popula terms the obtaining of goods on false pretences. The essence of the offence i the falsity of the representations. It is not an offence to obtain goods on credi on a true representation, even though the person so obtaining them has not th means of paying for them. The crime consists in doing so by falsehood an fraud, and the case is, therefore, like the illustrative case I have mentioned I should therefore think this not a case where the statement of fraud should b omitted, but one in which it was necessary that those representations should b characterised in the charge as false representations. Now, the charge is that in certain premises the accused did "pretend" to a certain person "that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce" that person "to deliver to you . . . a piano which you appropriated to your own use without paying or intending to pay therefor." It is said that the word "pretend" is a sufficient intimation that a false pretence is intended to be charged. Unless that contention is well founded I think there is not even the colour of relevancy about the indictment. The argument then is, that "pretend" implies a false pretence, and it is supported by referring to one of the illustrative forms in the schedule which sets forth that ". . . . you did pretend to Norah Omond, residing there, that you were a collector of subscriptions for a charitable society, and did thus induce her to deliver to you one pound one shilling of money as a subscription thereto, which you appropriated to your own use." If this form had been in all respects applicable to the present case I should decide against the objection, for we are bound by the words of the schedule. But when we look more narrowly into the words of the illustrative case in the schedule, it appears uncertain whether the case mentioned in it is meant as a statement of falsehood and fraud, or of dishonest appropriation of property, the new nomen juris introduced by the statute. A libel in the form I have read would be sufficient to justify a conviction of theft. But the difficulty here is that while the words "pretend" and "induce" are used, and delivery of goods is set forth, there is nothing criminal in the appropriation of the piano unless it was obtained by false pretences, and therefore there is no relevant charge unless "pretend" is to be read as equivalent to "falsely pretend." We are told that the facts of the case amounted to a theft, that the suspender obtained the piano on hire, and immediately sold it. But that was not the case in the charge.

I have been unable to satisfy myself that it was enough to state that the accused "pretended" what is stated in the libel. In short, I think that the word "false" was necessary to the definition of the crime, and so must appear in this charge, though it be not necessary when the terms used in an indictment necessarily disclose a crime.

I think, therefore, that the indictment was not relevant, and in that view it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the remaining grounds of suspension.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I entirely differ from the opinion just delivered by Lord M'Laren. I think the indictment was relevant, and in accordance with the statute. It is remarkable that the relevancy of the indictment was not challenged in the Sheriff Court, or before us, by the suspender's counsel. The suggestion to impeach it came from the bench. The statute has introduced a new form. We have nothing to do with whether it is better or worse. We have simply to administer the law as it now stands, and to sustain the charge if in accordance with the statute.

The statute says in section 2 that an "indictment may be in accordance with the forms contained in schedule A appended to this Act, or as nearly conform thereto as the circumstances permit." As I read that provision, it means that the schedule prescribes forms which the prosecutor may use lawfully, and if the case is described by him as these forms permit he is making a relevant indictment. I think it ludicrous to say that if the forms which the schedule prescribes are exactly followed there is yet no relevant indictment. That is, however, I think, the necessary result if we hold this indictment irrelevant, if it is in the statutory form. Now, I turn to see the form which the prosecutor may use, and I find this form—"You did pretend to Norah Omond that you were a collector of subscriptions for a charitable society, and did thus induce her to deliver to you £1, 1s. of money as a subscription thereto, which you appropriated to your own use." Now, it seems to me that that is what we have, mutatis mutandis, in this indictment; for it says, "you did pretend to" Mr Sommerville "that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce" him "to deliver to you . . . a piano which you appropriated to your own use without paying or intending to pay therefor." How is it possible to say that that, which is in accordance with the statutory form, is not a relevant indictment? I cannot see it. The pretence, of course, as the statute assumes, is different. The person pretending is not always pretending to be a collector of subscriptions. But I cannot see that there is the smallest deviation from the statutory form, and if there is no deviation from the form which the prosecutor may lawfully use I cannot hold the indictment irrelevant. In judging of that we must not look at facts disclosed at or after the trial, but must treat the case solely as it stood before the trial.

It is suggested that the form I have quoted from the schedule is a form for some new offence called dishonest appropriation. I would have no hesitation said that the accused did "steal" an article, and I should not support such a charge as relevant without the use of that word. And so with the crimes of assault and murder. As to those crimes, however, in charging which it was the custom in the old form in describing the offence to use expletive expressions such as wickedly and feloniously, wilfully and maliciously, or falsely and fraudulently, it is provided that all such expressions shall be implied. The statute (sec. 8) calls them "qualifying" expressions, and gives the words I have quoted, and similar expressions, as illustrations of such qualifying expressions. When so interpreted, I can hardly doubt that the omission of such expressions is an improvement, for it is an improvement to leave out superfluous words. But when the crime charged consists of acts that might be innocent in themselves, and in a case where the question whether or not they are criminal depends on the quality attaching to them, it is a totally different proposition to say that the words describing that quality may be omitted. For example, a person may set fire to property innocently, or wilfully in order to spite someone else or to defraud insurers. In the last case the attempt to defraud insurers is a necessary ingredient in the offence, and must be set out according to this statute, for I find in one of the examples in schedule A that in such a case the act is to be charged as done "with intent to defraud the Liverpool, London, and Globe Insurance Company."

It therefore appears to me to be consistent with the principle of a libel in the new form that where fraud is an ingredient in the description of the offence it must be set forth. Now, in this case the crime is what is called in popular terms the obtaining of goods on false pretences. The essence of the offence is the falsity of the representations. It is not an offence to obtain goods on credit on a true representation, even though the person so obtaining them has not the means of paying for them. The crime consists in doing so by falsehood and fraud, and the case is, therefore, like the illustrative case I have mentioned. I should therefore think this not a case where the statement of fraud should be omitted, but one in which it was necessary that those representations should be characterised in the charge as false representations. Now, the charge is that in certain premises the accused did "pretend" to a certain person "that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce" that person "to deliver to you . . . a piano which you appropriated to your own use without paying or intending to pay therefor." It is said that the word "pretend" is a sufficient intimation that a false pretence is intended to be charged. Unless that contention is well founded I think there is not even the colour of relevancy about the indictment. The argument then is, that "pretend" implies a false pretence, and it is supported by referring to one of the illustrative forms in the schedule which sets forth that ". . . . you did pretend to Norah Omond, residing there, that you were a collector of subscriptions for a charitable society, and did thus induce her to deliver to you one pound one shilling of money as a subscription thereto, which you appropriated to your own use." If this form had been in all respects applicable to the present case I should decide against the objection, for we are bound by the words of the schedule. But when we look more narrowly into the words of the illustrative case in the schedule, it appears uncertain whether the case mentioned in it is meant as a statement of falsehood and fraud, or of dishonest appropriation of property, the new nomen juris introduced by the statute. A libel in the form I have read would be sufficient to justify a conviction of theft. But the difficulty here is that while the words "pretend" and "induce" are used, and delivery of goods is set forth, there is nothing criminal in the appropriation of the piano unless it was obtained by false pretences, and therefore there is no relevant charge unless "pretend" is to be read as equivalent to "falsely pretend." In short, I think that the word "false" was necessary to the definition of the crime, and so must appear in this charge, though it be not necessary when the terms used in an indictment necessarily disclose a crime.

I think, therefore, that the indictment was not relevant, and in that view it becomes unnecessary for me to consider the remaining grounds of suspension.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I entirely differ from the opinion just delivered by Lord M'Laren. I think the indictment was relevant, and in accordance with the statute. It is remarkable that the relevancy of the indictment was not challenged in the Sheriff Court, or before us, by the suspender's counsel. The suggestion to impeach it came from the bench. The statute has introduced a new form. We have nothing to do with whether it is better or worse. We have simply to administer the law as it now stands, and to sustain the charge if in accordance with the statute.

The statute says in section 2 that an "indictment may be in accordance with the forms contained in schedule A appended to this Act, or as nearly conform thereto as the circumstances permit." As I read that provision, it means that the schedule prescribes forms which the prosecutor may use lawfully, and if the case is described by him as these forms permit he is making a relevant indictment. I think it ludicrous to say that if the forms which the schedule prescribes are exactly followed there is yet no relevant indictment. That is, however, I think, the necessary result if we hold this indictment irrelevant, if it is in the statutory form. Now, I turn to see the form which the prosecutor may use, and I find this form—"You did pretend to Norah Omond that you were a collector of subscriptions for a charitable society, and did thus induce her to deliver to you £1, 1s. of money as a subscription thereto, which you appropriated to your own use." Now, it seems to me that that is what we have, mutatis mutandis, in this indictment; for it says, "you did pretend to" Mr Sommerville "that you had just come from the Royal Bank at Perth, and had been promoted to be teller in the branch of that bank at Leith, and did thus induce" him "to deliver to you . . . a piano which you appropriated to your own use without paying or intending to pay therefor." How is it possible to say that that, which is in accordance with the statutory form, is not a relevant indictment? I cannot see it. The pretence, of course, as the statute assumes, is different. The person pretending is not always pretending to be a collector of subscriptions. But I cannot see that there is the smallest deviation from the statutory form, and if there is no deviation from the form which the prosecutor may lawfully use I cannot hold the indictment irrelevant. In judging of that we must not look at facts disclosed at or after the trial, but must treat the case solely as it stood before the trial.

It is suggested that the form I have quoted from the schedule is a form for some new offence called dishonest appropriation. I would have no hesitation in reading it as a new form for the old charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and nothing else. I would read the charge turning it into the language of the former style, as stating that the accused falsely and fraudulently pretended to Norah Omond such and such things, and by these or similar false and fraudulent pretences induced her to deliver to him £1, 1s. The purpose of the new form was to make it unnecessary to insert words which the Legislature thought unnecessary. Though it is said "pretend" does not necessarily mean "falsely pretend," it is plain that that is the sense, and the only sense, in which the word is here used, and that it means a false and fraudulent pretence, successful in its intention of inducing the delivery of the piano to the accused. Now, with that in view, the statute says,—"It shall not be necessary in any indictment to allege that any act of commission or omission therein charged was done or omitted to be done 'wilfully' or 'maliciously,' or 'wickedly and feloniously,' or 'falsely and fraudulently,'" and so on. These words are now not to be inserted but implied. That plainly applies to any species of indictment which the prosecutor may use. I must apply it to this indictment. I think I should not be doing my duty if I did not. I think it is a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and nothing else. It may be an unfounded charge, but with that we have nothing to do. It may be that the true offence committed was theft. But we have to consider simply whether it was a relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. I see no shadow of doubt on that point. I think we depart violently from the statute if we decide otherwise, and I protest against such a decision as strongly as I can do.

So much for the ground of suspension which the suspender did not plead. Now for the ground he did plead, on which there is a good deal to be said. The point he maintained was that there was not legal evidence for a conviction, for this case of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition consisted in a false story alleged to be told to and to have imposed on Sommerville, and he was not corroborated by any other evidence. I say I think there is a good deal in that argument, for it did not appear that there was any direct confirmation of Sommerville's statement as to the story told to him. I am somewhat puzzled as to the state of the law on the question of the power to raise such a plea in a bill of suspension. I do not think it necessary to say more than that I give no formal opinion one way or the other, for it is not necessary to this case. This indictment contains another important matter of charge against the panel in the words "without paying or intending to pay therefor," which set forth a fraudulent purpose. The jury were satisfied of that. I take it for granted that a number of circumstances connected with the panel must have been proved to the jury to satisfy them of the fraudulent purpose. I must take that for granted. The case did not therefore stand on a mere bare charge of false pretence, but was supplemented by evidence as to the panel's practices in connection with the transaction. I think I must therefore hold that there was evidence to go to a jury, and if the jury were satisfied, that is a ground for sustaining the conviction.

On the first of the two questions, therefore, whether the charge was relevant, I am of opinion that it was; on the second, whether there was any evidence for a conviction, I think the Sheriff acted rightly in letting it go to a jury. The question whether it might have been charged as a different crime is not before us. On both questions which are before us I have a clear opinion in the affirmative.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a suspension and liberation. We are accustomed in such a process to get at the truth of the case as well as we can, and to apply the law to these facts, and ascertain whether the punishment has been well and lawfully applied. We have no record. It is a bill of suspension, and this Court being one of peremptory diets, we always proceed on the bill, and do not consider ourselves bound by the omission of any statement of pleas. With mere technicality we have never greatly concerned ourselves, and I hope we shall not begin now, for that would lead to procedure which we should abstain from, and would end in a record having to be made up. All that, I think, is stated in our text writers.

What we have then to consider is whether this conviction is good or not, having regard to the truth of the case. The Sheriff is required to take and preserve notes, and we might have called for these, but with the Lord Advocate as prosecutor, and appearing personally, there is no difficulty in getting at the true facts. It was explained to us frankly on both sides that the truth of the matter (though details are in controversy), was that the accused went to a shop and hired out a piano on the three years' system, the hire being by quarterly payments, and the undertaking of the owner being that it should become the property of the hirer at the end of the period if the hire was paid, and that the accused having so got the piano on hire, within three days sold it. We are familiar with the case of a thief getting access to property by hiring it. If the accused was a thief like that, hiring the piano to steal it, there was no difficulty in charging that. The Lord Advocate said at the debate that it was so, and that it should have been charged as theft; I think so too. That is the nature of the case. If that then is the truth of the case, and if it ought to have been so tried, it might or might not have been established. The jury might have thought, as Mr M'Lennan suggested, that the suspender was not so much a knave as a fool, that he, to evade a temporary necessity, acted as he did, but that if the three years had gone on, and he had paid up the hire, he would never have been a thief. I do not say that was the truth, but it may have been, and I think it ought to have been tried as a case of that kind, and not as a question of whether he had just come from Perth, or been bill-clerk or teller. I think this indictment was not suited for the satisfactory or reasonably safe trial of the real case. That of itself is sufficient for the interference of the Court in a suspension. If the actual case is not presented and tried that is a reason for our interference.

I am of opinion that taking the indictment as what it is represented to be, viz., a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, it is not relevant. I agree with Lord M'Laren that where falsehood is of the essence of the charge—that is, necessary to the criminality of the fact alleged—it ought to be stated, and that where fraud is of the essence of the crime it ought to be set forth. The statute does not dispense with that. It dispenses with expletive words. But if an act is criminal or not according as it is done falsely or fraudulently or not, then the allegation that it is so done is not epithet or superfluous language, but is essential to the crime. I understand my learned brother to proceed on one of the statutory forms, which is,—"You did pretend to Norah Omond . . . . . that you were a collector of subscriptions for a charitable society, and did thus induce her to deliver to you £1, 1s., as a subscription thereto, which you appropriated to your own use." I understood him to say that that is a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. I do not think so. Let me put the case of its being proved at the trial on such a charge that all the accused stated was true, would the charge fall? He got the person to whom he made these true pretences to hand him £1, 1s. as a subscription, and he appropriated it. It would be no answer that that pretence was true. Yet that is supposed to be a specimen charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition. It would be extravagant to say that if the essence of the crime is unproved in fact, yet the charge could be sustained, and of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition the essence is falsehood and fraud. Apply that to this case, and suppose every word of the alleged pretence true, is there crime in that? There is no contract of sale, no contract of anything implying the necessity of immediate payment. I should appeal to the specimen charge as toto cœlo different. In the one the truth is no answer, in the other the truth removes every feature of the crime; merely to get a piano without the intention of paying is no crime. If the person has not stolen it or tricked the owner out of it, it is extravagant to say that getting it without intending to pay for it is a crime. Will anyone tell me a good reason for omitting to charge fraud if it is of the essence of the charge? To save unnecessary writing? If so, many words here are unnecessary. The prosecutor's name is unnecessary. That might be implied, for he is always the same, so also "by authority of the Lord Advocate" is unnecessary. There is no excuse for omitting the essence of the charge.

I am content to put my judgment on the first ground I stated, and I prefer it, though I unhesitatingly give my opinion that where fraud is necessary to make an act criminal that ought to be set forth. That seems to me as clear a proposition as any of those that appear so clear to my learned brother. But in this suspension we should attend to the true case, and as that was not put to the jury, the conviction must be set aside.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I should like to be allowed to add that if I had thought there was here any case of oppression or of miscarriage of justice I should not have hesitated to give relief. I do not think there was either, According to the facts stated, I think the case was well libelled as a charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition, and the jury have found it proved.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should only like to add on the first point that every libel must, in my opinion, set forth a crime,—must set forth what conveys the notion of a crime. I think this indictment does not.

THE COURT set aside the conviction.

High Court.
Lord Young.
Lord M'Laren.
Lord Rutherfurd Clark.
Justiciary Clerk.

On 8th February 1888 John Dickson, residing in Gilmore Place, Edinburgh, was charged in the Edinburgh Police Court on a summary complaint at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, the charge against him being "that contrary to the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, section 261,* upon the 2d of February 1888, he had in his possession, as or for human food, in the premises in Fountainbridge Street, Edinburgh, occupied by the firm of Thomas Dickson & Sons, auctioneers, there, thirty-four pounds weight of butcher meat, videlicet, veal of an unsound and unwholesome description, and in a state unfit and unsuitable for human food."

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted, and fined £10.

He obtained a case.

The questions of law were:—"(1) Is the said conviction against the appellant inept, in respect that the procedure was not in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and that no record was preserved of the witnesses examined; or is it sufficient that the procedure was in terms of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879? (2) Was the appellant, in view of the facts proved, in possession, as or for human food, of the said veal on the date and in the premises libelled?"

The case stated:—"The cause was called in Court upon the 8th day of February 1888. No objections were stated to the relevancy of the complaint, and the appellant having pleaded not guilty, the diet was continued till the 13th February 1888, upon which date the cause went to trial. The appellant's plea of not guilty and the names of the witnesses examined were not entered upon the record, the forms of complaint and subsequent procedure in the cause being similar in all respects to that adopted in cases for offences against the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, and in use in the Edinburgh City Police Court for many years prior to the passing of the said Act." The case then set forth the enactments quoted below.†

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxii.), sec. 261, enacts:—"Every person who shall sell or expose to sale, or have in his possession, as or for human food, the carcase, or any part of the carcase, of any animal which shall appear to have died of or been killed in consequence of disease, or any butcher meat, fish, poultry, or other article of provision of an unsound or unwholesome description, or in a state unfit or unsuitable for human food, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20, and the articles shall be forfeited and disposed of as the Judge of police shall direct."

† The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. cxxxii.), sec. 324, provides—that "the rules, regulations, and forms of procedure at the commencement of this Act shall continue, in so far as is in accordance with the provisions of this Act, to be operative until the same be cancelled, revoked, or altered under authority of this Act."

Sec. 325, enacts,—"No record other than is required by the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, shall be kept of the proceedings except the complaint and the judgment pronounced thereon."

The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 3, provides, inter alia, that "where there is a general or local Police Act in force it shall be optional in police prosecutions either to use the forms prescribed by such Act, or the forms provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts."

The following enactment was also referred to at the hearing,—Summary Pro-

No. 25.

Dickson v. Linton.

The case further stated,—"It was proved by evidence adduced that the appellant is a hide and tallow merchant and dead meat salesman in Fountainbridge Street, Edinburgh, where he carries on business under the firm or designation of Thomas Dickson & Son. That on the day libelled, between one and two o'clock in the afternoon, the inspectors of markets for the city of Edinburgh, while visiting the premises of the appellant in Fountainbridge Street aforesaid, found hanging there the veal libelled.

"That the said veal was the carcase of a calf, dressed in the usual way as or for human food, which had been when killed suffering from some inflammatory disease, and was unmistakably unfit and unsuitable for human food.

"That the said veal had been consigned by Robert Dick, a farmer at Biggar, to the appellant's said firm, at his said premises for the purpose of sale, without previous notice of the said consignment being sent to the said firm, and had been delivered there between seven and eight o'clock on the morning of the 2d February 1888 by the railway company's servants to one of the appellant's employees, who hung it up beside the other meat for sale in the appellant's premises.

"The appellant himself was present in the premises when the veal was seized by the inspectors, and for some hours previously."

Argued for the appellant;—(1) The sentence should be quashed, inasmuch as it failed to comply with the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. There was here no list of witnesses. The 3d section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 did not make this unnecessary. It only saved "forms," and under the Edinburgh Act of 1879 there were no forms. (2) The conviction was bad in law. The magistrate was not entitled to convict unless the accused knew that the meat was in his premises, and that it was unsound. Here neither element of knowledge was found by the magistrate as matter of fact. The facts stated consequently did not, in law, warrant the conviction.

Lord Young.—We do not think it necessary to call for a reply.

The first question is so simple as this,—Was the conviction inept because the procedure was not in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but in terms of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879? This was a prosecution in the Edinburgh Police Court for a contravention of section 261 of the Edinburgh Police Act, 1879. By section 324 of that Act it is provided that "the rules, regulations, and forms of procedure at the commencement of this Act shall continue, in so far as in accordance with the provisions of this Act, to be operative until the same be cancelled, revoked, or altered under authority of this Act." Now, it is admitted that this prosecution for a contravention of section 261 of the Act was in accordance with the forms prescribed by the Act and in use at its commencement, and that there has been no cancellation, revocation, or alteration of them. I am therefore of opinion that this first objection to the conviction is untenable, and that the first question must be answered in the negative.

The second question is in a form which we have sometimes sustained, but only, I think, in circumstances of a very special character, for it is a form which is generally attended with great inconvenience. The question runs thus:—

cedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 16,—"It shall not be necessary in any proceeding under the authority of this Act to record or to preserve a note of the evidence adduced, but the record shall set forth in the form of the schedule I. to this Act annexed, the respondent's plea, if any, the names of the witnesses, if any, examined upon oath or affirmation, with a note of any documentary evidence that may be put in."

Dickson v. Linton.

"Was the appellant, in view of the facts proved, in possession, as or for human food, of the said veal on the date and in the premises libelled?" In short it is put to us as a question of law whether, in view of the facts found proved, the magistrate was entitled to convict. Now, I have had occasion to point out frequently that an appeal on a case stated must be on a question or questions of law, and on questions of law only. It is an appeal, although it is in the form of a case stated, and the statute authorises such an appeal only upon a question or questions of law. The provision of the Statute of 1875, section 3, is as follows:—"On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst, notwithstanding any provision contained in the Act under which such cause shall have been brought excluding appeals against or review in any manner of way of any determination, judgment, or conviction, or complaint under such Act," and so on. Now, in order to entitle a party to apply for a case under the statute, he must express his dissatisfaction with the determination of the Judge as erroneous in point of law, and state to the Judge the legal error under which he thinks the Judge is labouring, and must ask the Judge to state a case setting forth the facts, as the Judge holds them to have been proved, which bear upon that alleged legal error. If the Judge says,—"I did not take that view of the law, that was not my view when I convicted," then there need be no case stated. But if he says,—"Yes, that is my view of the law," then he will honestly state a case bringing out the facts, so that this Court may affirm his view on the point of law or reverse it. But here I am at a loss to understand in what respect the appellant considers the determination of the magistrate to be erroneous in point of law. I put it to Mr Dickson repeatedly, but the most I could get from him in answer was that it ought to have been found proved that the appellant knew that this meat had been hung up in his premises, and that he knew that it was in a condition which made it unfit for human food, the fact being, so the appellant alleges, that he did not know that the meat was there, and that he was ignorant of its unsound condition; and it is contended that if the magistrate convicted notwithstanding that ignorance he commited an error in point of law. But if that was the appellant's view, it would have been easy for him to have said to the magistrate,—"Your Honour is in error, because it has not been proved that I knew the meat was there or that it was in an unsound condition." That ought in fairness to have been put before the magistrate, and if the magistrate thought that he ought to convict notwithstanding the appellant's ignorance, and did so convict, he would have stated the case and the question of law accordingly. Even then, I rather think that if the magistrate was of opinion, and so informed us, that the meat was exposed in such a way as to lead one to the belief that it was intended for human food, I should not have thought that he had fallen into any legal error merely because no personal knowledge on the part of the appellant, either of the unsound condition of the meat or of its being on his premises, had been proved, but it is enough to say that there is no such case as that stated here. For all that appears here the appellant may have been in perfect knowledge both of the fact of the meat being in his premises and of the state it was in. There is nothing to the contrary stated, and nothing to shew that the magistrate's attention was called to this view of the appellant, if it was his view.

On both grounds therefore,—that the legal error attributed to the magistrate was not brought under his notice, and that there was no legal error on the part of the magistrate in convicting, if he was satisfied that the appellant throug his salesman was in possession of the meat for sale as human food,—I thin the appeal must be dismissed. In future the appellant must look after his se vants better.

I propose therefore that we should not answer the second question, and th we should answer the first in the affirmative, and affirm the determination the magistrate.

Lord M'Laren.—On the first question I agree with your Lordship. I appears to me that this was a competent prosecution under the forms provide by the Edinburgh Police Act, and that no objection can be taken to it on th ground that the procedure should have been under a different statute.

On the second question, I concur in your Lordship's opinion that this is a undesirable way in which to raise a question of law. No question of law i expressed in the question. The only point that can be raised under such a question is, whether on the facts stated in the case there is any case for the consideration of the magistrate. Now, the argument that was presented in support o the appeal was, that the facts stated did not entitle the magistrate to convict, because the essence of the crime consists in the accused's knowledge of the carcase being in his premises and of its condition, and it is not stated that he had such knowledge. I am of opinion that it is not necessary to a conviction under this section of the statute that such knowledge on the part of the accused should be proved. I think that the offence is committed if there be actual possession for the purposes of sale, and such possession may be by shopmen. That the diseased meat is being kept for the purpose of sale for human consumption is the thing to be proved. Personal knowledge on the part of the accused is not essential. Looking, therefore, to the merits of the argument that was addressed to us, I think there was a reasonable case for the consideration of the magistrate. But I am quite prepared to accept the view of your Lordship, that the second question should not be answered.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the negative: Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the determination of the inferior Judge, and decern," with five guineas of modified expenses.

Charles Rae was indicted before the Court of Justiciary at Aberdeen, on these charges, viz., that he had caused abortion in the case of Christina Reaper, in consequence of which she died, and that he did thus murder her; and that he caused abortion in the case of Jeanie Greig.

Her Majesty's Advocate v. Rae.

He pleaded not guilty.

The Advocate-depute called the Sheriff-substitute of Aberdeenshire to prove a deposition which had been emitted by the deceased woman Reaper shortly before her death.

Menzies, for the prisoner, objected, on the ground that the deposition was inadmissible, in respect that the deceased must, if the charge were true, have been a party to the offence charged. If so, and she had lived, her evidence would have been inadmissible.[1]

The Advocate-depute referred to the cases noted below.[2] He argued that the point was settled by the authority of these cases, to which that of A B, 15 R. 32, was a solitary exception, and that there was no legal principle for the doctrine that the Crown might not examine a person who had been a party to an offence without first charging that person therewith, and then having his evidence admitted as that of a socius criminis.

LORD SHAND.—I regret that I have to decide this point, but having to decide it I repel the objection. I find that there are two cases, one in 1858, in which two daughters, upwards of twenty-one years of age, who, according to the prosecutor's statement, were parties to the crime, were admitted as witnesses against their father on a charge of incest, and one of a similar nature in 1870, where similar evidence was allowed. Again, I find that in the case of Reid, which was a very anxious case, and one in which the prisoner was defended by the present Lord Justice-Clerk, the woman who might possibly have been charged as particeps criminis died, but certain statements which she made to her mother were admitted in evidence. According to my own recollection of what occurred at the bar in charges not so serious in their nature, it has not been held essential in order to the admission of evidence of this kind that the party himself, or herself, whose statement is given in evidence, should first be charged as a criminal and then freed from the responsibilities of the charge. Looking to the practice, I feel myself bound to act on my own judgment, and to repel the objection. In my opinion it would defeat the ends of justice if I were to shut out this evidence, which might be the only light to be obtained in inquiring into a crime such as is here charged.

The deposition was admitted.

Evidence was further led to shew that the prisoner had operated by means of knitting needles or similar instruments upon the two women named in the indictment, and that a miscarriage had followed in each case.

The Advocate-depute proposed to lead evidence to shew that the prisoner had agreed with certain farm-servants in the November prior to the crime charged to procure abortion for a reward in the case of another woman, though. The Advocate-depute admitted that the application was made by the farm-servants as a practical joke.

Menzies, for the prisoner, objected that this was an attempt to prove a case not libelled, and entirely unconnected with the crime charged.

LORD SHAND.—I think the evidence has a bearing on the question, and must be admitted. There is much secrecy in the case, and I do not think I could shut out evidence which shews that the prisoner was ready to do something of the same kind as is here charged in another case. If the fact proposed to be Proof—Declaration—Right of accused to have assistance of law-agent—Criminal Law Procedure Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), sec. 17.—The declaration of an illiterate woman charged with the crime of murder was not admitted when tendered in evidence, in respect the accused had not been informed before emitting it of her right to have the assistance of a law-agent.

HIGH COURT (ABERDEEN).
Lord M'Laren.
Justiciary Clerk.

WILLIAMINA GOODALL, domestic servant, was charged before the Court of Justiciary at Aberdeen with the murder of her illegitimate child, Jessie Ann Goodall or Gauld, four years of age, by drowning her in the river Deveron, near the Bridge of Marnock, Banffshire.

The Advocate-depute proposed to use the prisoner's declaration as part of the evidence for the Crown.

Counsel for the prisoner objected that the declaration could not be read as the prisoner had not been informed of her right to have an interview with a law-agent before emitting a declaration, and to have her agent present during the declaration.†

The Sheriff-substitute before whom the declaration had been emitted was then called by the Advocate-depute. He deponed that no law-agent had been present on the prisoner's behalf.

The Advocate-depute admitted that no information had been given to the prisoner of the right conferred by the Criminal Law Procedure Act, 1887. He maintained that there was no duty either upon the police or upon the examining magistrate to inform the accused person of the right so conferred—the statute imposed none. It only gave the accused a privilege to apply for legal assistance if he desired it.

Argued for the prisoner;—The statute was passed to remedy a hardship existing under the previous state of the law. It was therefore to be construed favourably to a person apprehended on a criminal charge. He was to be "entitled" to this privilege, and the duty lay with the police or the magistrate to give him information as to his right. A summary conviction had been quashed because the accused had a right to time to prepare his defence but had not been informed of that right.[1]

* Decided May 3, 1888.

† The Criminal Law Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 35), provides by sec. 17,—"Where any person has been arrested on any criminal charge, such person shall be entitled, immediately upon such arrest, to have information sent to any properly qualified law-agent that his professional assistance is required by such person, and informing him of the place to which such person is to be taken for examination, and such law-agent shall be entitled to have a private interview with the person accused before he is examined on declaration, and to be present at such examination, which shall be conducted according to the existing practice: Provided always that it shall be in the power of the Sheriff or magistrate to delay such examination for a period not exceeding forty-eight hours from and after the time of such person's arrest, in order to allow time for the attendance of such law-agent."

LORD M'LAREN.—The objection to the declaration is not that the Sheriff before whom it was taken omitted any of the customary precautions that were in use before the passing of the Criminal Procedure Act of last year, but that he omitted to make the prisoner aware of a right which she obtained under the Act—the right to be advised by an agent as to the conduct of her defence—and as to any proceedings whatever before the Sheriff or magistrate. The statute does not in express words enforce upon the magistrate, or upon anyone, the duty of giving the accused person information of this right. It merely states that the accused shall be entitled to obtain the services of an agent from the moment of apprehension, and that any communication to the agent shall be forwarded.

It is contended that this is a remedial statute, and applying the principle of liberal interpretation to the statute it is apparent that the Sheriff ought to have informed the accused in this case that she had such a right. It was observed by Mr Leslie, and I think justly, that the distinction between remedial statutes and other statutes depends upon their subject-matter, and that a statute which introduces some new category in law, or substitutes an entirely new system for the one already in observance, may be construed strictly and literally, and that wherever a statute is passed for the purpose of altering the existing system—and of course presumably improving the system—it is to be regarded as a remedial statute. According to that distinction, in which I agree, every statute altering the rules of procedure in Courts of justice is to be taken as a remedial statute, because every such statute proceeds upon the basis of existing practice which it is desired to simplify or improve. Now, there is also the question, what is meant by the rule of liberal construction? That of course does not mean that you are to import into the statute something that is really not within it, but it means that if a fair question arises, and there are two possible interpretations, and a doubt arises between them, that interpretation shall be preferred which is the more calculated to give effect to the object that the enactment has in view.

This principle of the liberal construction of remedial statutes gives very powerful support to the argument that has been maintained against the declaration, because the argument proceeds upon the view, I think well founded in fact, that there are a great many illiterate persons brought before the Courts who cannot reasonably be supposed to have a knowledge of their rights, and that the statute would be a dead letter unless some means were provided for informing them of their rights. I am not disposed to treat this question entirely in the light of statutory construction. I desire to guard myself against laying down any rule that it is the duty of the Sheriff or of the police to inform the prisoner that he is entitled to the services of an agent. Still less should I support the view that it is the duty of those agents who give their services as agents for the poor in criminal trials to attend and advise prisoners about their declarations. I most emphatically say that no such duty is laid or intended to be laid upon them by statute, so far as my opinion goes. But looking again to the common law regarding declarations, I cannot help thinking that this law has gradually grown up, and has only quite recently received its full maturity, that it is founded on the principle of voluntary declaration only, and that everything necessary to inform the prisoner of his right in the matter of the declaration is to be communicated to him by the magistrate. That would not necessarily apply to a petty case, but it certainly does imply that when a charge of murder is made against an illiterate woman it would be desirable that the magistrate, before taking the declaration, should inform the accused that he or she had the right to confer with an agent, and I imagine that any agent who might be called in, acting on the principles of good feeling and humanity, would have been willing to come and advise the accused. In what I have said I do not wish to attribute the slightest negligence or inattention to the Sheriff. I do not doubt that he had the matter before him, and that he acted in accordance with what he regarded as his legal duty. It is a delicate and somewhat difficult question, and it is quite possible that other Judges may take the same view as the Sheriff has done, but I must in this case act upon my own opinion, especially in a serious criminal charge.

[1] Pyper v. Walker, July 10, 1885, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 47.

Even if I had more doubt than I entertain, I should act upon the principle of giving the prisoner the benefit of any reasonable doubt in a matter of this kind. I really consider the question doubtful. I think there may be a great deal of doubt as to how far it is the duty of the magistrate to give the information in every case, but I cannot doubt that in a charge of murder it would be the proper thing that the prisoner should be visited by an agent before being examined on declaration. On that ground I am prepared to deal with this question and disallow the declaration, very much in the spirit of those cases where it was held that anything tending to put the accused person at a serious disadvantage, and involving a denial of the rights of accused persons for their protection, is a ground for setting aside the conviction, and of course the same principles would apply in excluding any evidence.

The declaration was rejected.

THE prisoner was convicted of culpable homicide, and sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

ON 6th March 1888 George Wilson, cattle-dealer, Cupar, was charged on a summary complaint in the Sheriff Court at Cupar at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal, setting forth that he did on 7th and 23d January 1888, at the farm of Rumgally, near Cupar, "cruelly ill-treat, abuse, or torture, or cause or procure to be cruelly ill-treated, abused, or tortured, thirty-seven or thereby oxen, or several or one or more oxen, all the property or in the lawful possession of Donald Robertson, farmer, Mayfield, near Cupar, by, on 7th January 1888, place aforesaid, sawing off, cutting off, or otherwise removing, or causing, or procuring to be sawn off, cut off, or otherwise removed, with a saw or other instrument to the complainer unknown, the horns of nine or thereby oxen, or of several or one or more oxen, close to or within an inch or other similar short distance from their skulls; and on 23d January 1888, and place aforesaid," performing a similar operation on twenty-eight other oxen, whereby the said thirty-seven oxen, or several or one or more of said oxen, "were subjected to great, unnecessary, and cruel pain and suffering, and were thus cruelly ill-treated, abused, and tortured, or caused or procured to be cruelly ill-treated, abused, and tortured, by the said George Wilson, contrary to the Act 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92, and particularly sec. 1 thereof."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson), after a proof, acquitted him.

The Procurator-fiscal obtained a case. The case stated,—"The cattle referred to in the complaint were dishorned by the respondent, acting on the instructions of Donald Robertson, farmer, Mayfield, near Cupar, the owner of the cattle, with the assistance of four other men at the time and place libelled. Each animal was drawn by a rope up to a pillar in the centre of the cattle court. Its legs were secured by straps connected by a rope, and the animal being cast on its side, its head was tied to its foreleg. The horns were then sawn off close to the skull or head by the respondent, the skin at the base of the horn being first cut with a knife, to permit of the saw getting close to the skull. The operation usually causes, and in the present case caused, profuse bleeding, and the animals appeared to suffer considerable pain during it, as evinced by their bellowing. The sawing through of each horn occupied about a minute.

"On 28th January 1888 the oxen were seen by Principal Walley, of the Royal Veterinary College, Edinburgh, and Mr John E. Grey, V.S., Edinburgh. They furnished a report, setting forth the result of their visit, which was produced and proved at the trial, and which is in the following terms:—

"'Edinburgh, January 30th, 1888.—We certify that, on Saturday the 28th inst., we visited the farm of Rumgally, Nr Cupar, in company with Mr Cuthbert, the inspector of the Scottish Society for the P. C. Animals, and there examined, in presence of Andrew Paterson, the cattleman (who shewed the animals to us), a number of young cattle, 28 in one lot and 9 in another, which presented evidence of having been recently dishorned, the lot of 28 more recently than the lot of 9. In each case the horns had been removed close to the skull, and in one animal, a red bullock of the larger lot, the sinuses of the head had been opened. A considerable quantity of blood and purulent matter had in most cases escaped from the wounds, and had dried on the hair at the sides of the head and face, and several of the animals, a white bullock in particular, were standing with the nose protruded, and shrunken in the flanks, and had the appearance of having suffered from the effects of the operation. The removal of the horns had in some cases been effected so close to the skull as to necessitate cutting through the skin of the head. We are of opinion that the operation must have caused much pain, and been the means of much subsequent suffering, and being performed in the manner described, was a grossly cruel operation, and quite unnecessary for all practical purposes.'

"It was proved that the cells of the horn-core are lined with a delicate membrane, which is extremely sensitive and vascular, particularly at the base of the horn, where it is continuous with the lining of the sinuses of the head. Between the core of the horn and the outside horn covering is another delicate sensitive membrane continuous with the true skin of the head, and the most sensitive part of the body of the animal. That intense pain was caused by cutting through these structures, as well as subsequent suffering from inflammation, increased in case of injuries to the horn, by there being no relief from swelling owing to the hard nature of the surrounding substances. That on the cattle in question the sinuses of the head had in each case been laid open, which led to greater risk of inflammation.

"It was further proved that in Roxburghshire, Berwickshire, the greater part of the Lothians, and also in England and Wales, the practice of dishorning was unknown, unless for surgical purposes. That in these places the objects which it was intended to attain were met either by separating the vicious and weak animals, by putting wooden balls or pieces of wood on the horns, or by what is known as 'tipping,' namely, cutting off the tip of the horn just above the quick. That these methods had proved quite satisfactory in these districts, and that thousands of cattle of all breeds so treated came weekly into the Edinburgh Cattle Market. That, in the opinion of gentlemen farming in these districts, and dealing in all kinds of cattle, the operation of dishorning by cutting off the horns close to the head was both cruel and unnecessary. It was proved by one of the witnesses for the prosecution that he had adopted these methods with success in Perthshire and Dumfriesshire, as well as in Midlothian. That the operation of dishorning was very simple when done to calves.

"On the other hand, it was proved for the defence that the dishorning of cattle was regularly practised by farmers and breeders of cattle in Fifeshire, Kinross-shire, Perthshire, Forfarshire, and Kincardineshire. That the objects for which the operation was performed were the safety of the animals of the herd, which frequently suffered painful and serious injuries through goring and butting, and were often prevented from feeding by the stronger cattle, when the horns were allowed to remain, and also for safety in carriage by sea or rail, the horns being a source of great discomfort and danger to other cattle. It was proved to be impossible to feed cattle in open courts, as was the practice in Fife, without taking precautions for their safety, and that the cattle in question, as well as most of the cattle brought into Fife, were of mixed Irish breed, and more inclined to be troublesome than other breeds of cattle. The other methods of dealing with the horns founded on for the prosecution had not been to any extent tried in the above counties, but so far as tried had not been found satisfactory in the opinion of those who had tried them. It was proved that, as a rule, the operation was attended with no permanent bad effects, and that the cattle in question had afterwards thriven well.

"It was further proved that the respondent had considerable experience in dishorning cattle, and was frequently employed by farmers and breeders in the county of Fife to perform this operation; that it was performed skilfully, and in a manner frequently adopted in the county."

The questions of law were,—"(1) Whether the Sheriff-substitute was right in adopting the principle laid down in the case of Lewis v. Fermor[1] as applicable to the present case? and (2) If not, do the facts above set forth infer a contravention of the Act 13 and 14 Vict. cap. 92?"

Argued for the appellant;—The operation of dishorning was excessively painful. It was also quite unnecessary, as was proved by the fact that except in the counties of Fife, Forfar, and Kincardine it was practically unknown. The case was therefore within the principle of Murphy.[2] It was not necessary to prove wanton cruelty.[1] The rule laid down by Mr Justice Day that cruelty in the sense of the Act "means the infliction of grievous pain without a legitimate object either existing in truth or honestly believed in"[2] would exclude many cases to which the reason of the Act certainly applied, for a man might honestly believe in what was very absurd, and a costermonger driving his donkey, when it was suffering from a sore, had certainly a legitimate object—that of earning his bread —yet convictions under the Act, in such circumstances, were obtained every day. This was said to be a customary operation, but at the best it was a merely local custom, and that was no answer if there was another operation equally efficacious and entirely painless.

Argued for the respondent;—Cruelty in the sense of the Act must be wanton cruelty—either for a cruel purpose and for none other, or if some beneficial end was to be served there must be such gross carelessness as to infer a cruel intention.[3] Here the purpose was legitimate, the operation was customary over a large district, it was performed in a skilful and scientific way, and there was not a suggestion of a cruel intention.

Lord Young.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff is right. I need not say that I express no opinion—I do not say whether I have any opinion or not—as to the propriety of what was done. It may be not only a very unnecessary operation, all the ends for which it was used being attainable otherwise, and without pain, or without such pain; it may even be a very bad operation—not merely attaining a good end in an unnecessarily painful way, but in every view a bad operation. It is according to the facts stated to us by the Sheriff, that the farmers in a considerable, and certainly by no means an unimportant district in Scotland are of opinion that their legitimate interests are served by cutting the horns of certain animals, and that is accordingly done, and done to such an extent by people who are sagacious enough to attend to their own interest to the best of their judgment or knowledge; there are professional men who perform the operation; and this prosecution is the prosecution of the professional man who performed such an operation on the employment of the owner of the animals, the farmer, who was acting honestly on the belief that it was a right thing to do. I am of opinion, therefore, without any doubt or hesitation, that that is not a case of cruelty within the meaning of this Act of Parliament; and in order to arrive at that conclusion I do not require the aid of previous decisions whether of this Court or of the English Courts, nor do I think it necessary to give a definition of the cruelty to which the statute applies. It is sufficient for judgment that this is not a case to which the statute applies. It will certainly apply to wanton and vicious cruelty, where to cause suffering to the animal is the purpose for which the thing is done. There are people whose wicked disposition is gratified by the mere infliction of pain, although I hope there are not many such. Then using an animal which is not in a fit state to be used—an animal with sores, so that it cannot be put in harness and used to draw a cart without agony, and often without certain death within a very short period—that is a cruel proceeding, and is,

I should think, cruelty within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, althoug the motive of the act is not the wanton purpose of gratuitously causing suffe ing; but such operations as were referred to in the course of the argument- castrating horses, spaying swine, making capons for the purpose of having more delicate article of human food, as some people think—all that may be excee ingly wrong and counteracting the claims of nature by a cruel operation. B it is not cruelty within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. I do not kno that it is not a very cruel thing to pursue a fox. It is done merely for spor Is that a necessary proceeding? Many people will call it a cruel one. I d not say I am of the number, and I am far from saying I am not. But it is no in my opinion, a punishable offence under the Act. The statute does n interfere with human conduct to that extent, or with the judgment of those wh are pursuing their own affairs to the best of their judgment, as the farmers c Fife and Forfar are doing here, however much they may be mistaken in th judgment of others. I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed and with expenses.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur. It is very difficult to give a definition of cruelt to animals which would furnish a complete criterion in all cases like this, and for the purposes of deciding this case it is unnecessary to do so. I will onl say that I am not prepared to accept some of the definitions that are suggested by the reported cases. It is clear enough that it would not be in all circumstances a good defence to a prosecution under the statute to say that the act o alleged cruelty was done for a reasonable purpose, and that it was commonly done, because that would cover cases of over-driving and of driving an animal in an unfit condition. Nor in the case of an operation do I consider it to be quite clear that it would be a sufficient defence that the operation was undertaken for a rational purpose, and in pursuance of a belief, reasonably entertained, that it would accomplish that purpose. For the operation might be an unusual one, and the defence might be founded upon some fancy of the accused for which there was no real foundation. I do not think that in such cases the accused would be able to avoid the penalty merely by saying that he was inflicting pain for such a purpose of his own, which he was unable to justify. But the case here is that of a customary operation—customary as to a considerable district of the country, and performed with a view to a rational purpose, and under the belief that it is necessary for the well-being and control of the animals. A case combining these features cannot be regarded as one of cruelty in the sense of the Act of Parliament. I am accordingly of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is well founded.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark concurred.

The Court dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the determination of the inferior Judge, with seven guineas of modified expenses.

Lord Fraser.

MISS CATHERINE A. HALKETT HAY and JOHN T. HALKETT HAY, children of the late Charles H. Halkett Hay of Balendoch, Perthshire, who were minors, raised on 5th July 1887 an action of choosing curators, calling as defenders their next of kin on their father's and mother's side respectively. No appearance was made for the next of kin, and the pursuers put into process a deed nominating a Mrs Yeats to be their curator during their minority. On 21st September 1887, on which day the Lord Ordinary on the Bills sat in Court, in virtue of the 93d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, his Lordship was moved to sustain the deed of nomination by the pursuers.

It was pointed out by the Clerk that in practice in summonses of choosing curators such an order had never been granted, it being the understanding that such a decree as was moved for did not fall within the provisions of section 93.*

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) sustained the nomination, and in respect of the curator's acceptance of office, and of the failure of the next of kin to compear and concur in making up inventories, nominated a delegate at whose sight inventories in triplicate should be made up, and these being now lodged at the bar approved thereof, and appointed two of them to be lodged with the Clerk, and the remaining one to be given up to the curator along with the act of curatory.

Succession—Conditio si sine liberis testator decesserit.—A lady by antenuptial contract settled certain specific funds on any children who might be born of the marriage, reserving to herself a power of bequeathing the trust-estate by will in the event of there being no child of the marriage who should attain twenty-one years of age (or, if a daughter, should marry). Ten days after the marriage she executed a settlement "pursuant to the power reserved" in the marriage-contract, bequeathing the residue of her property equally between her husband and sister. Two years after the marriage she succeeded to certain heritable estate from a brother. Shortly thereafter she gave birth to a child, one month after whose birth she died. The legatees contended that the marriage-contract and the will were to be read together as one settlement, and that as express provision had been made for children of the marriage the condition si sine liberis testator decesserit did not apply to the will. Held that the will was subject to the condition si sine liberis testator decesserit.

2D DIVISION.
I.

BY antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 11th August 1882, entered into between Herbert E. L. Hallett, of Chapel Street, Park Lane, in the county of Middlesex, of the first part, Jane Dobie, Mr Hallett's future spouse, of the second part, and Samuel M'Millan, of Moffat, agent for the Bank of Scotland, and Madalene Henrietta Dobie, of the third part, it was agreed that the said Samuel M'Millan and Madalene Henrietta Dobie should hold certain stocks, debentures, and funds belonging to the said Jane Dobie in trust as therein mentioned; and it was thereby declared "that in case there shall be no child of the said marriage who, being a son, shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter, shall attain that age or marry, the trustees shall stand possessed of the said trust-funds, or of so much thereof respectively as shall not have been applied under any of the trusts and power herein contained. Upon the trusts following—that is to say, upon trust to pay the same unto such person or persons as the said Jane Dobie, whether covert or sole, shall by her last will and testament, or any codicil thereto, direct or appoint; and in default of any such direction or appointment, then upon trust to divide and pay the same between and amongst the next of kin of the said Jane Dobie in accordance with the Statute of Limitations in force in England." The trust-funds, it was stated, amounted to about £5000.

Ten days after her marriage Mrs Hallett executed a last will and testament, dated 21st August 1882, in the following terms:—"This is the last will and testament of me Jane Hallett of 43 Oxford Terrace, Hyde Park, in the county of Middlesex, the wife of Herbert Edward Luxmore Hallett of the same place, gentleman, made and executed pursuant to the power reserved by or given to me in and by a certain indenture of settlement bearing date the 11th day of August 1882, executed prior to and in consideration of my then intended marriage with the said H. E. L. Hallett, and of all other powers enabling me in that behalf. I bequeath the following legacy,—that is to say, to my sister Eliza Goodsir M'Millin, the wife of Samuel M'Millin of Moffat, Scotland, the sum of £250. And as to the rest and residue of my estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, I give the same equally between my sister Madalene Henrietta Dobie and my said husband, H. E. L. Hallet, share and share alike."

Trail v. Kelman & Co.

2D DIVISION.

Sheriff of the Lothians.

I.

Circumstances in which the Court postponed the decision of the question for the decision of the presiding Judge at the trial.

ON 3d November 1886, John Trail, a workman in the employment of William Kelman & Company, builders, Edinburgh, was killed on the spot by the fall of a wall at which he was working.

In April 1887 Mrs Cecilia Trail, widow of the deceased, and his children, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against William Kelman & Company, concluding for damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

No notice of injury was given to the defender under section 4 of the Act.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having failed to give notice of claim to the defenders in terms of the Employers Liability Act, 1880, are not entitled to maintain the action so far as laid under that Act.

The pursuers, with reference to this plea, stated that "the defender William Kelman was present when the said accident occurred, and was informed of the injuries the deceased sustained."

The Sheriff-substitute (Rutherfurd), on 21st May 1887, pronounced an interlocutor which contained, inter alia, this finding:—"Finds that notice, as required by the Employers Liability Act, 1880, was not given to the defenders of the death of the late John Trail within six weeks thereafter, and that there was no reasonable excuse for the want of such notice: Therefore sustains the defenders' first plea in law, and finds that the action is incompetent in so far as laid upon the said Act."* Quoad ultra he allowed a proof.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial, and proposed an issue at common law and under the Act.

The defenders objected to the issue so far as it was laid under the statute, on the ground that no notice had been sent to the defenders in terms thereof. It had been decided[1] that the notice had to be given in writing. If it were held sufficient notice to an employer of an accident that he saw it himself, there was no reason why it should not be deemed sufficient notice if it could be proved that he had heard of it from reliable authority immediately afterwards. The Court had entertained the question of notice at that stage of the case on two occasions at least.[2]

Argued for the pursuers;—It was admitted that no written notice had been sent to the defenders, but whether there was a reasonable excuse for the omission was a question which should under the statute be decided

* "NOTE.—The only explanation given by the pursuers on record (cond. art. 4 ad finem) of their failure to comply with the requirement of the statute of 1880, with regard to notice, is that the defender William Kelman was present when the accident occurred, and was informed of the injuries sustained by the deceased John Trail.

"The Sheriff-substitute is unable to hold that there is, in terms of the 4th section of the Act, a 'reasonable excuse' for the want of the notice. It is not alleged that the pursuers were unable from any cause to give the statutory notice to the defenders, and the Sheriff-substitute thinks that the words 'reasonable excuse' apply only to those cases in which the relatives of the deceased party have been prevented from giving notice by force of circumstances. The Sheriff-substitute has therefore sustained the defenders' first plea in law."

be in any sense a true reading of the will, for I think that the will, like the marriage-contract into which she had entered, goes entirely on the contingency of no children being born of the marriage. The whole deed must be read subject to that contingency. But, further, I am of opinion that, on the authorities, a will executed before the birth of a child is revoked by the subsequent birth of a child, if that event was not in the contemplation of the maker of the deed. I think, therefore, this question should be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Young.—I entirely agree. My opinion is that on the doctrine of si sine liberis decesserit the will made by Mrs Hallett in 1882 was absolutely revoked by the birth of the child in 1885. That is sufficient to enable us to answer the question in the affirmative.

Lord Craighill.—It appears to me that the will executed in 1882 was revoked by the subsequent birth of the child. If it had been necessary for the decision of the case I should probably have adopted your Lordship's reading of the deed itself, but I do not think it is necessary to decide that question when my opinion is so clear to the effect that the will was revoked.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I also am of opinion that the will was revoked, and can receive no effect. Whether it could be set up again by the mere survivance of the maker without executing a subsequent deed I greatly doubt. I am much inclined to the opinion that the revocation was absolute, and that, even had the maker survived the birth of the child for a long time, the will could receive no effect. I doubt whether survivance, however long, would justify us in holding that a wish was implied that the will should receive effect. Further, even were we to go into the circumstances of this case, I think there is nothing to lead to the conclusion that Mrs Hallett intended that the will should subsist.

unless the Judge before whom the verdict is obtained shall certify that the action was brought for vindication of character, and was, in his opinion, fit to be tried in the Court of Session.

Held that when the Judge grants such certificate the Court will give effect to his opinion, and award expenses to the pursuer.

1st Division.
M.

In an action of damages for slander at the instance of Robert Macmillan against Messrs H. J. & J. Wilson, the proprietors of the Edinburgh Evening News, the jury awarded the pursuer one farthing of damages, and the pursuer now moved the Court to apply the verdict, and to find the defenders liable in expenses. An application had previously been made under the 40th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868,* to Lord Shand, who had tried the case, and his Lordship had granted a certificate that the action was brought for vindication of character, and fit to be tried in the Court of Session.

The defenders opposed the motion, contending that it had been established at the trial that the pursuer had no character to lose, and that the jury had taken that view when they awarded only one farthing of damages. Under the 40th section it was in the discretion of the Court to abstain from giving expenses, even after the presiding Judge had granted a certificate.

Lord President.—The 40th section of the Court of Session Act provides that when a verdict is obtained from a jury carrying less than £5 damages in the case of an action for defamation or for libel, the pursuer is not to be found entitled to expenses unless he satisfies the presiding Judge, and obtains from him a certificate to the effect, that the action was brought for the vindication of character, and was, in his opinion, fit to be tried in the Court of Session. I think it will be in the recollection of your Lordships that before the passing of this Act the rule was the same in substance, and that anybody obtaining expenses upon a verdict for nominal damages in an action for defamation or for libel was bound to shew that the action was brought for vindication of character, and was fit to be tried in the Court of Session. Therefore, the only novelty introduced by the 40th section of the Court of Session Act was to leave the determination of the question to the presiding Judge. That was the sole change introduced by the section. In this action we have the certificate of the presiding Judge that it was one brought for the vindication of character, and was fit to be tried in the Court of Session. Therefore I think the question depends upon the certificate of the presiding Judge, and that we have no right to interfere.

Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Shand.—I agree in thinking that the certificate of the presiding Judge in a matter of this kind is final, and that upon him alone rests the responsibility of saying whether the action was brought for the vindication of character, and was fit to be tried in this Court. I had no difficulty whatever in granting the certificate in this case. It is no doubt the case that I told the jury very strongly

* The 40th section enacted,—"Where the pursuer in any action of damages in the Court of Session recovers by the verdict of a jury less than five pounds he shall not be entitled to recover or obtain from the defender any expenses in respect of such verdict, unless the Judge before whom such verdict is obtained shall certify on the interlocutor sheet . . . . in the case of actions for defamation or for libel, that the action was brought for the vindication of character, and was in his opinion fit to be tried in the Court of Session."

by the presiding Judge at the trial,* at all events the Court could postpone the consideration of the question till then. The object of the provision that notice should be sent was that the employer might have an opportunity of inspecting the locus and making inquiries, not to give him notice that an action was to be raised, as the statutory notice contained no such intimation. Here the defenders had had every facility for learning the truth which a notice could have afforded them.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It seems to me that under the statute the question whether there is a "reasonable excuse" for no notice being sent in terms of the 4th section falls to be decided by the Judge who tries the case. No doubt it is in the discretion of the Court to consider the question at this stage, but I do not see how in the circumstances of the present case we can dispose of it.

Lord Young.—I am clearly of opinion that Mr Thomson's argument on this question was unsound. I should not say that the question of whether the statutory notice was sufficient, or whether the excuse for not sending such notice was reasonable, should in all cases be delayed till the trial of the case. I rather think that where no notice is given, and no reasonable excuse is offered for the omission, the object of the Legislature was to stop the trial before the expenses of a jury trial were incurred. On the other hand, it is clearly in the discretion of the Court to postpone the decision of the question till the trial, if they should think proper. Here the only question is whether the excuse for not sending the notice is reasonable, and, it being admitted that the case must in any view go to trial on the facts, I think it expedient that the matter should be decided by the presiding Judge at the trial.

Lord Craighill.—I think this question should be left to the decision of the Judge who presides at the trial. I do not think that it is possible for us at present to decide it—not that it is not competent for us to do so—but it seems to me that the most expedient course would be for us to approve the issue, and leave the question whether the excuse for not sending the statutory notice to the defender was reasonable to the presiding Judge.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—In the circumstances I think this question should be reserved. It is in my opinion in the discretion of the Court whether the consideration of such a question should be reserved or not.

The Court approved the issue, and remitted the cause to Lord Lee, Ordinary, to proceed.

that they were to look at the character of the pursuer, of which I took a very unfavourable view, in assessing the damages, but still I added that this would not deprive him of his right to obtain damages, the amount of which might be nominal merely. The defenders' contention now comes to this that if a man has a sufficiently bad character, the publisher of a newspaper or a private individual may slander him to their heart's content with impunity, even by making charges against him which are utterly unfounded. In this instance the pursuer was charged with the fraudulent acts of another person, committed in Sheffield, where he never was in his life. The argument seems to be that because the pursuer had been convicted of fraud in Edinburgh he may thereafter with impunity be charged with other fraud of which he was entirely innocent. That would lead to very extraordinary results, and just as I think the pursuer was entitled to damages, so I think in the circumstances he was entitled to the expenses in a trial in which the falsity of the charge was established. I had the less hesitation in granting this certificate, because when the defenders received a letter from the pursuer's agent complaining that they had represented his client of being guilty of fraud in Sheffield, whereas he had never been in that town, it was clearly their duty to have ascertained the facts by making inquiries in Sheffield, so as to see whether they had done him an injury or not. This, however, they did not do. There was no such inquiry made, and no withdrawal or apology for the false charge. This is therefore clearly a case where the pursuer was entitled to a verdict to clear his character of an obviously false charge, and I cannot say it was not a fit action to be tried in this Court.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT accordingly applied the verdict, and found the defenders liable in expenses.

charters were granted in favour of the bank, but no alteration was thereby made in regard to the transfer of its stock, although by the Royal Bank of Scotland Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. cap. ccxvii.), a new form of transference inter vivos was provided.

Samuel Greenlees, distiller, Campbeltown, judicial factor on the trust-estate of Mr and Mrs Ralston, having died, James Greenlees was appointed judicial factor in his place. Samuel Greenlees was at the date of his death registered, as judicial factor foresaid, as proprietor of the sum of £440 of the capital stock of the Royal Bank, which stood in his name in the books of the bank, and the interim act and warrant appointing James Greenlees to be factor granted warrant to and authorised him, as judicial factor foresaid, to complete a title in his person to the heritable and moveable or personal property specified and described in the inventory annexed to the petition, which inventory included the £440 of the stock of the Royal Bank.

James Greenlees, as judicial factor, called upon the bank to register him as proprietor of this sum of £440 of their capital stock, or to prepare and send to him for execution such transfer or memorandum or deed as might be necessary for transferring the stock to his name as judicial factor, on the ground that the interim act and decree was a good and sufficient title to the stock in his person, or at least a sufficient warrant to authorise the bank to transfer the same from the name of Samuel Greenlees as judicial factor to his (James Greenlees') name as judicial factor. But the bank declined to make the transfer, on the ground that by the terms of their charters and Act of Parliament, the interim act and decree was not per se a sufficient title in the person of James Greenlees to the stock in question, nor a sufficient warrant to authorise the bank to transfer the same to his name.

In these circumstances a special case was presented, to which the bank was the first party and the judicial factor the second party.

The question put was,—"Is the said interim act and decree of itself a good and sufficient title to the said bank stock, and are the bank entitled and bound to recognise the same as a sufficient warrant under which to register the second party as proprietor in the books of the bank? or is the said interim act and decree a good and sufficient warrant to authorise the bank to prepare a transfer or memorandum or deed of transfer of the said stock in favour of the second party, and upon execution thereof, to register him as proprietor of the said stock in the books of the bank?"

Argued for the bank;—The provisions of the bank's charter as to the mode of transferring the stock were quite explicit, and although it had been held that the stock might be transferred by adjudication,[1] the bank did not feel that they were in safety in making a transfer on production merely of the factor's act and warrant, which conferred a right to the stock, but not, it was thought, a title. If the views of the second party were sound, the original factor might equally have had his title completed by the mere production of the act and warrant authorising him to complete a title. [LORD YOUNG.—That by no means follows.]

Argued for the second party;—This was the case of a factor being appointed on the death of the factor originally appointed; to the original appointment different considerations applied, but the stock was now in the hands of the Court, and the act and warrant of the Court was a sufficient authority to the bank to transfer the stock from the name of the old officer to that of the new.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenlees.

LORD YOUNG.—The estate of which this bank stock is a part is being administered by this Court, and by an officer of this Court, not a permanent official of the Court, but by an officer appointed for the special purpose of administering this estate. The officer who was appointed in the first place died, and we supplied the loss by appointing another, and that other will receive the whole of the trust-estate which was in the hands of his predecessor. All that we are here asked to do is to authorise the bank to insert in their books the name of the recently appointed officer in place of that of the deceased officer, as proprietor of the stock belonging to the estate. Now, that is a perfectly simple thing, with no risk or danger to anybody. The aim of everyone ought to be simplicity, and the avoidance of expense, and transferring what was in the hands of the deceased officer into the hands of the living officer is not a matter of completing titles at all. Accordingly I should propose to your Lordships to answer the first part of the question in the case in the affirmative.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I do not think any harm will arise from making the transference of the stock in the way proposed, especially as it is the case of transferring from the name of one judicial factor who is deceased to another who is living, but I cannot say that I am altogether satisfied.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Your Lordships answer the first part of the question in the affirmative.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent on Circuit.

GEORGE HUTCHESON & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—
J. A. Reid—Salvesen.

Ship—Demurrage—Discharge of mixed cargo in separate lots—Custom of the port.—A ship, chartered to carry to the United Kingdom a cargo of ash and bones, the discharge of cargo to be according to the custom of the port of discharge, received from the charterers and loaded 33 tons of ash, about 397 tons of bones, and about 20 tons of horns, hoofs, and piths (which last were partly intermixed with the bones, and partly loaded on the top of them). The master granted bills of lading for 33 tons of ash and 417 tons of bones. On arrival at the port of call the ship was directed to proceed to Aberdeen. The master having on the demand of the consignees there, but under protest, separated the hoofs, horns, and piths from the bones before giving delivery, brought an action against the consignees for four days' demurrage on account of the delay caused by this separation. The defenders pleaded that the hoofs, horns, and piths having been loaded separately, ought to be so discharged, and that in any case the custom of the port of Aberdeen was that they should be separated from the bones by the ship before delivery. After a proof, from which it appeared, inter alia, that the trade in bones at Aberdeen was of only about thirty years' standing, and almost entirely in the hands of the defenders themselves, held (1) that the hoofs, horns, and piths had been tendered in bulk as part of a cargo of bones; (2) that delay had been caused by the separation; (3) that the defenders had failed to prove any custom of the port entitling them to require the ship to effect such separation; and therefore (4) that the pursuers were entitled to deliver the cargo in bulk as they received it, and to have decree for the sum sued for as demurrage.

Clacevich v. Hutcheson & Co.

2D DIVISION.
M.

BY charter-party, dated Buenos Ayres, 19th January 1886, it was mutually agreed between Andrea Clacevich for himself and the owners of the Austrian barque "Una" of Dabrota, whereof he was master, and Diaz & Viademonte, merchants and affreighters, inter alia, that the said vessel should proceed to Rosario, and there load from the factors of the said affreighters a full and complete cargo of 50 tons of ash, 60 tons of mess bones, and the remainder of country bones, and being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Queenstown, Falmouth, or Plymouth for orders. There was no stipulation as to lay-days or demurrage for discharge, but it was provided that "the discharge of the cargo shall be according to the custom of the port of discharge."

The vessel proceeded to Rosario, and there loaded a cargo consisting of 33 tons of ash, about 397 tons of bones, and about 20 tons of hoofs, horns, and piths. A certain proportion of the last-mentioned were intermixed with the bones, but the greater part were put on board last, and lay on the top of the bones.

The bills of lading bore that the master had received on board 33 tons of ash and 417 tons of bones, and there was the declaration that weight and contents were unknown.

The vessel reached Plymouth on 7th July 1886, and there received orders to discharge at Aberdeen, Hutcheson & Company of that port being the consignees of the cargo. She arrived at Aberdeen on the 15th July, and was ready to discharge on the following morning. Hutcheson & Company directed the master, before weighing the cargo or giving delivery, to separate the bones from the hoofs, horns, and piths, and the hoofs, horns, and piths from each other, an operation which, as carried out, involved the formation of seven (or including the ash, eight) different classes of cargo (the bones being divided into four classes according to size). The master did so, but objected to the deck and holds being taken up in this way, and to the delay which the operation involved, and on the 21st July wrote to Hutcheson & Company intimating that he would hold them responsible for demurrage for all days occupied by them in taking delivery of the cargo beyond what would be required if delivered at the rate of 25 tons a-day.

The discharge of the cargo having in all occupied twenty-two days, being four in excess of what was required at the above rate, the master and Richard Connon, shipbroker, Aberdeen, his mandatary, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen to recover £28, being the demurrage for four days, at £7 a-day.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders, having through their own fault and negligence exceeded the time allowed by the custom of the port for discharging similar cargoes, are liable to the pursuers in demurrage in terms of charter-party and bills of lading. (3) The defenders having detained the said vessel without discharging her cargo beyond a reasonable time by the period of four days, are liable to the pursuers in demurrage as craved, with expenses.

Hutcheson & Company defended.

The following averments appeared in the defenders' statement of facts:—(Stat. 3) "On opening the main hatch it was found that there was a large quantity of hoofs, horns, and piths, although no such cargo was mentioned in the bill of lading signed by the captain, and although he was quite well aware of the quantity, quality, and contents of his said vessel. Denied that pursuers were not aware that horns, hoofs, and piths were in his cargo." (Ans. 3) "Not known, and not admitted. Explained and averred that if there were horns, hoofs, piths, and other such goods, they were shipped as bones, and the pursuer had no right nor power at the port of loading to refuse to take them on board, as they are according to custom at port of loading shipped as bones. The bill of lading is referred to, where it is stated that the pursuer is ignorant of the weight and contents." (Stat. 4) "The defenders on making this discovery at once explained to the pursuer, before beginning to discharge, that the hoofs, &c. were not mentioned in the bills of lading, and that he would require to separate these, as is the custom in this port, from the cargo mentioned in the bills of lading. The pursuer thereupon agreed to allow his own men to separate the different classes of cargo, and to discharge the hoofs, horns, and piths on deck, and to allow them to remain there until arrangements could be made for their disposal. . . . The pursuer's explanations in answer are denied." (Ans. 4) "Denied. Explained and averred that the defenders were perfectly well aware that the goods they specify had been shipped as bones."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The question of demurrage in the discharge of said cargo being by the charter-party solely referable to the custom of the port of discharge, pursuer must abide by that custom. (3) The cargo not being a general one, and the defenders being sole consignees, the claim for demurrage did not arise till the cargo, which was omitted from the bill of lading, was first cleared. (5) The pursuer himself having been a party to and having acquiesced in the mode of discharging said cargo adopted by himself and the defender was bound by it, and cannot now make a claim for demurrage.

A proof was allowed. The following were the material results of the evidence:—The trade in bones, &c., at Aberdeen had been in existence for about thirty years, and was almost exclusively in the hands of Hutcheson & Co. It was not disputed that bones, horns, hoofs, and piths were in this country regarded as different articles commercially, but witnesses for the pursuer deponed that at the port of shipment they were all considered to be "bones," and were shipped indiscriminately as such. George Hutcheson, one of the defenders, deponed that almost every cargo of what he admitted were rightly shipped as "bones" contained from a half to one per cent of horns, hoofs, and piths, but that when a quantity of these last three articles was tendered, as in the present case, they ought to be entered in the bill of lading, and were, according to the custom of the port of Aberdeen, separated from the bones by the ship before delivery to the meters. This evidence was corroborated by that of several purchasers of bones, &c., from Hutcheson & Co., and as regarded the practice of separation, by that of one or two meters. George Hutcheson further deponed that while the separation, which had in the present instance taken place, of the bones into four classes, had not been by his orders, but solely for the convenience of the meters, it was the practice for the ship to separate the horns, hoofs, and piths each into a class by itself before delivery. There was less corroboration of this branch of the alleged custom, which with the other was denied by the pursuer's witnesses, although it was admitted that whatever Hutcheson & Co. had demanded in the way of separation had hitherto been conceded by the masters, usually after a dispute, but until the present case without litigation. It further appeared that in many instances the charter-party stipulated for a certain number of lay-days for unloading, and there was no evidence that these days were in any case exceeded. The defenders lodged a state, shewing the times taken to unload all the vessels arriving at Aberdeen with bones, &c., from January 1883 down to December 1886. The results of this state appear from the Sheriff's note, infra. On the other hand several witnesses for the pursuer, including the stevedore employed by them to unload the "Una," deponed that she could easily have been un-the cargo exceeded the time allowed by the custom of the port of Aberdeen for discharging similar cargoes, and in consequence has assoilzied the defenders.

I am of opinion that the master was not bound to allow his ship to be used for the separation of the cargo; if there was anything wrong in the mixture of the cargo, recourse should have been against the shippers who loaded it, there being no allegation of any failure to stow properly on the part of the shipowner. I think that the shipowners were entitled to carry and deliver the cargo as it was tendered to them. The cargo was tendered as one of bones and ash, and as such was received by the shipowners. I think they were entitled to deliver it in bulk as they received it, and that the captain was not bound to allow the separation to be made on board his ship. I therefore think his claim for demurrage should be allowed.

My only ground for hesitation on the subject was as to whether the master of the vessel, by separating the cargo into different classes at the request of the merchants, though no doubt under protest, had not abandoned his contention and acquiesced in their demand. But I think this would be too stringent a view to take. The real foundation of the merchant's defence was that this separation of cargo was according to the custom of the port of Aberdeen. I do not think that any such custom has been proved. In the first place the trade in bones has grown up lately, within the last thirty years. Then there is only one merchant in Aberdeen who deals largely in bones, and that is the defender Mr Hutcheson, and his practice cannot raise up such a custom of the port as would be sufficient to bind traders. I think that the captain was entitled to deliver his cargo in bulk, any practice to the contrary not being binding.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur in the judgment which your Lordship proposes, and in doing so I cannot but express my regret that there should have been so much litigation about so small a matter. It is an action for payment of £28 only, and I do not see that the case presents any general question of such importance that it would be for the public use and benefit to have the decision of this Court on it. My concurrence rests on this simple ground that I cannot hold that the Sheriff-substitute, who took the evidence and disposed of the case, arrived at a wrong conclusion in construing the evidence. If I had been the Sheriff I think that I should have affirmed the Sheriff-substitute's decision. The import of the evidence according to that decision is that there was undue delay in discharging the cargo, and that that undue delay was occasioned by the consignee insisting on having the cargo separated into no less than eight classes before taking delivery, and so delaying the discharging of the cargo by four days. The Sheriff-substitute thought that that was an undue delay, and therefore gave decree for demurrage for these four days. I am not prepared to decide any more general question than that here—that the four days' demurrage was properly given in the circumstances of this particular case. Prima facie it looks unreasonable that a ship should be detained while the cargo is being sorted out in the hold or on deck, but everything depends on the nature of the cargo and the circumstances of the case. The cargo may be of such a kind that it cannot be thrown out of the ship in any way like a cartload of coals—it may frequently, perhaps commonly, be such as to require care and assortment while being discharged. I see no sufficient reason here, however, for differing from the conclusion of the Sheriff-substitute, that there was undue delay in discharging this particular cargo through the consignees insisting on having the separation made. The question raised as to the custom of the port is really as to the custom of this one merchant. It appears that he is in the habit of insisting on having the cargoes consigned to him separated on board the ships which brought them, but I cannot regard that as a custom of the port within the meaning of this charter-party. The practice of a single merchant to use ships in this way for his own convenience is not a custom of the sort to which the charter-party refers. With regard to a remark made by your Lordship as to the remonstrance of the captain, I think that the captain was powerless, and that he could only submit with a remonstrance. I think that he could not have resisted the wishes of the merchant. All he could say was, "I object to this separation, and you must pay for the delay it occasions, but if you choose to use the ship at £7 a-day I cannot actively interfere to prevent it." I think that he acted with propriety, and that his remonstrance was sufficient, and in giving judgment as we do now we are merely giving effect to that remonstrance.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that a portion of the cargo carried in the pursuer's vessel consisted of horns, hoofs, and piths, but that this portion was tendered and loaded as part of a cargo of bones, and that the whole cargo was loaded in bulk without separating one portion from another; (2) that in unloading at Aberdeen the consignees extended the time necessary for doing so by four days, which were occupied in separating the said portion from the rest of the cargo; (3) that the defenders have failed to prove that they were entitled by the custom of the port to use the ship for such separation: Find in law that the cargo having been shipped as a cargo of bones, the pursuer was entitled to deliver it in bulk, and is entitled to demurrage for the time occupied in separating it, and that £7 per day is a reasonable rate: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute: Of new ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £28 sterling, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the 5th day of March 1887 till paid: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses in this Court, and of new find him entitled to expenses in the inferior Court," &c.

Contract—Construction—Whether according to schedule rates or for a lump sum.—A builder, by offer appended to a schedule, offered to do the mason work of a proposed tenement, "agreeably to plans thereof now shewn and to the extent of this schedule, for the sum of £286, 10s. 8½d." The schedule, to which this letter was annexed, gave the estimated quantities of work required, and the offerer inserted the rate at which he proposed to do each item, adding a calculation of the cost of each item at that rate, and a summation at the end of the total cost, being the sum in the offer. Full power was reserved to the proprietor to alter the quantity of work required, and there was also this stipulation appended to the schedule,—"The work to be measured when finished and charged at schedule rates, or others corresponding thereto, as also in proportion to the slump sum in this letter of offer." In point of fact the offerer made an under calculation of about £30 in bringing out the cost of one item. Held that the contract was a contract according to the schedule rates, and not a contract for a lump sum, and that the offerer was not barred by his error from claiming the full sum brought out at his rates.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.
I.

DUNCAN M'INNES, grocer, Port-Glasgow, being desirous to build a tenement there, sent out (sometime prior to June 1883) schedules giving the estimated quantities of work required, with the view to tradesmen returning offers. Appended to the schedules for the digger, mason, and brick work, were the following "notes":—"The work to be done to the entire satisfaction of the proprietor and architect, or that of any person appointed by them to inspect the same, who reserve full power to increase, lessen, or altogether omit, or make any alterations on the work as they may think proper. The work to be measured when finished and charged at the schedule rates or others corresponding thereto, as also in proportion to the slump sum in the letter of offer."

Patrick Jamieson returned one of the schedules for the digger, mason, and brick work, with the rate at which he offered to do each item of work filled in, and also with a calculation of the cost of each item on the footing of these rates and the estimated quantity of the work given in the schedule. The total cost of the work, as Jamieson calculated it in the schedule, was £286, 10s. 8½d., at which sum he made an offer in the following terms:—"Sir,—I hereby offer to execute the digger, mason, and brick works of the tenement you propose to erect in Bay Street, Port-Glasgow, agreeably to plans thereof, now shewn, and to the extent of the schedule, for the sum of two hundred and eighty-six pounds ten shillings and eightpence halfpenny.—Sir, your obedt. servt."

This offer M'Innes accepted, but sometime afterwards the sum named was reduced by £5 on the proposal of Jamieson in the following terms:—"Dear Sir,—Having got a cheaper price for my mold columns and lintels, I want to give you share in the reductions, and will take £5 off my contract price, and hereby offer to work according to plans and specification for the sum of two hundred and eighty-one pound ten shillings (£281, 10s. 8½d). Your acceptance of this offer will be binding on your obt. ser."

When on its completion the work came to be measured it was found that Jamieson had under-calculated the cost of one item by £32, 10s. (as detailed in the Sheriff's note), and there were minor errors in other items, making the total difference £32, 11s. 9d. The amount of work actually done was less than the amount given in the schedule, and consequently the actual cost (on Jamieson's rates) was only £306, 18s. 5d., in place of £319, 2s. 5d., the sum that Jamieson should have brought out in his schedule. M'Innes, who had paid a sum to account, declined to pay the balance of £38, 15s. 5d., except under deduction of £31, 6s. 10d., that sum bearing the same proportion to £306, 18s. 5d. that £32, 11s. 9d. bore to £319, 2s. 5d.

In June 1887 Jamieson brought an action against M'Innes in the Debts Recovery Court, at Greenock, for the above balance of £38, 15s. 5d.

The question at issue was, whether the contract was for payment according to the schedule rates, as the pursuer maintained, or for a lump sum, according to the defender's contention, but the defender having pleaded the triennial prescription, that plea was sustained, and the case referred to the defender's oath. There was, however, no dispute about the material facts, which were as above narrated, and appeared from the defender's oath. He further deponed that he had had an offer to do the work for £289, 4s. from another mason, who would have got the contract had the pursuer's error been discovered before acceptance.

No. 8.
Oct. 29, 1887.
Jamieson v. M'Innes.

On 10th June 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Nicolson) found the oath affirmative of the reference, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

On appeal, on 2d August, the Sheriff (Moncreiff) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal, and recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 10th June 1887: Finds that the defender admits in his defences liability for the sum of £7, 8s. 7d.: Quoad ultra, for the reasons stated in the following note, finds the defender's deposition negative of the reference: Therefore decerns against the defender for the said sum of £7, 8s. 7d. sterling: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defender." *

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The contract was a contract according to the schedule rates, and not for a lump sum. The conditions of the contract generally, and in particular the provision for the measurement of the work when completed, made that plain. The defender so regarded the contract when that view was favourable to him, and repudiated it only when it would benefit the pursuer. He had had the completed work measured, and had taken advantage of the fact that the work actually done was smaller than the estimated quantity in the schedule by making that diminished quantity the basis of his calculation. In short, he treated the contract as being both for a lump sum and for the schedule rates, whereas, to be consistent, he ought to have admitted liability for £281, 10s. 8½d., neither more nor less.

Argued for the defender;—The Sheriff had taken the sound view. The only way of reconciling the somewhat obscure conditions of the contract was that adopted by the defender. The mistake was the pursuer's, and it was equitable that he should bear the consequences, and not the de-

* "NOTE.— . . . By estimate, No. 7 of process, the pursuer undertook to execute the work specified in the schedule for the sum of £286, 10s. 8d., and by a subsequent letter he reduced his offer to £281, 10s. 8½d. The defender, at the same time, got an offer from a firm of M'Bride & Company to execute the work for £289, 4s. The pursuer's offer was accepted, being the lowest, and the defender says (and of this there can be little doubt), that if he, the defender, had known that the pursuer's offer should really have been to do the work for a lump sum of £320, instead of £281 odds, the contract would have been given to M'Bride & Company, and not to the pursuer. The pursuer, however, maintains that he is not bound by the lump sum brought out in his offer. One of the items in the schedule, as filled up by the pursuer, stood thus:—'18″ brick walls, gables , &c. Roods 10 . 16 / 234/ £89, 14/.' Now, it is plain that if the rate is correct, the sum entered in the money column is incorrect. The sum should have been £122, 4s., instead of £89, 14s., making a difference of £32, 10s. The pursuer broadly maintains that the rate must rule, and not the sum set against it. No doubt the estimate, No. 7 of process, must be construed as part of the defender's oath; but on the evidence before me, I think the balance of considerations is against the pursuer. The original fault undoubtedly lay with him. Even if the defender ought, as a matter of prudence, to have checked the schedule before accepting the pursuer's offer, the greater fault was that of the pursuer. The purpose of filling up the money column and offering to do the work for a lump sum, presumably is to enable the customer to decide between competing offers; and if, through the carelessness of the offerer, too small a sum is brought out, it is only fair that he should bear the loss, and not the customer, who could have got the work done more cheaply by another contractor. No doubt the rate and the sum set against it cannot stand together. But why should the rate prevail, and why is it to be presumed that the rate is right and the sum wrong? The rate and the sum have no apparent relation to each other; the error is not merely clerical, such as the substitution of a 3 for a 5, and I fail to see why, if a mistake has been committed, the rate should be taken as binding on the defender. . . ."

fender, who, beyond question, could have had the work done for less than the sum now claimed.

Lord Young.—It it had not been for the judgment of the Sheriff I should not have thought this case arguable. The pursuer contracted to do a certain amount of work at prices according to rates put down in a schedule. The schedule was made out in the ordinary form, and as usually happens, the price of each item was calculated on the estimated amount of work according to the schedule rate, and the whole summed up at the end. The parties assumed that it was correctly calculated and summed up, for the pursuer offered to do the work for the sum of £286, 10s. 8½d. thus brought out, and the defender accepted that offer. The contract, however, was not a contract to do the work for a lump sum, but a contract for a sum to be fixed when the work had all been finished, and measured, so as to shew what amount of work was actually done, and the schedule rates applied to that actual amount of work. Well, that was what was done here; the work when finished was measured, and the rates were applied to the measurements, and the sum sued for is the balance still due on the sum so brought out. It appears that the pursuer's original calculation of £286, 10s. 8½d. was an under-estimate to the extent of about £30, and the defender declines to pay the pursuer except under deduction of that sum. The answer which the pursuer makes is, "Oh, but the error was an error calculi in applying the schedule rates to the estimated amount of work to be done, bringing out a smaller total than I was entitled to charge." "True," replies the defender, "but the error was yours, and I am entitled to have the difference deducted from your account." I think that is an extravagant proposal, but to excuse its extravagance the defender says that when he had the pursuer's offer before him he also had another offer to do the work for a somewhat larger sum than the pursuer's, as it erroneously appeared to be, but which is somewhat smaller than the sum now claimed by the pursuer, and the defender says that he would not have accepted the pursuer's offer had he not been induced to do so by the pursuer naming the smaller total sum. I do not think that is a good plea; the work was honestly done, and ought to be paid for. No injustice, therefore, will be done by giving the pursuer the decree which he asks. But I do not proceed on that ground. I think that the contract was a contract for a sum to be fixed according to measurement, and not for a lump sum.

Lord Craighill.—I concur. On reading the papers last night I cannot say that I had any doubt upon this question. I think the contract was not one by which the contractor undertook for a lump sum to execute the digging, mason, and brick work that was provided in the specification, but on the contrary was a contract by which he became bound to do the work at certain rates, which were specified; what was to be due to the contractor depended upon the extent of the work done, as multiplied by the rates which were specified. The brick work, like the rest, was measured at the end of the day, as was provided for by the contract. The fact that there was to be a measurement of the work after the work was done shews that it was in the view of the parties that the quantities in the specification were not to be conclusive. If anything was to be conclusive it was a second measurement, by which the extent of work done was to be ascertained, and a charge made at the specified rates. It is true that an error was committed, but it seems to me that that error is of the same legal character as an error in addition.

Jamieson v. M'Innes.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Sheriff-substitute was right, and the Sheriff was wrong, when the one held, and the other did not, that the contract was one for work done as at certain rates, and that the contractor is entitled to the sum sued for, notwithstanding the error that was committed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur in the judgment proposed. There are only two questions to determine—namely, what is the contract? and what is due under the contract? What the pursuer claims is for work done under the contract, measured according to the contract, and at rates specified in the contract. Now, I cannot see my way to resist the argument by which that claim is supported. But what the defender says is, that he had a lower offer which he would have accepted but for the total sum of pursuer's offer being of the amount of £31 less than what is sued for. Well, that may be so, but that rather points to a different remedy. I am not going to say whether or not there is a claim for damages on the part of the defender for being led to reject an offer to do the work for a less sum than the pursuer is entitled to under the contract. Nor would I say that such an action should be brought; but it seems clear on the present contract, and on this record, that the pursuer must get paid on the actual measurement and at the rates which he stipulated for.

M.

THE NORTH BRITISH FRESH FISH SUPPLY COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, with its registered office in Scotland, and having a nominal capital of £50,000 in 50,000 shares of £1 each, of which the first issue of 30,000 shares was offered in December 1886.

On 22d December 1886 William Simpson Miln, Southgate Road, London, sent an application for 1000 of these shares in the following terms:—"To the Directors of The North British Fish Supply Company, Limited.

"Gentlemen,—Having paid to your bankers the sum of £25 stg., being a deposit of 2s. 6d. per share, less 2s. per share commission, on an application for 1000 shares of £1 each in the North British Fresh Fish Supply Company, Limited, I hereby request you to allot me that number, and I agree to accept such shares, or any less number you may allot to me, upon the terms of the accompanying prospectus, dated December 1886. I further agree to pay to your bankers the sum of 7s. 6d. per share on allotment, and the further sums as provided by the prospectus, and I authorise you to place my name on the register of shareholders in respect of such shares." Then followed the applicant's signature, address, and occupation, with the date.

Enclosed with this application was a letter from Miln to the secretary of the company in these terms:—"22d December 1886. Dear Sir,—Enclosed I beg to hand you application for 1000 shares, together with £25, being deposit of 2s. 6d. per share, less 2s. per share commission. Please to put this application before your directors at their allotment meeting on the following conditions: I do not wish to invest my own money in the shares of your company up to that extent, but see my way to invest 1000 shares amongst my friends and clients. Although I have been very busy lately, still a good many shares were applied for through me, and certainly after allotment I feel sure that I can place at least that number, more especially as the London Founders' Association, Limited, have agreed to give me their full commission of 10 per cent. I authorise to forfeit the deposit sent you herewith in case I fail to place the shares I apply for within two months from this date. I intend to remit you as and when I sell the shares, which I will sell by transfer out of my name, giving you notice of every transfer I sign.—Yours faithfully."

On the 23d December the secretary of the company sent to Miln—(1) An allotment letter of that date for the 1000 shares, shewing 2s. 6d. per share, or £125, as paid on application, and 7s. 6d. per share, or £375, as payable on allotment; and (2) a receipt for "the sum of £25, being the deposit of 2s. 6d. per share required on the application for an allotment of 1000 shares of £1 each in the above company (less 2s. per share commission)."

On the 23d February 1887 Miln wrote to the directors of the company in these terms:—"Dear Sirs,—I beg to refer you to my letter of 22d December last with reference to my conditional application for shares, and of which a copy is herewith annexed, and to now inform you I have not placed the shares for many good reasons." He then gave his reasons, and concluded—"I believe the company will succeed if properly controlled. If the board intend to exercise real control, and by this I mean that the London directors will attend the meetings, I have no doubt that I will be able to place the shares referred to or even more, and I shall therefore be obliged by the directors extending the time for placing them for three months from this date.—Yours faithfully."

The secretary of the company replied on the 4th March intimating "that the directors agree to grant your request for an extension of time for three months, from 22d February 1887, to enable you to get the shares allotted to you placed amongst your friends. I shall be glad to receive any transfers you make as soon as they are signed."

Miln did not get any of the shares placed, and on 4th July intimated this to the secretary of the company, and requested that in the circumstances the deposit of £25 should be refunded, he returning the receipt for £25 and abandoning his commission. On 27th July the directors replied that they had no power to do anything in the matter. Miln then intimated to the company that he had resolved to abandon the £25 deposited on application, and he at the same time returned the allotment letter and receipt, and requested that his name should be removed from the register of members. On 26th September the secretary of the company intimated that the directors were advised that they had no power to remove Miln's name without an order of the Court.

Miln then presented this petition to the Court, under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), for rectification of the register of the company by removal of his name therefrom.

The petitioner set forth the substance of the foregoing correspondence, and then averred:—"Throughout the whole transaction the petitioner acted as paid agent of the company, and the shares were allotted in his name provisionally and for convenience in the execution of the agency. The petitioner's name accordingly should now be removed from the register of members, the agency to facilitate which the shares were so provisionally registered having proved abortive and come to an end."

The Company lodged answers, in which they admitted the correspondence, but stated,—"The petitioner duly applied for the shares in question, and, as he was well aware at the time, these shares were allotted to him, and he was entered on the register as a shareholder in respect thereof, and agreed to become a shareholder in respect thereof. The shares were all along dealt with by the petitioner and the company as having been finally and unconditionally allotted to and accepted by the petitioner. In these circumstances, the respondents submit that the petitioner's averments are irrelevant and, so far as material, unfounded in fact; that the petitioner has no title to make or insist in the present application; and that the petition should be refused, with expenses."

Argued for the petitioner;—The question here, under the 23d section of the Act,* was whether the petitioner had agreed to become a member of the company. The fair reading of the correspondence was that he had not. Neither he nor the directors intended that he should become a shareholder. His name was no doubt put on the register, but that was merely part of the machinery to carry out the real agreement between him and the company. It was not intended thereby to make him a shareholder. The parties thought that his name might be put on the register without making him a shareholder, and, no question with creditors arising (and there was none here), effect should be given to what the parties supposed, even if erroneously, to be within their powers. In Muir's case[1] there was no question about the trustees, whose position was in question, being shareholders; the only question was whether they might be shareholders qua trustees, i.e., whether shareholders of a company might be such with a qualification. Here the question was whether the petitioner was a shareholder at all. With reference to the distinction between conditions precedent and collateral agreements, illustrated by the passage from Lord Cairns' opinion in Elkington's case,[2] cited by the respondent, it was held in Simpson's case,[3] on evidence very similar to the present, that the condition was precedent. Pellatt's case[4] was to the same effect. But it was to be observed that the distinction drawn by Lord Cairns had reference to the conditions under which persons agreed to become shareholders—and not to the conditions of their registration in the register of members. Here, even if the petitioner had unconditionally allowed his name to go on the register, he had, as already stated, never agreed to become a member conditionally or otherwise; consequently Lord Cairns' dictum had no application.

Argued for the respondents;—The application for shares here was in the ordinary form, and was unconditional—and the letter of allotment was the same. The letter which accompanied the application, so far from qualifying that application, made it plain that the applicant intended to become a shareholder, for he spoke of signing transfers of the shares, which only a shareholder could do. There could be no doubt that the petitioner became a shareholder, and had his name put on the register with his own full intention and authority. If there was an agreement between him and the directors as to the purpose for which he took the shares, it was plain that that agreement was not intended to be suspensive of his becoming a shareholder. Consequently, the case fell within the first of the alternatives put by Lord Cairns in the following passage from Elkington's[1] case. "The real point for determination in this case may be said to be this: Did Messrs E. intend and agree to become shareholders in presenti, with a collateral agreement as to what should be the effect of their so becoming shareholders? or, on the other hand, did they agree that if and when a certain preliminary condition should be performed, and not otherwise, they would become members and shareholders?" The contention of the petitioner really came to this, that he held in trust for the company, but Muir's case had finally settled that a trust or any other qualification of shareholders' registration could not be recognised. The present was a case of an absolute contract with a collateral agreement.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that this is quite a clear case. The petitioner, on 22d December 1886, applied for shares in this company in the usual way by letter of application, in which he expresses his agreement to accept one thousand shares, or any less number which the directors might allot to him, upon the terms of the accompanying prospectus, and he authorises the directors to place his name on the register of shareholders in respect of such shares. This was accordingly done in due and competent form, and the question comes to be whether there was any agreement apart from this letter of application and consequent registration of the petitioner's name which suspended the petitioner's liability and imported an agreement that his name was not to be put on the register until a condition precedent had been fulfilled. There certainly is no such agreement in this case. The letter of 22d December, which accompanied the letter of application, and which was founded on by Mr Lorimer as implying such a suspensive condition, I think plainly contemplates that the petitioner's name was to be put on the register, and was not to be removed from the register except in one way, and that is by the petitioner executing a transfer or transfers in favour of other persons. Now, no one can execute a transfer of shares except a shareholder, and therefore I think that this letter proves very clearly that what was to be done—was necessarily to be done—was to register the petitioner's name, and to register it as that of a partner of this company. But no one can be registered as a partner of a company such as this with a qualified liability—no one can be registered as a partner without incurring the same liabilities as the other partners, and therefore even if we suppose that there was such an agreement as Mr Lorimer contended for, that the petitioner was only to become partner conditionally,—even if we suppose that the letter of 22d December bore that meaning expressly,—I do not think it would have aided the petitioner, for I think that such an agreement would have been plainly beyond the powers of the directors. But I do not think the letter can be read as implying any such agreement. I think the petitioner's meaning was just this,—"I do not intend to continue a partner after I can find other persons willing to take my shares, but I do intend to become a partner, and to do so with the view of being able to transfer my shares in regular and competent form to the other persons when I find them." That being so, I am of opinion that the petitioner is not entitled to have his name removed from the register, and accordingly I am for refusing the petition.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—The question under the 23d section of the Companies Act, 1862, is this: Did the petitioner agree to become a member of the company? Now, I am of opinion that anyone who has applied for shares, and requested his name to be put on the register of shareholders, has agreed to become a member of the company. There is a class of cases where the applicant stipulates that registration is to take place only after some condition precedent has been fulfilled, and if in such a case the directors proceed to register the applicant's name at once, without waiting for the fulfilment of the condition, they exceed their mandate, and the Court will give redress. Here we have no such case. It is plain that this is a case in which the applicant requested that he should be registered as a shareholder at once, and unconditionally, for his intention, as stated in his letter, was to dispose of his shares after he was registered, and to transfer them to new shareholders; and so I think he is liable as a member. I also agree in your Lordship's observations as to the want of power of the directors of a company like this to register anyone as a shareholder with qualified liability.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT refused the petition.

Heir and Executor—Incidence of burdens.—Heritable property, burdened to the extent of £5000, was sold for £5100, the seller coming under an obligation to clear off incumbrances upon payment of the price. A few days after the purchase the purchaser died intestate. At the time of his death he had almost completed negotiations for a re-sale of the property, of which he had still to pay the price, and which was still burdened for £5000. In a special case between his heir and his executor, held (1) that it being incompetent to look at the circumstances as evidence of an intention on the part of the deceased to treat the subject purchased as moveable, it fell as heritable succession to the heir; and

No. 10. (2) that the price of £5100 fell to be paid by the executor without relief from the heir.

Ramsay v. Ramsay.
1st Division.
M.

On 19th July 1885 the subjects known as the Abbotshall Mills, near Kirkcaldy, were exposed to sale by public roup. By the articles of roup the purchasers were to have entry at 1st September 1885, the price being payable on or before that day, and the exposers bound themselves to clear the subjects of incumbrances. The subjects were then burdened with two bonds for £4000 and £1000 respectively.

Mr John Chalmers Ramsay, wine-merchant, Kirkcaldy, purchased the mills at the roup for the price of £5100.

Mr Ramsay died suddenly, intestate, on 6th August 1885. He was then negotiating, and had almost completed, a sale of the mills to David Yule, merchant, Kirkcaldy. At the date of his death the price of the mills had not been paid, nor was any conveyance thereof granted in his favour, and the bonds remained undischarged. Thereafter, on 18th September 1885, William Smith Ramsay, brother and heir-at-law of the deceased, sold the mills to Yule for £6000.

A question having arisen between W. S. Ramsay, as heir-at-law, and Andrew Ramsay, as executor-dative of the deceased, as to the liability for the price of £5100 agreed to be paid by the deceased for the mills, a special case was presented. The executor was the first party, and the heir the second.

The facts just narrated were stated in the case.

The second party contended that while the right to the subjects acquired by the deceased was heritable, and vested in the second party as heir-at-law, the price, which was not paid at the time of his death, formed a burden on his executry, and fell to be paid out of his moveable estate. The first party, on the other hand, maintained that the subjects having been burdened at the time of the sale with heritable debts amounting to £5000, the second party, as heir-at-law of the deceased, was only entitled to the subjects under burden of these bonds, which he himself must discharge, and was not entitled to have any part of the price paid out of the executry.

The question put was:—"Whether the executry estate of the said John Chalmers Ramsay is liable for the foresaid sum of £5100, agreed to be paid by him as the price of the said subjects, without relief from the second party? or, Whether the second party, as the heir-at-law of the said John Chalmers Ramsay, takes the said subjects under burden of the heritable debts thereon, and is not entitled to have the price or any part thereof paid out of the executry?"

Argued for the first party;—It was competent to look at the circumstances in order to determine whether the deceased intended property de facto heritable to be regarded as moveable,[1] and the whole circumstances here left no doubt that that was Mr Ramsay's intention. In any case, the heir could take the heritable property only under burden of the debts existing over it at Mr Ramsay's death. The obligation to purge of incumbrances was a personal obligation in favour of the deceased, which vested in his executor.

The second party was not called on.

Lord President.—This is a hard case no doubt, but I am afraid that there is nothing more to be said for the executor beyond what Mr Reid has urged, and that has failed to convince me that the executor is entitled to any relief.

No. 10.

Nov. 15, 1887.
Ramsay v. Ramsay.

The deceased was not debtor in any debt binding his heritable estate. He was personally liable in payment of the price of certain heritable property, and that is a debt which transmits against his executor. The heritable estate, the price of which the deceased was personally bound to pay, was burdened with two bonds, which the sellers were under obligation to discharge on receipt of the price, so that what the purchaser—the deceased—was to get was an unencumbered estate, and what he was to give in exchange was a sum of £5100 in cash, and in these circumstances it is impossible to say that there is any heritable debt of which the heir is bound to relieve the executor. The case of Macnicol, which was referred to by Mr Reid, is, I think, almost conclusive against his contention, if, indeed, there is any room for doubt as to the general principle of law, and the other case cited by Mr Reid,—the case of Ross v. Clayton,—is an illustration of the same principle. It is very fully reported in the Faculty Collection, though meagrely in Shaw, but the result is that the deceased, the purchaser, took over a bond on the estate which he had bought, which, according to the ordinary rule of law, transmitted against his heir without relief against the executor. That is exactly the converse of the present case. I think your Lordships should answer the first branch of the question put in the case in the affirmative.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I agree, and do not indeed think the question doubtful. The deceased had before his death stipulated that he should get an heritable estate unencumbered with debt. On the other hand, he was under obligation to pay a sum of £5100 as the price of the unencumbered heritable estate, and that money must be paid by the executors. It is quite true that all might have been changed had the deceased lived a week longer and completed the sale of the property which he was in process of carrying out at his death; but I do not think that we are entitled to look at such intentions on the part of one who has died intestate, although, had they been carried into effect, the character of his succession would have been materially changed. I think the Court can look only at the condition of the estate of the deceased as it was at the time of his death.

LORD ADAM.—I think we must here be guided by the rules of intestate succession only, and to look at the supposed intention of the deceased would just be to make a will for him when he has himself made none.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find and declare in terms of the first question in the case that the executry estate of the deceased John Chalmers Ramsay is liable for the sum of £5100, agreed to be paid by him as the price of the Abbotshall Mills, without relief from the second party."

persons employed in the British white and herring fisheries the right to use all shores and forelands in Great Britain "below the highest high-water mark, and for the space of 100 yards on any waste or uncultivated land beyond such mark, within the land, for landing their nets, casks, and other materials, utensils, and stores, and for erecting tents, huts, and stages, and for landing, pickling, curing, and reloading their fish, and in drying their nets, without paying any foreland or other dues."

Prior to 1868 a piece of ground about four acres in extent, lying between a high road and the sea, and within 100 yards above the highest high-water mark, was in a waste and uncultivated condition. In that year the proprietor, at some expense, had it levelled, top-dressed with earth, and sown out with grass seeds, the result being that in place of a piece of beach with very rough accommodation for nets, a piece of fairly good pasture and of good net ground was provided. Both prior to and after 1868 fishermen made use of it for drying their nets, &c., paying a small rent to the tenant of the farm to which the ground belonged. In 1886 they claimed right to make use of it, under the above statute, without payment of rent. In an action by the proprietor and his tenant to have the fishermen interdicted from so using the ground, held that the ground was not waste or uncultivated. Interdict granted accordingly.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.
I.

IN August 1886 Hercules Scott, of Brotherton, and David Legg, tenant of the farm of Whitehouse, part of the estate of Brotherton, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against William Gray and two other fishermen, residing at Gourdon, praying to have the defenders interdicted from "entering on the ground on the farm of Whitehouse, lying between a road leading from Gourdon to Johnshaven on the one side, and the sea-shore on the other, and from laying down or drying herring-nets or other fishing material thereon, or on any part thereof, or in any other way interfering with or disturbing the pursuers in the possession of the same."

In defence the defenders, founding on the Act 11 Geo. III. cap. 31, sec. 11,* averred that the ground in question was waste or uncultivated ground in the sense of the Act (which the pursuers denied), and pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The ground in question being waste or uncultivated, and on the sea-coast within the limits prescribed by the statute founded on, the defenders are entitled, in the exercise of their trade, to the free use and possession thereof, for the special purposes authorised by the statutes.

A proof was allowed. The following excerpt from the note of the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) sufficiently shews the result of the evidence:—"The piece of ground in dispute lies between a road and the sea. Its extent is about 4 acres. It is not, and never has been, enclosed; and on the side next to the sea it is plain that it could not be enclosed, except at great expense. The ground consists of shingle and rock, and prior to 1868 it was properly designated as beach, and it undoubtedly then lay waste. Its surface was then partly bare and partly covered with rough grass and thorns. It was uneven; partly from natural inequalities, and partly because it had been used as a place for depositing stones from the adjacent lands. The situation of the ground is immediately above high-water mark, and within 100 yards of it. High waves occasionally wash over it, or parts of it, in storms; but this does not make it foreshore. The highest place where the water has left any mark is the steep bank of shingle spoken to by the witnesses, and the bare strip, 3 or 5 yards wide, along the top of it. . . . In 1869 and 1870 it was improved. It was levelled, the thorns removed, the bare parts covered or top-dressed with a coat of earth of an inch or two in thickness, and it was then sown out with grass seeds. This work was done at an outlay to the proprietor of between £14 and £15, the tenant performing the cartages. No estimate of the value of the latter was or probably could be given; but they must have borne a fair proportion to the rest. Assuming that the whole expenditure was from £20 to £30, this makes an expenditure per acre of from about £5 to about £7. The result has been that in place of a piece of beach with very rough pasture and only partial accommodation for nets a piece of fairly good pasture and of good net ground has been provided. The object was to improve the ground for both purposes, and it may be doubted whether, if it had not been for the sake of increasing the rents for nets, the improvement would have been undertaken. The improvements alleged to have been made by the fishermen apparently did not amount to much. When spreading their nets they seem to have thrown aside stones brought up by the sea, to have occasionally filled up holes, and occasionally cut away thorns. The principal use of the lands hitherto has been for spreading nets, and the statute now founded on by the defenders having apparently been forgotten, the fishermen appear to have made annual payments for the privilege, both before and after the improvements; and these payments being made to the adjacent tenant, who did the carting, also covered anything that could be claimed either for it or for the ground." It was in consequence of the defenders claiming the right to use the ground without payment that the present proceedings were brought.

* The Act 11 Geo. III. cap. 31 ("For the encouragement of the White Herring Fishery"), sec. 11, enacts,—"That all and every person or persons employed in the said fisheries may fish in any part of the British seas, and shall have and exercise the free use of all ports, harbours, shores, and forelands in Great Britain, or the islands belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, below the highest high-water mark, and for the space of 100 yards on any waste or uncultivated land beyond such mark, within the land, for landing their nets, casks, and other materials, utensils, and stores, and for erecting tents, huts, and stages, and for the landing, pickling, curing, and reloading their fish, and in drying their nets, without paying any foreland or other dues, or any other sum or sums of money or other consideration whatsoever for such liberty (except as hereinafter excepted), any law, statute, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

On 21st February 1887, the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have failed to prove that the defenders have exceeded the rights conferred upon them by the Statute 11th Geo. III. c. 31, sec. 11, and therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the petition: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This seems to me a very difficult case, and I should not be surprised if differences of opinion were entertained as to it." (The Sheriff-substitute then gave the substance of the proof as above quoted.) "There is room for a great deal of argument as to whether the ground in dispute comes under the definition of 'waste or uncultivated land.' If it had been land enclosed by a permanent fence it might have been brought under the category of permanent pasture, and thus have been considered to be neither waste nor uncultivated. But it is not enclosed, and, as already pointed out, apparently could not be enclosed, except at great expense, on the sea side. It is not waste land, as it apparently has some annual value; but if it is not 'uncultivated land' within the meaning of the statute, I am at a loss to see what land there is which the statute could have meant to include. If any trace of the exercise of human skill upon land is to be held as taking it out of the category of 'uncultivated,' of course this land is cultivated, because something has been done to it. This, however, is a very strict view, and it does not preclude the possibility of the view that, in the ordinary use of language, this is what would be called 'uncultivated land.' The Legislature must have been thinking of the division of land

No. 11.

Nov. 15, 1887. Scott v. Gray.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled this interlocutor; found that the defenders had failed to prove that the ground to which access was claimed was waste or uncultivated land within the meaning of the Act of Parliament; repelled the defences, and granted interdict as craved; found the defenders liable in expenses, &c.*

into cultivated and uncultivated, and it is necessary to see what it meant to include in the latter description. I have consulted a large number of dictionaries, but I have found no better definition of the word 'cultivate' than that contained in the original edition of Johnson, viz., 'to forward or improve the product of the earth by manual industry.' This at once excludes from view all that has been done to the land simply to improve it as a net ground, and to do this seems reasonable under the statute. If the fishermen have a right to use the ground in a state of nature for net ground, the Legislature cannot have meant that they were to be obliged to pay rent for it simply because the proprietor made it better for their purposes than they asked it to be made. It is only the industry which has gone to improve or forward the product of the earth—in this case the pasture—which can be taken into account. This view probably throws out of consideration the bulk of the improvement which was done, as but for the chance of drawing rents for the nets the ground would probably not have been worth the touching. Then as to the agricultural improvement, if a little top-dressing with earth and the sowing of some seeds is enough to take away the statutory right, it can be taken away wherever it is valuable. This consideration would be immaterial if it appeared that such a treatment of the land could be called cultivation in the ordinary sense of the word. I do not think it can be so called. It is only land still in its natural condition, though somewhat improved. Of cultivation in the ordinary sense the land indeed seems incapable, and it does not occur to me that anyone desirous of describing this piece of ground, apart from any ulterior motives, would think of describing it as a piece of cultivated land adjoining the sea-shore. It seems to me that, while he would naturally speak of the farms on the other side of the road as being cultivated land, he would speak of this as a bit of still uncultivated land between them and the sea. Whatever a more persevering system of improvement may have been able to do with the adjacent lands, the mere skin of soil which overlies the shingle seems as yet uncultivated, and incapable of anything that could be called tillage. If it can be cultivated, in the ordinary sense of the word, the pursuers are at liberty to do so, and the statutory rights of the defenders to its use would at once end."

* "NOTE.—The ground in question lies between the sea-beach and the road leading from Gourdon to Johnshaven. Beyond doubt it is part of the pursuer's estate, and without his consent no one is entitled at common law to enter upon it for any purpose whatever. The question whether the defenders, being fishermen, are entitled to use it during the herring fishing for the purposes of spreading and drying their nets turns on the construction of the Act 11th George III. cap. 31, sec. 11. The Sheriff-substitute has thrown on the pursuer the burden of proving the negative. In my opinion there is no onus on the pursuer at all. The field—if it may be so called—is embraced in his title, and, having established this much, it is not for him, but for the defenders, who are claimants in solo alieno, to make out their case. The Act on which they found applies to 'waste or uncultivated land' within a certain distance of the sea. We all know what these words mean in popular speech. All along the sea-coast there are great stretches of rocky, shingly, barren land, void and worthless, but excellent for the spreading and drying of nets; and it is enacted that wherever this may be found the fishermen may take it for net ground without asking anybody's leave. It is assumed that no one will object, or rather that no one will have any interest to object, for it is supposed to be lying unoccupied and valueless in its natural state. But when, by a little expenditure, the proprietor has been able to reclaim it to the extent at least of making it worth something for agricultural purposes, it was never contemplated that it should remain subject to those uses which the Act sanctions for the benefit of the

LORD YOUNG.—The issue which this case presents is one of pure fact, without any law in it at all, that question of fact being whether the piece of ground referred to is or is not waste or uncultivated. If it is, then the pursuer must fail; if it is not, then I think he must succeed.

Upon this question of fact the Sheriffs have differed in opinion, the Sheriff-substitute, however, stating at the outset of his judgment—which is a thoughtful and carefully considered judgment, as all his judgments are—that it seemed to him a very difficult case, and that he should not be surprised if difference of opinion were entertained regarding it.

The case really involves this question, what departure from being waste and uncultivated will make ground cease to be properly so described? It seems that some years ago upon this piece of ground some money was expended—although not very much—and it has thereby been converted into what the Sheriff-substitute describes in his note as a piece of fairly good pasture and good net ground. Now, with great deference to the Sheriff-substitute, I do not think that such language,—which, with him, I think applicable to the case in hand,—is consistent with the ground being waste and uncultivated. It has been cultivated, though not at a very large expense, still money has been expended on it, with the result of making it a piece of fairly good pasture and good net ground. That being its condition, it has been let by the landlord to the tenant of the farm of which it is part, and he partly pastures it and still more extensively gets the benefit of it by taking a rent from the fishermen who use it as a good net ground. Well, if we refuse the term "waste or uncultivated" to this piece of ground, the legal conclusion is certain that the pursuer must succeed. That being my view on the question of fact, agreeing therein with the Sheriff-principal, I think his judgment is right, and ought to be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not wish to dissent from the judgment to which your Lordships have come. My impression originally was—and I must confess to a certain extent still is—towards the opposite conclusion, but the line of demarcation is slender, and, as I have said, I do not wish to say anything fur-fishermen when it was in a state of nature. The operations carried out by the pursuer consisted in first filling up the holes, levelling down the hummocks, and spreading any soil which they contained on the surface. This occupied the witness Caird and three assistants six or seven weeks. Some carts of soil were then strewn on the levelled ground wherever it was required, and the whole sown over with grass seeds. These grew abundantly, and there is now a good sole of grass upon it, worth, according to the skilled witnesses, 10s. or 12s. an acre. In my opinion ground which has been treated in this manner is properly called pasture, and not waste. I attach no importance to the fact that it is still unenclosed, for it lies along the sea-beach, and it is not necessary to fence against the sea; nor that it has no depth of soil sufficient to bear the plough, for when grass is the crop to be cultivated, no ploughing is required. In my opinion all the evidence tends to shew that the field in question has, by the judicious operations of the pursuer, ceased to be of the description mentioned in the Act of Parliament, and that in a question with the public he is entitled to be protected in this property."

Cessio—Bankruptcy—Cash payment by insolvent debtor—Effect of cessio.—A petition was presented in the Sheriff Court to ordain A, a farmer, to grant a disposition omnium bonorum under the Cessio Acts. On 28th September, the Sheriff, on the narrative that he was satisfied that there was prima facie evidence of A's notour bankruptcy, ordained him to lodge a state of his affairs by 6th October. On 30th September, A granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. He did not lodge the state required by the deliverance, but on 7th October he sold part of his stock, and paid the proceeds to a firm of merchants in payment of an account due by him to them. The merchants were at the date at which the payment was made aware of A's insolvency, that the petition for cessio had been presented, and the first order pronounced thereon. In a question between the trustee and the firm of merchants held that the trustee was entitled to repetition of the amount paid to them in respect of their debt.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perth.
I.

ON 15th September 1886, David Shaw, farmer, Mid-Derry, in the parish of Glenisla, was charged on an extract registered protest, recorded in the Sheriff Court Books of Forfarshire, at the instance of James Matthewson of Little Kilry, for payment of a bill for £155, 1s. 2d., with interest. Shaw failed to implement the charge, which expired on 21st September 1886; he having been previously insolvent, thereupon became notour bankrupt.

A petition, at the instance of Mr Matthewson, was forthwith presented to the Sheriff of Forfarshire at Forfar to compel Shaw to grant a disposition omnium bonorum under the Cessio Acts, and on 28th September an interlocutor was pronounced by the Sheriff, on the narrative that he was "satisfied from the productions that there is prima facie evidence of the notour bankruptcy of David Shaw," inter alia, ordaining Shaw to lodge with the clerk a state of his affairs by 6th October, and appointing him to appear for examination on 12th October. The petition and this deliverance were forthwith served on Shaw, and were advertised in the Edinburgh Gazette of 1st October.

On 30th September Shaw executed a trust-disposition of all his estates in favour of James Lamond, Alyth, for behoof of his creditors.

Shaw did not lodge a state of his affairs on 6th October as required by the deliverance of 28th September. On 7th October Shaw sold the stock and implements on his farm to certain persons, and on the same day he paid to Messrs Stewart & Bisset, merchants, Blairgowrie, the sum of £101, 9s. 11d., in payment of an account alleged to be due by him to them.

On 10th December 1886 Mr Lamond, Shaw's trustee, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Perth against Messrs Stewart & Bisset, concluding for repetition of the sum of £101, 9s. 11d. above mentioned.

Shaw's Trustee v. Stewart & Bisset.

Lamond averred;—(Cond. 4) "The said David Shaw fraudulently, on or about the 7th day of October last, removed from the said farm of Mid-Derry the live stock thereon, together with the implements of husbandry, and by a fraudulent device or arrangement he, of the said date, sold or pretended to sell the said stock and implements to certain parties, who were conjunct and confident with him, for a fraudulent purpose, and not in the ordinary course of business or in the open market, and said bankrupt uplifted the proceeds of these goods. The said proceedings on the part of David Shaw were well known to the defenders, and indeed it was by their advice and at their instigation that David Shaw acted as he did." (Cond. 5) "The said David Shaw also entered into a fraudulent and collusive arrangement with the defenders, by which, on or about the said 7th day of October last, he paid to the defenders the sum of £101, 9s. 11d., which was intended fraudulently and collusively to pay an alleged account said to be due by the said David Shaw to the defenders, but which account was not legally due and resting owing by the bankrupt to the defenders at the said 7th day of October 1886."

The defenders denied these averments.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The payment of the foresaid sum of £101, 9s. 11d. to the defender having been fraudulent and collusive, the pursuer, as trustee for the creditors, is entitled to demand repetition thereof; et separatim, the said £101, 9s. 11d. not being legally resting owing to the defenders at the time, the same falls to be repaid. (2) The defenders being in the knowledge of the insolvency of Shaw, were barred by personal exception from taking payment of the foresaid money, and they are in mala fide and are bound to repeat. (4) The said payment by the bankrupt to the defenders was not in the ordinary course of business, but was made subsequent to the public insolvency of Shaw, which was within the knowledge of the defenders, and was therefore fraudulent and illegal under the Act 1696, c. 5, the Act 1621, c. 18, the Cessio Acts, and at common law, and repetition falls to be made.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The payment referred to having been made in ordinary course of business, and in discharge of a bona fide debt due by Shaw to defenders, the action should be dismissed. (2) The averments of collusion and fraud on the part of defenders being entirely unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied.

Proof was led in the cause. A considerable part of the evidence was directed to the question whether the alleged debt was really due by Shaw to the defenders. The Sheriff-substitute (Graham) held that it was, but the Sheriff (Gloag), on appeal, held that it was not. In the Court of Session the judgment proceeded on the assumption that the debt was due.

It was proved that the defenders were aware that Shaw was insolvent at the date at which the payment of which repetition was sought was made, and that an application for cessio had been made. It was, in the opinion of the Court of Session, also proved that they were aware of the granting of the first deliverance in the cessio process.

On 29th March 1887 the Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the defenders, on the ground that it was not proved that the payment in question was made fraudulently or in collusion with the defenders, and that the pursuer could not claim repetition either under the statutes founded on by him or at common law.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, who, on 8th June, pronounced an interlocutor containing these findings:—"(1) That David Shaw, sometime farmer at Strone, thereafter at Mid-Derry, became notour bankrupt on or about 21st September 1886, in respect of his insolvency concurring with an expired charge for payment of a bill due to his landlord, Mr James Mathewson: (2) That in a petition for decree of cessio, presented in the Sheriff Court at Forfar by the said James Mathewson against the said David Shaw, an interlocutor was pronounced, dated 28th September 1886, whereby, inter alia, the said David Shaw was ordered to lodge a state of his affairs in the hands of the Clerk of Court on 6th October 1886, which order he failed to obey: (3) That on 7th October 1886 the said David Shaw sold a large part of the stock on his farm, and on the same day paid the defenders out of the proceeds of said sale the sum of £101, 9s. 11d., being the amount of an account alleged to be due to the defenders by the said David Shaw: (4) That when said payment was made the defenders were aware that said petition for cessio had been presented some days previously, and that the money paid to them, or great part thereof, was part of the proceeds of said sale: (5) That when said payment was made the said David Shaw was hopelessly insolvent, and was known by the defenders to be so: (6) That it is not proved that the said sum of £101, 9s. 11d. was due by Shaw to the defenders: Finds in law—(1) That the said sale by the said David Shaw was illegal, and in fraud of his creditors: (2) That the defenders, having been in knowledge thereof, were not entitled to take advantage thereof by accepting payment of the proceeds of said sale: (3) That the payment to the defenders was illegal, and in fraud of the creditors of the said David Shaw, and constituted an illegal preference in favour of the defenders: Therefore finds the pursuer, trustee appointed in said process of cessio, entitled to payment from the defenders of the said sum of £101, 9s. 11d. so paid to them." *

* "NOTE.—I have found this to be an exceedingly difficult case, and am conscious that the above interlocutor may be open to a good deal of question. But I think the case very important, and have formed the opinion that it may be distinguished from the cases on which the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is rested, and that the pursuer is entitled to decreet. The main facts are these:—Some time ago David Shaw sold the potatoes on his farm of Strone to the defenders, and agreed to deliver the potatoes; the defenders paid him £100 in advance, the bargain apparently being that if the just price should prove more there should be an additional payment, if less, a repayment. The potatoes were never delivered. The market price fell so much that they were sold at a farina mill, and the price, £28, was paid to the defenders. The defenders also supplied Shaw with manure, and in October 1886 they had an account against him amounting to £101, 9s. 11d., one item being this £100, which the defenders seem to have thought themselves entitled to state as a debt against Shaw, on the ground that the transaction had not been completed. Shaw's affairs became hopelessly embarrassed, and after some negotiations his landlord presented a petition of cessio against him, in which the statutory first interlocutor was pronounced on 28th September, which, in compliance with the provisions of the 9th section of the Debtors Act, 1880, 43 and 44 Vict. c. 34, appointed publication, and ordained the debtor to appear for examination on 12th October, and to lodge in Court a state of his affairs six days before that. Shaw did not lodge the state of affairs on that date, but, in violation of the order of the Court, he on 7th October sold a large part of the stock on the farm, and with the price he on the same day paid the defenders their account. The pursuer has stated no objection to any item of this account, except the £100, which cannot, it is maintained, be stated as a debt against Shaw. I have formed the opinion that the defenders, or at least (which comes to the same thing) Mr Stewart, knew that Shaw was hopelessly insolvent when this payment was made. On this point I differ to some extent from the Sheriff-substitute, but I can hardly say more on the subject than that such is the decided impression which the evidence has made on me. There is no doubt that Stewart knew of the cessio and of the sale of Shaw's stock, and knew that he was paid out of the proceeds of that sale. I am inclined to think that Mr Stewart was more closely concerned with this sale, and I suspect he suggested it. But that is not quite clear, and I do not assume it. Now, these are the circumstances in which the trustee in Shaw's cessio seeks to recover this sum of £101, 9s. 11d. paid to the defenders, and his action is based on the Act 1696, c. 5, and subsequent Bankruptcy Statutes, and also on common law. He is trying to set aside a preference, and to put the defenders on a footing of equality with the other creditors. It is one of his primary duties as trustee to do so, if the preference is illegal. The preference, however, although undoubted, has been accomplished by a payment in cash, and I think it settled that the Act 1695 is not directed against cash payments of debts which are due. It must further, I think, be admitted that (apart from the Bankruptcy Statutes) a creditor may lawfully take payment of his debt whenever he can get it, whether his debtor be insolvent or no, without any regard to the consequences to other creditors. That, I think, was decided in the case of Coutts' Trustee v. Webster, 13 R. 1112, quoted by the Sheriff-substitute. Still further, a creditor does not need to inquire where the money with which he is paid has come from ; but that rule, I think, is subject to this qualification, that he may not be able to take advantage of a fraud or illegality of which he is aware, and he may not by taking payment aid the bankrupt in effectuating his fraud. In the case of Nicol v. M'Intyre, 13th July 1882, 9 R. 1097, the general rule is forcibly expressed by Lord Young, who says 'that it makes no difference that the debtor may have stolen the cash.' But I think that that remark must have been made on the assumption that the creditor was not aware of the theft, otherwise his acceptance of the stolen money would be very like reset of theft. The rule that a payment by an insolvent in cash cannot be challenged, however general, has never been stated as universal or absolute, and the question is whether there may not be in this special case an exception to that rule. In the first place, I think that the sale by Shaw of his stock was illegal, and in fraud of his creditors. Shaw himself seems to have thought his conduct not only illegal but criminal, for he has absconded. The illegality did not arise from any particular duty or obligation which Shaw owed to his landlord, for, as the landlord had no right of hypothec, it may be doubted whether Shaw was under any special obligation to him as such, but I think the illegality arose simply from the fact that Shaw was under a judicial order to lodge in Court a state of his affairs. It seems impossible to hold that a debtor, ordered to lodge a state of his affairs, could lawfully dispose of his effects, pay his creditors, and then lodge a state totally different from the state of his affairs at the date of the interlocutor. That would not be in compliance with the interlocutor. If Shaw had himself presented a petition for cessio, it would have stated his readiness to surrender his affairs, and would have been accompanied by a list of his creditors, which list must have included the defenders ; and it seems clear that he could not after that have disposed of his effects or paid his creditors. I think that the statutory order to lodge a state of affairs pronounced in a petition by a creditor put Shaw in exactly the same position as if the petition had been presented by himself (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34, sec. 9). I cannot doubt that after such an interlocutor the Court would, on cause shewn, have interdicted the sale of Shaw's property, or have proceeded under section 12 of the Act 43 and 44 Vict. c. 34, and granted warrant to take possession of the debtor's money and moveables. The very power to do this seems to involve the illegality of the disposal by the debtor of his effects ; and to shew that the statute regards the debtor as disabled from dealing with his estate after he has been ordered to lodge a state of his affairs. It is true that there is no provision in the Cessio Acts corresponding to section 111 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, declaring payments by bankrupts after sequestration null, but protecting bona fide purchasers and debtors ; and it is also true that a debtor is not divested of his estate until he has granted, or has been ordered

v. Thomson[1] and Coutts' Trustee and Doe v. Webster,[2] in which it was settled that fraud was not to be inferred from the mere fact that at the time a cash payment was made the debtor was insolvent, and that the creditor knew it. The sale of the stock was valid and effectual. The first deliverance in the cessio did not prevent Shaw from being in a position to give the buyer a good title. That that deliverance had been made was the only distinction between this and Coutts' case. The payment would have been good to a creditor who was ignorant of the cessio though aware of the insolvency, and the fact of knowledge of the cessio could not lead a creditor to draw any worse conclusion than the knowledge of insolvency would. Thomas' case was very strong, as there both parties knew that the payment made constituted the whole of the debtor's estate. The common law came to this, that a debtor cannot hand over his estate in payment of his debt, but he can sell it and hand over the proceeds. The Court would not inquire as to the history of the money handed over. The Cessio Act, 1880, did not forbid such an action—it was not a statutory crime. There was nothing in that Act answering to the provisions of sec. 111 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which annulled all purchases except in the case of bona fide purchasers who were in ignorance of the sequestration. If sec. 13 of the Act of 1880 was to be construed as proposed by the respondents, no tradesman against whom a cessio was brought could sell an article out of his shop, and cessios were often sued against perfectly solvent debtors.

Argued for the respondents;—This was a crime under sec. 13, subsec. B (5) of the Act of 1880,[*] and as the defenders had aided and abetted in to grant, a disposition omnium bonorum. But I think that the order to produce a state of affairs contained in the statutory first interlocutor, read along with the provisions in section 12, produces practically the same effect, and is practically an interdict against disposal by the debtor of his estate. I hold therefore that the sale by Shaw was in direct violation of the order of the Court. It has next to be considered how that illegal character of this sale affects the payment to the defenders. The defender Stewart knew of the cessio, and although it is not expressly proved that he knew that Shaw had been ordered to lodge a state of affairs, yet I hold that such knowledge must be imputed to him, because that order followed necessarily on the presentation of a petition for cessio, if the Sheriff was satisfied that there was prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy. I think that certainly he was put on his inquiry as to this point, and must be dealt with as if he knew that that order had been pronounced. Holding that order to imply a prohibition of such a sale, the question comes to be—Can the defenders take advantage of Shaw's violation of that judicial order, and receive payment of the proceeds of that sale? I have come to be of opinion that they cannot, and that by taking payment they actively aided Shaw in carrying out and completing the violation of the order of the Court with which he was chargeable. Indeed the payment to the defenders is just as much a violation of the order of Court to lodge a state of affairs as the sale of the stock was, and in that latter act the defenders were of course directly participant. The case seems much the same as if the money had been arrested funds, and as if the defenders had accepted payment of them in knowledge of the arrestment. The fact that the sale by Shaw was in violation of the order of the Court, and that the defenders knew of it, distinguishes this case from Coutts' Trustee v. Webster. On these grounds I hold that this payment falls to be disallowed as an illegal preference, effected by Shaw illegally and in fraud of his creditors, and in collusion with the defenders. . . ."

its committal they could not benefit by it. The first deliverance of the Court in the cessio interdicted the sale of the stock. The order to produce a state of affairs practically amounted to that. The proceedings in a cessio were for the distribution of the estate, and after the date of the first deliverance were for the behoof of all creditors. This distribution removed the case from the authority of Thomas' and Coutts' cases.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case raises an important question in bankruptcy. It is a demand made by a trustee on a bankrupt estate against a creditor thereon for repetition of a sum said to have been paid to him by his debtor, the bankrupt. It is not, I think, necessary now to go into the question whether the debt was really due or not, though a good deal turns on that. The main question is whether the demand made is in the same position as the demands in the cases of Thomas and Coutts. In these cases a very important principle was laid down, and I entirely adhere to what I said in my opinion in the latter. The principle there laid down is that though a debtor is insolvent, and his creditor is aware that he is, the creditor may receive payment from his debtor in cash in the ordinary course of business; in other words, a debtor is not ousted from the management of his own estate by the mere fact that he is insolvent, and a creditor is entitled to receive payment of a debt from him, however the money paid to him has been acquired.

I am of opinion, however, that this case turns upon an entirely different principle, and to establish that, we must look at the exact circumstances of the case. The debtor Shaw, being in debt to his landlord, granted him a bill which was dishonoured. The landlord then made an application, which as is usual in such cases bore no date, for cessio under the Cessio Act of 1880. The first deliverance in the petition is dated 28th September 1886, and is in terms of the Act. It bears that the Sheriff "being satisfied from the productions that there is prima facie evidence of the notour bankruptcy of David Shaw," requires a copy of the deliverance to be served on the debtor, and the pursuer to publish notice of the petition in the Gazette. He further requires the debtor to appear in the Sheriff Court House, on 12th October, for public examination, and, on or before the 6th October, to lodge a state of his affairs in the hands of the Clerk of Court. That deliverance I presume appeared in the Gazette. The debtor did not in terms of this deliverance lodge a state of his affairs on the 6th, but on the 7th he entered into communings with certain persons with a view to disposing of his stock. In point of fact he did sell a large portion of the stock, to the extent of over £100. Having received that sum of money, he proceeded to pay it over to the creditor in question. The question here is, was he entitled to do so? I am clearly of opinion that he was not. I should have thought that the question should have been so answered even had the deliverance not expressly ordained the debtor to lodge a state of his affairs on the 6th, but I think it is too clear for dispute that when that day had passed the debtor was not entitled to deal with any part of the estate which should have been entered in the state of affairs. I am therefore of opinion that when the debtor sold his stock, he was acting contrary to the Act. I think it would have been sufficient for the decision of the case if the matter had become litigious, even though the period for lodging a state of affairs had not passed, for the cessio was a process for distribution, and the creditor was not entitled to do anything to frustrate that object. The matter was sub judice, and the Sheriff had power to appoint a person to manage the property if he saw fit. That is enough, I think, for the decision of the case. It might have been different if the creditor had been unaware of the cessio proceedings, but he was perfectly aware of them. He says so himself. He admits that before he obtained payment of his debt he was aware of the application for cessio, and I believe he was aware of the first deliverance. That takes the case out of the authority of Thomas and Coutts, and therefore, without in any way impugning the doctrine of these cases, I think the Sheriff's judgment should be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG.—I think with your Lordship and the Sheriff that the defenders cannot retain this money, but should be ordered to pay it to the pursuer, who is the trustee in the cessio. At the same time, I cannot say that I am prepared to assent to all the findings in the Sheriff's interlocutor. One finding is, that it is not proved that the debt is due. The decision of that question is perhaps in one view not necessary to the decision of the case, but I decide the case on the assumption that the debt is due. In point of fact, I am inclined to think that that is the case. Another finding to which I am not inclined to assent is the finding that the sale of the stock on 7th October was illegal, i.e., illegal in the sense in which I apprehend the Sheriff used the word, viz., that the seller could not give a good title to the buyer. If a man sells goods and gives a good title to the buyer, the sale cannot be called illegal. I think it would require a revision of the Cessio Act, 1880, to make the sale of any part of the respondent's property illegal after the presentment of the petition and the first deliverance. If every such sale was illegal, the petitioner in a cessio could not come to an arrangement with his debtor to sell part of his estate, pay the debt, and so put an end to the cessio. But, as I have stated, I think this money cannot be retained. The question really is, whether this is within the rule that a notour bankrupt is not at liberty to dispose of his estate to the prejudice of his creditors, or to give any preference to any one creditor over others, or whether it is within the exception,—a very large and important one,—recognised in the two cases your Lordship has referred to. The exception is, that the law as applied by the Court makes exception of payments in cash of debts due in cash. That exception proceeds on a view altogether intelligible, that it is impolitic and inexpedient, because dangerous, to inquire into the history of cash, which is the currency of the realm. Cash passes without inquiry as to its previous history from hand to hand. There is probably more in the remark which the Sheriff says I made in one case, that it would not matter if the money had been stolen, than would strike many people at first sight. The rule that a thief can give a better title to stolen money than he has himself is one of the few exceptions to the rule that a man can give no better title to anything he hands to another than he possesses himself, but it proceeds on the recognition of the inexpediency of all inquiry into the history of cash. The Sheriff says that he assumes that I imply in that statement ignorance on the part of the receiver that the money was stolen. That goes without saying; for if the receiver was aware the money was stolen then the law of reset, and not that of illegal preference, would apply. If the very corpus of the stolen money is traced into any person's hands then the original owner can claim it. There is there no case of illegal preference. The money is the property of the robbed man, and if he can trace it he can recover it, not as a debt due, but as being his own property. Here, however, the money was part of a bankrupt estate, which was to be administered among such creditors as had right to it.

I think then the case falls within the rule, but I desire to say nothing, for I have nothing to say, against the law laid down in the two cases referred to, or the consideration on which the Court there proceeded. I limit my judgment here strictly to the facts of the case. The debtor, a notour bankrupt, with a process of cessio depending against him, is advised by his creditor to sell part of his property and pay him his debt. That, I think, is a proceeding which cannot stand. It is an improper proceeding (though I do not characterise it as illegal in the sense I attach to that word), and the creditor who aided and abetted in that proceeding cannot take advantage of it. The distinction is very nice between the rule and the exception. A payment by cash is not inquired into, but if an equal quantity of goods is given in payment that would be inquired into and restoration ordered. There is in the present case sufficient to make the distinction apparent here, but I think the judgment ought to be strictly confined to the circumstances of the case.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—My view on the facts, and the law applicable to them, have been very fully explained by Lord Young. This is a different case from those cited by the defenders, as here we have the defenders aiding and abetting in a sale of stock by the bankrupt in order that the money realised thereby might be given to them. In doing so he did what he ought not to have done, and I think they are not entitled to retain the money. It is not necessary for me to say more, as I entirely agree in and adopt all that has been said by Lord Young.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have had great difficulty in distinguishing this case from those of Thomas and Coutts, but I daresay the distinction pointed out by your Lordships is sound in law, as it certainly is in equity.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with Lord Young in thinking that the finding of the Sheriff that the sale was illegal is unnecessary, as well as the finding that the debt was not due. Our judgment should be confined strictly to the circumstances of the case.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that on 7th October 1886 David Shaw sold a large portion of the stock of his farm, and on the same day paid to the defenders £101, 9s. 11d. out of the price thereof; (2) that at the date of the sale he was a notour bankrupt and defender in an action of cessio bonorum in which an order had been pronounced ordaining him to lodge a state of his affairs by 6th October 1886, which order he failed to obey; (3) that his bankruptcy and the dependence of the said action, and the order pronounced thereon, were known to the defenders when they took payment of the sum: Find in law that the said payment was improperly made, and that the defenders are not entitled to take benefit thereby: Therefore dismiss the appeal: Of new decern in terms of the conclusions of the petition."

TAY DISTRICT FISHERY BOARD, Complainers (Reclaimers).—W. C. Smith.
ANDREW ROBERTSON AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Ure.

Title to sue—Interdict—Statutory Board—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 97)—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123).—Under the Salmon Fisheries Acts of 1862 and 1868 Fishery Boards have power to sue for penalties for offences under the Acts, and to apply summarily to the Sheriff for the enforcement of rules and regulations made by them. In a note of suspension and interdict brought by a Fishery Board at common law to prevent persons fishing in a manner alleged to be illegal, held that the complainers, being merely a statutory board with statutory remedies, had no title to sue.

Bill-Chamber.
1ST DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

IN August 1887 the Tay District Fishery Board, constituted under the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Acts, 1862 and 1868, presented a note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber against Andrew Robertson and others, fishing-smack owners in Newburgh, Dundee, &c., in which they prayed the Court "to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said respondents from fishing with or using in the river Tay, from and after the 20th day of August, being the commencement of the annual close time in the said river, until the 15th day of September following in any year, the species of bag-net known as a spirling-net, or any other net of similar construction, attached to a smack, or other boat or vessel, anchored, or otherwise kept stationary, in the said river: Or otherwise, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said respondents from using at any time in the said river the said spirling-nets, or any other nets of similar construction, for the purpose of taking salmon, or other fish of the salmon kind, in the said river."

The complainers averred that they had the duty of protecting and preserving the salmon fisheries in the river Tay.

They further averred;—" Immediately after the close of the salmon net-fishing season on the Tay, which takes place on the 20th of August, the respondents have, in the years 1885 and 1886, commenced to use fishing-smacks in the river below Newburgh, ostensibly for the capture of spirlings by means of spirling-nets, and have continued to use these nets until the 14th day of September, being the day on which the river Tweed is closed for salmon-fishing by net. Nearly all of the said smacks have thereafter ceased to fish for about a fortnight, when a certain number have returned to their fishing ground. The proper season for spirling-fishing does not commence until about the beginning of October, as it is only in cool weather that spirling can be conveyed to a distance. During the period from the 20th August to 15th September, large quantities of salmon were consigned, in the years 1885 and 1886, by rail from Newburgh to Manchester, and various other places, and the complainers believe and aver that these salmon were caught by the respondents in the spirling-nets, and that the main object of the respondents in fishing with these nets in the time between 20th August and 15th September was the capture of salmon. Since the close of the salmon net-fishing season on the Tay, on 20th August in the present year, the respondents have resumed the illegal fishing complained of, and on Thursday, 25th August, a large quantity of salmon caught by the respondents in their spirling-nets were landed near Newburgh, and were seized on behalf of the complainers." (Stat. 3) " The nets used by the respondents are about 60 feet in length, with a square mouth about 20 feet wide stretched on two beams at top and bottom, the bottom one having an iron rail attached in order to sink it, and the upper beam is fastened at the water-line across the bow of the smack by iron stanchions extending forward from the ribs of the smack, and there are chains at each side connecting the upper and lower beams. The net extends in a long bag tapering to a point, where the meshes are very small, in order to take the smallest of fish along and under the bottom of the smack, and being double the length of the smack, its tapering end reaches for 30 feet beyond the stern of the smack. The nets are usually emptied twice in the twenty-four hours, at the turn of the tide. The smacks of the respondents were anchored for the whole period above mentioned in the open channel of the river, and were stationary except so far as they swung round with the tide, their catch being sent ashore by boats. Their position was in the main channel, where the salmon run, and where few spirlings are to be got." (Stat. 4) "The use of the said nets by the respondents is illegal, both because they are used for the capture of salmon during close time on the Tay, and by parties who have no title whatever to fish for salmon, and also because they are practically fixed nets in the estuary of the river, the placing of which, even in the open season, is illegal."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The nets complained of being intended for the taking of salmon during the period of time in question, the respondents are not entitled to use them, and interdict should be granted against their use during that period as craved. (2) Separatim, The nets being of the nature of fixed engines placed in the river, the complainers are entitled to interdict against their use.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The complainers have no title under the statutes mentioned to sue this action.

On 5th September the Lord Ordinary (Lee) refused the note as incompetent.

The complainers reclaimed, and argued;—They could not get a conviction against these respondents under section 15 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, for having in their possession salmon taken "during the annual close time by any means other than rod or line," between the close of the net fishing on the Tay and the close of the fishing on the latest river in Scotland, in consequence of the decisions in the cases of Wilsone v. Harvey[1] and Chalmers v. M'Glashan,[2] and therefore if salmon were taken in these nets, as they alleged was the case, the remedy of interdict was the only one open to them to take. The view of the Lord Ordinary[*] was that under the Fisheries Act of 1868 the board had power to sue for penalties (see sec. 15), but that they had no power under it to sue civil actions, and that therefore this action was incompetent. But the penalties imposed by the Act were very small, e.g., those for putting poisonous matter into the river, and the natural and appropriate remedy was interdict. The penalty imposed by the statute inferred prohibition,[3] and that must be made effectual by interdict. The board had a duty laid on it to protect the fisheries for the good of the public, and the Court would interfere to prevent an act being done which would constitute an offence against the law which the board administered.[4] The offence here was not one merely collateral to the Act, but was directly at variance with it. The remedy of interdict would certainly lie at the instance of proprietors of upper waters on the river, and a fortiori it would lie at the instance of a body entrusted with a special duty to protect the whole fisheries. These nets were illegal engines under the Act of 1868, sec. 37,[1] and the board were in a stronger position than proprietors.

Argued for the respondents;—The reclaimers had no title to sue. Their powers with regard to suing for penalties were clearly defined in the Acts of 1862 and 1868, and they could not act beyond the powers there given them. But all the offences for which they were entitled to sue for penalties were offences created by the statutes, and where such was the case, to sue for the statutory penalties was the only competent course open to the board.[2] Under the Act of 1868, sec. 37, the Legislature had recognised the right and title of "proprietors" to sue by action persons using illegal engines for catching salmon, but nowhere was it provided that the board should have a like right and title.

At advising,—

LORD MURE.—The object of the present action is to interdict the respondents from fishing in the river Tay by means of nets generally used for the capture of spirling, but which are said to be used by the respondents in the estuary of the river for the purpose of catching salmon in close time as well as during the open fishing season, and which are alleged to be used in such a way as to amount practically to their being fixed engines placed in the estuary of the river to intercept the fish, and to be on that account illegal.

The action is brought by the complainers as the Fishery Board of the Tay District, constituted under the Salmon Fishery Acts, in name of their clerk, as required by the statute. But although raised by them in that character it is not, as I read it, founded on any alleged violation of any of the rules prescribed by the statutes which they are appointed to administer, or of any of the regulations or bye-laws made by the complainers under the powers given to them to that effect. Neither does it bear to be founded on any express provisions of those statutes, but it is rested on the allegation that the mode of fishing complained of is illegal at common law, and it is substantially such an action as any proprietor of salmon-fishings would have been entitled to bring for the protection of his rights if the statutes under which the complainers act had never been passed.

The Lord Ordinary has refused the note as incompetent, on the ground, as I understand, that the complainers, as pleaded in the first plea in law for the respondents, have no title to sue such an action. The only question therefore which is now to be disposed of is whether that plea is well founded, and the solution of it depends mainly, if not entirely, upon the provisions of the Salmon Fisheries Acts of 1862 and 1868.

By the first of these Acts—viz., the 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97—these district boards were originally established, and very distinct provisions are in several respects made as to the powers and duties of district boards with regard to the way in which the Act is to be enforced and penalties recovered for the offences specified in it. The more important of these offences are set out in sections 11, 12, and 13 of the Act. But by the 22d section power is given to boards, subject to the provisions of the Act and to the bye-laws made by the commissioners, to make regulations for the preservation of the fisheries in the district, to appoint clerks, constables, water-bailiffs, and other officers, and to prescribe the duties of all persons appointed by them; while by the 25th section power is given to enact that any person committing a breach of any bye-laws or regulations made by them in terms of the statute shall be liable to a specified penalty for every such offence, to be sued for and recovered in the same manner as the penalties incurred under the provisions of the Act itself.

R., 13 Q. B. D. 109; Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Water-works Co., 1877, L. R., 2 Exch. Div. 441.

The mode, again, in which all these penalties are to be enforced is regulated by the 28th section, and this is appointed to be done by petition before the Sheriff, or any two Justices of the Peace in the district, at the instance of the clerk of the district board. And for the further enforcement of these regulations and bye-laws the 29th section expressly provides that "in the event of any person refusing or neglecting to obey any bye-law made by the commissioners, or any regulation made by the district board, the clerk may apply to the Sheriff by summary petition in ordinary form, praying to have such person ordained to obey the same, and the Sheriff shall take such proceedings and make such orders thereupon as he shall think just."

Under the Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), additional powers are given to district boards to purchase dams, weirs, &c., by agreement, to remove natural obstructions to the passage of fish, and to borrow money to defray the expenses incurred by them. But in other respects no material change is made in the powers or constitution of the district boards. Several new offences are, however, created by this Act, and by the 30th section the same powers are given to the clerks of district boards to prosecute for those offences as are given to them under section 28 of the former statute; and by the 37th section this important provision is made,—"That any proprietor of a fishery shall be held to have a good title and interest at law to sue by action any proprietor or occupier of a fishery within the district, or any other person who shall use any illegal engine, or illegal mode of fishing, for catching salmon within the district."

Having regard to these various provisions of the statutes, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary was right in holding that the complainers had no title to sue the present action. They are a purely statutory board, and can only act under and to the extent of the powers given to them by the statutes by which they were established. The matter of the remedy to be given for things done in violation of the statute, and the question who the parties were who were to have the right and title to enforce those remedies, were plainly under the consideration of the Legislature and duly provided for, as they thought right, when those Acts were being passed. In neither statute, however, is any power given to district boards or their clerks to have recourse to actions at common law of the nature here in question.

In the first statute power is conferred upon them to prosecute for penalties for all offences created by the statute, or enacted in bye-laws and regulations made by the board under the powers given to them by the statute. And they have also under the 29th section of that Act the important right to enforce by petition before the Sheriff obedience to the bye-laws of the commissioners and to the regulations made by the district board for the preservation of the fisheries in the district, but their powers go no further. When the second Act was passed no alteration was made on these provisions, in so far as the right and title of the complainers to take proceedings against offending parties are concerned, although that subject must have again been under consideration, because the right and title of the owners of salmon-fishings to prosecute such an action as the present is specifically dealt with in the 37th section, by which the title of such owners to prosecute is expressly recognised and re-enacted, but no such power is given to district boards.

I have assumed in this opinion that the present action does not expressly bear to be rested on any alleged violation of the statutes. It was, however, suggested, in the course of the discussion, that as the first part of the prayer of the note of suspension refers to fishing during close time only, it might be said that this action is a complaint of a violation of the 15th section of the Act of 1868, which by subsection (1) provides a penalty for the offence of taking salmon in close time "by any means other than rod and line." But even in this view the objection to the complainers' title appears to me to be well-founded, and the remedy asked incompetent, because of the rule which I conceive to be settled, that when an offence is created by statute which gives the remedy of a complaint for penalties, the only remedy which can be sustained at the instance of a statutory board is that provided by the statute. In the present case the remedy given is a complaint for the recovery of penalties, or a petition before the Sheriff under the 29th section of the Act of 1862.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

Superior and Vassal—Casualty—Redemption of Casualty—Act 1469, c. 36 —Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 54), sec. 15.—A vassal disponed a piece of pasture ground for building purposes in consideration of a ground-annual. The purchaser before building tendered to the superior the redemption price of the casualties of superiority which were untaxed, calculated on the agricultural rent of the land. The superior maintained that the price ought to be calculated on the annual value of the land as building ground. Held that the yearly maill of the subjects at the date, as defined by the Act 1469, cap. 36, was their agricultural value.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kinnear.

BY contract of ground-annual, dated 2d February and 23d April 1886, and recorded 13th May 1886, Admiral Fairfax, proprietor of the estate of Fereneze, near Barrhead, conveyed to the School Board of Neilston three quarters of an acre of ground for the purpose of their building a school thereon. The ground had up till Martinmas 1885 been let by him with the adjoining ground for grazing, at £1, 18s. 11d. per acre. When the grass parks were let for the ensuing season at February 1886 the piece of ground in question was not let, and it was staked off as the site of the school.

The School Board became bound by the contract of ground-annual to pay £15 a year for it, being at the rate of £20 per acre.

Fereneze was held by Admiral Fairfax under Allan Graham Barns Graham as superior. The entry of singular successors was untaxed. The School Board being desirous to redeem the casualties of superiority of the plot of ground before beginning to build, as provided by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874,* and having failed to agree with Mr Graham, the superior, as to the basis upon which the payment fell to be estimated, brought this action against him to have it declared that they were entitled to redeem them upon payment to him of £4, 1s. 11d. It was admitted that the amount they had to pay in order to redemption of the casualties was two and one-half times the highest casualty, one year's rent of the subjects, and also a composition of one year's rent due through their acquisition of the subjects.

The pursuers maintained that the rent of the subjects was £1, 9s. 2d., being at the rate of £1, 18s. 11d. per acre, the grazing rent. This sum of £1, 9s. 2d., by the usual deduction of one-fifth (5s. 9d.), was reduced to £1, 3s. 5d., two and one-half times which amounted to £2, 18s. 6d., which sum, with £1, 3s. 5d. as the composition, amounting in all to £4, 1s. 11d., they tendered.

The defender maintained that the subjects not being used for agricultural purposes, but having been acquired and being used for building, the agricultural rental was not the proper measure of his claim. He stated that the annual worth of the subjects as building ground was at the rate of £24 an acre, or £18 for the three roods in question, but that he was willing to accept £15, the amount which the Board had agreed annually to pay to Admiral Fairfax, as the annual market value, and he therefore claimed £15 as the casualty presently due, and £37, 10s. as two and a-half times the amount of £15, the highest casualty, and was willing to discharge the casualties on payment of these sums.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The subjects not being let for a rent, the actual worth or yearly value of the lands falls to be taken as the basis in calculating the redemption money, and in the circumstances the defender is not bound to accept the sum tendered. (2) The pursuers having, at or about the date of redemption, contracted to pay £15 yearly for the ground, the same must be held to be of at least that value.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) found and declared as concluded for.†

* Section 15 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, provides, inter alia, as follows:—"In cases where casualties are exigible on occasion of each sale or transfer of the property, as well as on the death of the vassal, such casualties may be redeemed on payment of two and a-half times the amount of the casualty, estimated as aforesaid (i.e., 'as at the date of redemption'), payable on said occasions . . . Provided always that before any such redemption otherwise than by agreement shall be allowed, any casualty which has become due shall be paid."

† "OPINION.—The only question in this case is whether the sum tendered by the pursuers for the redemption of casualties of superiority is sufficient in amount to meet the superior's claim; and the facts upon which that question depends are fully ascertained by the minute of admissions.

"In its actual condition at the time when the question became litigious, the ground would not have yielded more to the proprietor if it had been let for grazing—which was the only purpose for which it was then available—than £1, 9s. 2d. But it is admitted that it is suitable for building, and that the pursuers have acquired it for the purpose of building a school; and although there is no evidence or admission as to the revenue which the pursuers might derive from it if it were occupied with buildings, it is said that it must be assumed that if they were to subfeu, or to grant a long lease for building purposes, they might obtain for it at least as much as £15 a-year, that being the amount of the ground-annual which they have agreed to pay to the former owner.

"These considerations are, in my opinion, irrelevant to the question. The

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—It was impossible to take the former agricultural value as the "year's maill as the land was set for the time." It had ceased to be agricultural ground, and been dissociated from its former agricultural surroundings before the question arose. It was building land, and the pursuers were willing to pay £15 a-year for it. That shewed its annual value. The Lord Ordinary had misconceived the reference made by the defender to the contract of ground-annual. No doubt its provisions were res inter alios as regarded him, but he pointed merely to the fact that it existed as shewing what in fact was the value of the land in the hands of the pursuers. That was a question of fact, and the contract of ground-annual answered it. The cases, and especially Hill's case, shewed that the Court would endeavour to get at the annual value as it really was.[1] The fair annual value in this case might be taken to be the amount of the ground-annual, though a higher value might well have been claimed. A ground-annual was just the rent under a building lease. There was no previous instance, doubtless, of such a standard being taken as was now suggested, but that was because the redemption of casualties was of recent introduction.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was not pretended by the defender that there was any instance of the annual value being taken as fixed by such a standard as the pursuers proposed. The agricultural rent was that which had been paid, and was truly, in the words of the Act 1469, c. 36, "the measure of the superior's right is stated by Lord Curriehill in Lord Blantyre v. Dunn, 20 D. 1188. According to the established construction of the enactment, the measure of the composition payable by an entering vassal is the rent payable to him by his tenant in the lands at the time of the entry, if they be then set in lease to a tenant, or the sum for which they might then be let, if 'they are in the possession of the vassal himself.' The superior has no concern with the price paid by his vassal to the former owner, and just as little with the prospective value of the land for building, if it is not actually built upon, or set in lease for that purpose. The obligations of the contract of ground-annual are res inter alios to the defender. The vassal contemplates building. The fact that the ground is staked out seems to shew that he intends to build; but he is under no obligation to the superior to carry out his building operations, and the superior has no title to inquire whether he means to build or to subfeu, or to put his land to any other use than that to which in its actual condition it may be applied. I think it established by the admissions, that when the demand for redemption was made,—which for the present purpose must be taken as equivalent to the time of the entry,—the return which might have been obtained for the use of the land for a year was not more than £1, 9s. 2d. But the year's rent must be subject to the usual deductions: and it follows that the sum tendered is the full amount for which the pursuers are liable.

"The defender founded on the case of Hill v. The Caledonian Railway Company, 5 R. 338, as an authority for taking the price into consideration. But that was a very exceptional case, and the ground stated by the Lord President for taking into consideration the price and the expenditure on the land is quite sufficient to shew that the judgment has no application to such a case as the present. His Lordship says,—'The annual value of this subject cannot be tested in any of the usual ways, because it is impossible to conceive of the subject as the subject of a separate lease in any way whatever; and therefore it becomes indispensable to resort to some other mode of ascertaining what the composition ought to be.'

"But there is no difficulty in supposing the ground in question to be let as a separate subject, and the ordinary rule must therefore be applied."

year's maill as the land is set for the time,"* until the alienation to the pursuers. A long building lease or a contract of ground-annual was just an alienation, not a set. The £15 per annum was not what the vassal was to get, but what he paid. The price paid had never been regarded as an element in such a question, except in the very anomalous case of Hill, supra. The case of Lord Blantyre v. Dunn, quoted by the Lord Ordinary, was in point. In M'Laren v. Burns[1] the rent at which the subjects might be expected to let was taken. There was no room to speculate on that, for the subjects had been let.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a question not without difficulty and interest. I think that the Lord Ordinary has taken the right view. The Act on which the superior founds his claim is one which is now of very ancient date, but it is quite clear in its provisions. The claim of the superior is founded on the amount of rent at which the lands are let at the time, and the question is what rent a tenant will give in the existing state of the land. That is not a matter founded on any specialties, but upon what in fact as the market stands is in a reasonable view the rent in the existing condition of the land. That existing condition is agricultural, and the question is whether Lord Kinnear is not perfectly right in holding that the fair agricultural rent is the measure of the superior's right. There may in determining such a question be contingencies as to the land so imminent that they must be taken into account, but this is not one of such cases. I am for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Ebenezer Erskine Scott (Archibald John Maclean's Trustee), Defender (Respondent).—C. N. Johnston.
Archibald John Maclean, Defender.

Trust for creditors—Principal and Agent—Lease—Security.—A landed proprietor conveyed his whole estates to a trustee for behoof of his creditors, having the day before executed a lease of a farm in his own occupation in favour of the trustee, in security of advances to be made by him under the trust. The lease bore that the stock on the farm, of which the heritable estate mainly consisted, had been sold to the trustee for a price named, which price (it was by separate letter agreed) was not to be paid, but was to be imputed towards payment of the advances. It was also agreed that the truster should manage the farm for the trustee. The ostensible possession and ownership of the farm and stock continued in the truster, who incurred considerable debts in the course of his management. In an action against the trustee for payment of certain of these debts at the instance of tradesmen who had supplied the goods in ignorance of the trust arrangement, held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the effect of the deeds was to divest the granter of his estates, that his possession of the farm thereafter was as agent of the trustee, and consequently that the trustee was liable (to the extent of the trust-estate) in payment of goods supplied to the order of his agent in execution of his agency. Decree therefore granted.

On 1st December 1881 Archibald John Maclean of Pennycross, in the island of Mull, heritable proprietor of the lands of Carsaig and others, being in embarrassed circumstances, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, conveying his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to Ebenzer Erskine Scott, C.A., Edinburgh, as trustee.

On the day before granting this trust-deed—30th November 1881,—Mr Maclean had let the farm of Carsaig (then in his own occupation) to Mr Scott on lease for five years from Martinmas 1881 at a rent of £320 per annum. The lease contained this clause:—" Further, the said Archibald John Maclean hereby sells, conveys, and makes over to the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott the whole sheep stock, cattle, and horses on the lands hereby let, conform to inventory to be made out and signed as relative hereto; in consideration of which sale and conveyance the said Ebenezer Erskine Scott binds and obliges himself to pay to the said Archibald John Maclean the sum of £2500 sterling, payable by instalments at such times as may hereafter be agreed upon, the last instalment being payable not later than 31st December 1885, and at the expiry of this lease the proprietor or incoming tenant shall be bound to take the sheep stock on the lands and pay therefor" at a valuation.

The lease was qualified by the following letter, of even date, from Mr Maclean to Mr Scott:—" Dear Sir,—Considering that I have, of this date, executed in your favour a lease of the farm of Carsaig, by which lease I have made over to you the stock of sheep, &c., on the said farm, and you have become bound to pay to me the sum of £2500 as the estimated value of said stock, and considering that I am about to grant a trust-deed in your favour for behoof of my creditors and for certain other purposes, I hereby undertake and agree as follows:—1st, That the price of the sheep stock shall form part of the trust-estate under the said disposition; 2d, that all advances made by you under the said trust shall, until they amount to the said sum of £2500, in the first place be imputed in payment pro tanto of the price of the said stock; 3d, that in the event of said stock eventually proving to be of less value than £2500, the deficiency shall be made good to you by me or out of my estate; 4th, that in the event of your so desiring, it shall be in your power, notwithstanding the terms of the said lease, to renounce the same at Whitsunday in any year, on six months' notice given by you of such intention; 5th, that as it is contemplated that during your tenancy I shall manage the farm on your behalf, and that the proceeds of the same shall be placed to the credit of my trust-estate, no rent shall be payable by you so long as the proceeds are so applied, but on the other hand you shall be entitled to interest on the price of the said stock, so far as advanced and paid by you, and that at the current rate of interest charged by the Scotch banks upon overdrafts. In witness whereof," &c.

Mr Scott's name was entered in the Valuation-roll for 1882 as tenant of the farm, and the trust-deed was recorded, but no other publication of the arrangement was made, and Mr Maclean remained in the possession and management of the farm, ostensibly as proprietor both of the farm and of the stock, &c. thereon, until March 1886, when Mr Scott sent a representative from his office, who took over the management.

On 23d November 1886 D. Macphail & Sons, wholesale and retail merchants, Oban, brought an action against Mr Maclean, and also against Mr Scott, as trustee, for payment of £208, 12s. 9d., being the balance of an account, commencing 8th July 1882, and ending 26th October 1886, for goods alleged to have been supplied by the pursuers to the order of Maclean, for necessary purposes in connection with the farm, and for the use of himself and his servants in conducting the farm.

Macphail & Son v. Maclean's Trustee.

Appended to the summons was this minute of restriction,—"The conclusions of the foregoing summons, in so far as directed against the defender E. Erskine Scott, are intended, and are hereby restricted, to be against him as trustee under the trust-deed mentioned in the summons."

The pursuers averred (cond. 3), that being in ignorance of the arrangements between Mr Maclean and Mr Scott, they were under the impression that Mr Maclean was in possession of the farm, and that he was the owner in possession of the sheep stock, and whole other moveables thereon. "But, on the other hand, the defender Mr Scott maintains that he has been in possession of the said farm, and of the stock and other moveables thereon, since the year 1882, and that his name has been entered in the Valuation-roll of the county as tenant of the farm. In that case, the pursuers aver that the defender Mr Maclean has had the management of the said farm under, and on behalf of, Mr Scott, as trustee foresaid, and has ordered from the pursuers the several articles detailed in the account sued on, for the purposes of the said farm, and for the use of those engaged in the management of it, and that the said account, or at all events the balance remaining due, has thus been incurred on behalf of the defender Mr Scott, as trustee foresaid. . . . At regular intervals, and in particular during the spring and summer of 1886, there was a special representative of Mr Scott, in addition to Mr Maclean, residing on the farm."

Mr Scott alone defended. He answered:—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the trust-deed here mentioned was granted on 1st December 1881, but was never published, and that the present defender's name was entered in the Valuation-roll as here mentioned. Admitted that, from 1st March last till the sequestration of Mr Maclean, the defender had a special representative residing on the farm. Quoad ultra not admitted, and explained that . . . the lease of the farm here mentioned was granted to the present defender, with the view of giving him legal delivery of the moveables on the farm for trust purposes, but the defender has been advised, and is now satisfied, that it was ineffectual for that purpose, and the defender has not interfered with the management of the farm, nor taken any benefit under said lease. Denied that the said account was incurred on behalf or by the authority of the present defender, either as an individual or as trustee foresaid." He then admitted liability for goods supplied by the pursuers after his representative had gone to the farm in March 1886.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having furnished the goods specified in the account sued for, at least to the extent of the balance remaining due, on the orders and for behoof of the defenders, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses. (2) The defender Mr Scott being, and having been, in possession of the said farm as trustee foresaid, and the said goods having been ordered, received, and used by him for the purposes of the said farm, the pursuers are entitled to decree against him as trustee foresaid.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The estate of the defender Mr Maclean having been conveyed to the present defender, in trust, for certain purposes prior to the contraction of the debt sued for, and the same not having been incurred by the present defender, either as trustee in the management of the trust-estate or as an individual, he is not liable therefor either as trustee foresaid or as an individual, and should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses. (2) The said defender not having been in possession of the estate, and not having ordered, received, or used the goods sued for, he is entitled to absolvitor.

Arrestments were used on the dependence.

After the raising of the action Mr Maclean's estates were sequestrated, and Mr James A. Molleson, C.A., was appointed trustee. Intimation of the dependence of the process was made to him that he might sist himself, if so advised, which he did not do.

A proof was allowed. The substance of Mr Scott's evidence in regard to the relation subsisting between him and Mr Maclean is given below.*

* Mr Scott deponed,—"In November 1881 Mr Maclean applied to me for certain advances. . . . I agreed to make certain advances to him. From the state of affairs it appeared there were a number of pressing debts owing, and the object of my advances was to pay the more pressing claims in order to allow the estate an opportunity of recovering itself. . . . On 30th November 1881 Mr Maclean granted a lease in my favour with reference to the trust-deed. The object of the lease was to enable me, under it, to take possession of the stock, as it was supposed in that way I would get a valid security for my advances. The trust-deed was not made public in any way, except by being recorded—a notarial instrument was recorded. Mr Maclean did not wish it published. He arranged to render accounts periodically, and for the first two or three months, perhaps, he sent me an account-current, with vouchers, but they were in such a condition that I was not able to understand them, and I returned them for the purpose of his preparing more articulate accounts, but these I never received. There was never any balance struck until the year 1886. I went to Carsaig in June 1882. At that time the sheep were gathered together in the fank for the cutting of the lambs, and I saw them, but they were not counted over to me. [Mr Maclean deponed that they were.] I was only there for one night. I gave no authority to Mr Maclean to order the goods the price of which is sued for; and if he had asked me for authority to get goods on credit, I would not have allowed it. . . . There were some sheep sent to Cumbernauld about the end of last October [1886]. They were sent in my name. They were last year's lambs. I paid for them in so far that my advances very much exceeded the value of them. I took over the sheep. Mr Maclean was sequestrated on 26th November last. The trustee has never asserted any right to these sheep, in so far as he himself is concerned, for I think he agrees to the position I took up in regard to them; but he has not abandoned any claim he may have in regard to any other party. I have ascertained that the delivery of the stock under the lease was ineffectual, and I have abandoned the claim to the stock on the farm and to all the personal property upon the estate. Mr Maclean did not consult me at all about the management of the estate, nor about the buying or selling of the produce until 1886. Cross.— . . . It was part of the arrangement that Mr Maclean was to continue in the management, and that things were to go on as before, on the understanding that I was secured by a lease, and the delivery of the personal property—the stock. He continued to manage the farm until March 1886. I made up a state of Mr Maclean's accounts in the year 1886 from information supplied by him. Prior to that I had practically no information in regard to the state of the accounts. It was then I got the vouchers and wages book into my possession. I had repeatedly and urgently asked for accounts to be furnished to me prior to 1886. . . . Mr Maclean had no direct authority from me to order the stores necessary for the carrying on of the farm, but there was a kind of inferred power that he was to order what was necessary. I assumed that he was paying these stores off the income of the property. My lease expired at Martinmas last. . . . My advances have never been recouped. By the Court.— . . . Apart from the taking of the lease and the supposed taking over of the stock, I never performed any act of ownership or management of the estate up till 1886. I never gave myself out publicly as tenant of the place. I knew that goods were being supplied to Mr Maclean, but I thought they were being paid out of the income

On 9th March 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) decerned against the defender for the sum for which he admitted liability, and quoad ultra assoilzied him.*

The pursuers reclaimed.

After the hearing had proceeded some length the Court suggested that there might be a difficulty in granting decree against the defender Scott, as trustee, now that sequestration had been awarded. The pursuers accordingly lodged the following minute:—"Salvesen, for the pursuers, stated that he craved leave to withdraw the minute of restriction, and he at the same time undertook that if decree were pronounced for the sum sued for in terms of the conclusions of the summons against the defender E. E. Scott, the said decree would not be enforced personally against the said defender, but would only be made available against the funds and estate secured by the arrestments used on the dependence of this action, and the trust-estate held by the said defender."

Argued for the reclaimers;—The present case was distinguished from those on which the Lord Ordinary founded by the circumstance that here Mr Maclean was completely divested of his estate by the trust-deed and the lease. His possession thereby became Mr Scott's possession, and he himself Mr Scott's manager. Mr Scott, consequently, was liable for the goods supplied to Mr Maclean's order as his principal, though undisclosed.

Argued for the respondent;—The principle of the cases founded on by the Lord Ordinary applied here, for the effect of the whole transaction was simply to give Mr Scott a security for his advances,—at least that of the sheep stock, and not having regular accounts of Mr Maclean's management, I was not able to check the accuracy of that impression. I first knew of the account sued for in the summer of 1886 sometime. I am willing to pay everything that has been supplied by Mr Macphail since March 1886, when my clerk went down and took possession."

* "Opinion.—In 1881 the affairs of Mr Maclean having become embarrassed, he applied to the defender, Mr Scott, who agreed to make certain advances to pay Mr Maclean's creditors, or at least those of them who were most pressing. The security afforded to Mr Scott was the trust-conveyance dated 1st December 1881 and the lease dated 30th November 1881, the latter being qualified by the letter of even date with the lease.

"It is proved, I think, beyond dispute, that after the execution of these several writs Mr Maclean remained in the possession and management of his estate just as he had done before until 1st March 1886, when Mr Scott entered on the possession and management. It is said that between the date of the lease and March 1886 Mr Maclean was the servant or manager for Mr Scott. That, I think, is certainly not the case. The trust-conveyance and the lease were intended to create a security for Mr Scott, and had no other purpose. They did not, in fact, create the relation of principal and agent, or master and servant, between Mr Scott and Mr Maclean.

"The goods, the price of which is now sued for (so far as delivered prior to March 1886), were delivered by the pursuers to Mr Maclean on his order, and in reliance upon his credit alone. Mr Scott and his connection with Mr Maclean's affairs were during that period entirely unknown to the pursuers. In these circumstances I am of opinion that Mr Scott is not liable to the pursuers for the price of goods supplied prior to 1st March 1886. The principle on which I proceed is well settled—Eaglesham v. Grant, 2 R. 960; Miller v. Downie, 3 R. 548; Stott v. Fender, 5 R. 1104; Newcastle Chemical Co., 9 R. 110. There was also a case of Hardie v. Cameron, decided by the Second Division of the Court on 29th May 1879 (but not reported), the facts in which more closely resembled the present case than any of the other cases I have cited, where the same principle was applied. . . ."

was the object, though Mr Scott was now advised that it was an ineffectual security. In no sense, at least, was Mr Maclean Mr Scott's agent. That might appear to be the case on the surface of the transaction, but it could hardly be doubted that if Mr Maclean had paid all Mr Scott's advances and terminated the trust, the lease would necessarily have fallen also.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises difficult questions, both on the facts and on the law applicable to them. The action is one at the instance of persons who made furnishings to Mr Maclean of Pennycross to enable him to continue his farming operations in a farm which he was in possession of, and the question is, whether Mr Erskine Scott, who held a lease of those lands from Mr Maclean, and also held a trust-disposition for payment of Mr Maclean's creditors, is to be held responsible for the furnishings?

Now, if the conveyance to Mr Scott had been simply a security for advances made by him, or simply a means of paying the creditors of Mr Maclean, I should have thought that the case was substantially ruled by the authorities quoted by the Lord Ordinary. But it appears to me that there is a distinction—and a very vital one—between those cases, which were cases of conveyances granted substantially in security, and without possession following on them, and the present case, which turns simply on this,—that Mr Scott held not only this conveyance in trust, but also a lease from Mr Maclean, who had thus divested himself of possession of the farm, and had further granted to Mr Scott a back-letter expressive of the conditions on which the lease had been granted and was to be held, which stated that it had been agreed between them that Mr Maclean should carry on the farm on behalf of Mr Scott.

It appears to me that when a person having a lease from the proprietor appoints a manager to manage the farm on his behalf, he is responsible for furnishings that are made; and it does not signify in such a case that the articles furnished or the profits of the farm are to go in reality to the manager and not to the tenant, nor that the party who makes the furnishings does not know who is the tenant. That is an entirely different case from those others which were quoted, and for this simple reason, that Mr Scott was the real party in possession—for a lease means possession—and that Mr Maclean did not possess on his radical right of property, but on an obligation to do so on behalf of his own tenant.

It is unnecessary to go into the terms of the lease or of the trust-disposition, because substantially there is no difference of opinion on the effect of either the one or the other. How far under the terms of the lease Mr Maclean could put an end to it by simple payment of his debt may be doubtful, but that question does not arise here. In the meantime it is enough to say that it gave Mr Scott all the privileges which a tenant has, and among them the right to possess instead of the landlord. Accordingly, when Mr Maclean comes to grant the back-letter to which I have alluded, he expressly says that he is to hold on behalf of the tenant. The 5th clause of the back-letter is in these terms,—"As it is contemplated that during your tenancy I shall manage the farm on your behalf, and that the proceeds of the same shall be placed to the credit of my trust-estate, no rent shall be payable by you so long as the proceeds are so applied." The orders therefore which were given by Mr Maclean, and his whole possession, were on behalf of Mr Scott, and accordingly the furnishings which were bought by Mr Maclean were bought on behalf of Mr Scott.

On these grounds, therefore, and without going further into any of the questions which have been mooted and canvassed in the cases that were referred to, I am of opinion that as Mr Maclean, who ordered and received the furnishings in dispute, was the hand—and nothing but the hand—of Mr Scott, Mr Scott is responsible for the debts incurred in obtaining them. The Lord Ordinary has come to a different conclusion, and has referred to cases of dispositions in security and dispositions ex facie absolute, but in reality in security. He says that he thinks that here also the lease was truly a security only—that it was merely the form of a lease without any substance in it,—and that as the credit of Mr Maclean was the only thing on which the pursuers proceeded, Mr Scott cannot be held responsible. He says that the relation between Mr Maclean and Mr Scott was neither that of principal and agent nor master and servant. I entirely differ. I think that the relation between the parties was that of principal and agent, and to a certain extent that of master and servant. In other words, any manager appointed by Mr Scott would have been in precisely the same position as Mr Maclean was in giving these orders, and perhaps the best evidence of that is that Mr Scott in the course of these proceedings actually did appoint another manager, who was his agent for some time, and he admits that he is responsible for the orders which that manager gave. Now, I can see no distinction between the case of that manager and Mr Maclean. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers have a good ground of action here, just as they would have had if the goods had been ordered by the other manager. On the whole matter I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled, and decree for the sum sued for pronounced.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The case is an interesting one undoubtedly, although I do not think it involves any question of principle, but is in reality a question of fact only, namely this, or rather these:—In what relation did Mr Scott stand to the farm in question? and in what circumstances was the debt incurred which is admittedly resting owing?

The action is for an account running from 8th July 1882 to 26th October 1886, the goods being supplied on the order of Mr Maclean (as is averred) "for necessary purposes in connection with the said farm, and for the use of himself and his servants in conducting the said farm, and the said goods were furnished and delivered by the pursuers to the said defender, and were used for the said purposes." It was incumbent on the pursuer to establish that as the foundation of his case, and there is such evidence on the subject that we had no argument to the contrary. I assume therefore that the account was incurred, that that was the nature of it, and that it is still unpaid.

Now, what was Mr Erskine Scott's relation to the farm for the period during which these goods were being supplied? I think it is quite clear that he was creditor in possession, and that the farm was being conducted with a view to enable him to obtain payment of his debt out of his debtor's property. At that period Mr Maclean, the proprietor of the land, was completely divested of the property by a deed dated 1st December 1881, a deed executed in trust, no doubt, but still one which completely divested him, and completely invested Mr Scott. But Mr Scott intending to take the position of a creditor in possession, and in order to obtain payment of his debt, on the day before divesting his debtor of his property, namely, on the 30th of November, obtained a lease from him of the whole estate for a period of years. More than that, he bought from his debtor by a proper contract of purchase and sale the whole stock on the farm. So that immediately after the execution of the lease he is the tenant of the farm, and immediately on the completion of the contract of purchase and sale he is the proprietor of the stock and implements, and everything on the farm. And he actually enters into possession by appointing a manager. He is at liberty to appoint anyone as manager who will accept the appointment, and he may very well select his own debtor, as he did. One can easily see reasons for that course. Now, that was the position of matters during the period when the account was being incurred—Mr Scott tenant in possession with his own debtor as his manager.

Well, this is kept secret—I do not suppose for a moment for any discreditable purpose, but from considerations of delicacy towards his client and debtor, Mr Maclean. Of course that is commendable, but we must take care that such delicacy is not exercised to the loss of other people, and what is now aimed at is that Mr Scott, through the position he has come to occupy, is to have his own debt paid preferably to the debts of other people. That is really what it comes to. This case is just a competition between the pursuers, the Messrs Macphail, who furnished the goods between 1882 and 1886, and Mr Scott, as to which of them should get paid preferably.

When the case came originally before us there was this minute upon the record,—"The conclusions of the summons, in so far as directed against the defender E. Erskine Scott, are intended, and are hereby restricted, to be against him as trustee under the trust-deed mentioned in the summons." After the case had been partially discussed, it occurred to some members of the Court—I rather think—and also to the bar, that there might be some inconvenience through the existence of this restriction, and accordingly a minute was lodged on 19th July in these terms,—"Salvesen, for the pursuers, stated that he craved leave to withdraw the minute of restriction, and he at the same time undertook that if decree were pronounced for the sum sued for in terms of the conclusions of the summons against the defender E. E. Scott, the said decree would not be enforced personally against the said defender, but would only be made available against the funds and estate secured by the arrestment used on the dependence of the action, and the trust-estate held by the said defender." That makes it clear to demonstration that this is a competition for a preference between Scott and the Macphails. And it is part of Scott's case here that the Macphails were in ignorance of the fact that Mr Maclean had been divested of his property and of possession and was merely Scott's manager. It is so stated boldly on record by Scott in his answers—"Admitted that the trust-deed here mentioned was granted on 1st December 1881, but was never published, and that the present defender's name was entered in the Valuation-roll as here mentioned. Admitted that, from 1st March last till the sequestration of Mr Maclean, the defender had a special representative residing on the farm. Quoad ultra not admitted, and explained . . . (2) that the lease of the farm here mentioned was granted to the present defender with the view of giving him legal delivery of the moveables on the farm for trust purposes, but the defender has been advised, and is now satisfied, that it was ineffectual for that purpose." Upon my word I do not know how he should have been so advised. If a man takes a lease and buys stock and puts a man in possession, I think there is abundant delivery. At all events, the stocking which was arrested by this creditor to secure his debt for maintaining the stocking has been removed. This particular creditor has removed them, and sold them as his own.

Now, what is the state of matters which that gives rise to? It is equivalent to Mr Scott saying—"You shall have no claim against me, because you were ignorant that Maclean had been completely divested, and I completely invested—your claim therefore is to be dealt with, not according to the true state of the facts, but according to your knowledge. But, on the other hand, in respect of that true state of the facts of which you were ignorant, my claim, a preference over you upon the stock of the farm, shall hold good." In short, it comes to this, that the true state of the facts is to avail Mr Scott against one who was ignorant of the true state, but not so as to give that ignorant person any corresponding claim against Mr Scott.

Now, I do not think that that is just, or that it can possibly be according to any principle of law. One view or the other must be taken and pursued consistently. Mr Scott may deal with the Messrs Macphail as if the true state of the facts did not exist inasmuch as the Messrs Macphail were ignorant of them. In that view he must regard the stock as not having been withdrawn from the ostensible possession of its ostensible owner, and must look upon Mr Maclean as himself getting supplies from tradesmen for the maintenance of that stock—in short, as the owner in a question with those who make these supplies; or on the other hand, he may deal with the Macphails on the footing of the true state of the facts, and regard Mr Maclean as manager and not as owner, and on that alternative Mr Scott, as the real owner for whose benefit and on whose account Mr Maclean obtained these supplies, must be held responsible for the payment of them. To say that Mr Scott is to take the whole proceeds—the whole fund out of which the debt is to be paid—and not to be responsible for the debt, would in my opinion be to proclaim a dishonest principle. A party who takes such a fund must be liable for the debts which affect it. That is the principle upon which there is liability on the part of anyone who shares in the profits of a company. And if Mr Scott is to take the whole proceeds of the farm and use the stock for his own purposes—that is, for payment of his own debt—shall he be allowed to say that he is not to be liable for furnishings supplied during the time he was owner, and owner for the purpose of paying his debt? I cannot accede to that. Nobody can strip another of all he possesses and invest himself, and then say that anyone furnishing supplies in ignorance of that arrangement is to take the divested debtor and have no claim against the person behind simply because he was ignorant of the arrangement.

On the whole matter I agree that the pursuers must have decree against Mr Scott.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I also think the pursuers are entitled to decree. I think the case presents to us merely a question of fact—the question whether the accounts were incurred by Mr Maclean as agent of Mr Scott. I am of opinion that it is proved by the evidence in this case that this was the relation which subsisted between these two persons, and that Mr Scott therefore is liable as Mr Maclean's principal. That is, I think, sufficient for the decision of the case, and I do not think it necessary to go into any other matters.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allow the minute of restriction annexed to the summons to be withdrawn, and the minute for pursuers to be received; and having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note, Recall the Lord Ordinary's

In an action brought by the assignees against the society, held that the knowledge of D was not equivalent to knowledge on the part of the society, and that therefore the society was not in bad faith in making a payment to D on account of his shares after the date of the assignation, and that the society was not liable to the assignees for the sum so paid.

Question, whether such shares can be the subject of a security for an advance of money.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Elgin. I.

BY bond and assignation in security, dated July 1882, Arthur Duffes, solicitor, Forres, granted him to have instantly borrowed and received from Alexander Grigor Allan and others, partners of the firm of Grigor & Young, solicitors, Elgin, the sum of £300, which he bound himself to repay at Martinmas 1883, and in security he assigned to them ten shares standing in his name in the Forres, Burghead, and Findhorn Permanent Investment Company, registered under the Building and Friendly Societies Acts, of which he was manager, secretary, and clerk.

The constitution of the society and the regulations as to transfer of shares appear from the rules quoted below.*

* "7. Balance of books and division of profits.—The books of the company shall be brought to a balance, and the profits ascertained as on the 30th day of May in each year, and the said profits shall be credited in the books of the company to each shareholder according to the number and value of shares held by him, whether he shall hold advanced or unadvanced shares. So soon as the sum standing in the books of the company at the credit of any shareholder shall amount to £25 for each share he or she may hold, the amount of such share or shares if unadvanced shall be paid over to such shareholder, who shall then cease to be a shareholder in so far as regards such paid-up shares, but, if advanced shares, . . . It is, however, specially provided that any shareholder withdrawing before the subscriptions and the profits credited thereon have accumulated to the full amount of £25 per share shall have no claim on the company but for the amount of subscriptions paid by him, and simple interest thereon, in terms of Rule 8th.

"8. Shareholders withdrawing, sale and transfer of shares.—Any shareholder not having received an advance of money, or whose advance shall have been repaid, shall be allowed to withdraw from the society on giving written notice to the manager, and shall be entitled to receive, at the end of three months from the receipt of such notice, the full amount of his subscriptions, together with Savings' Bank interest thereon; provided always that it shall appear from the company's stock, as ascertained at the preceding annual balance or by special

The society kept no register of shareholders other than the shareholders' ledger.

At the date of the assignation the amount at the credit of the ten shares was £77, 0s. 10d. Duffes continued to pay his subscriptions to the society till 1885.

On 18th July 1884 Duffes received £100 from the society as part of the subscriptions at his credit.

On 25th November 1885 Duffes altered the heading of his account in the shareholders' ledger so as to read thus:—"Arthur Duffes, solicitor, Forres, now in name of Alex. Grigor Allan, William Charles Young, and James Hutcheson, solicitors, Elgin, for behoof of the firm of Grigor & Young, solicitors, Elgin, conform to assignation intimated to me.—ARTHUR DUFFES, manager, 25th Novr. 1885."

On the same date Duffes gave to Messrs Grigor & Young this letter:—"Messrs Grigor & Young, solicitors, Elgin.—Forres, 25th Novr. 1885.—Dear Sirs,—I acknowledge intimation of bond and assignation by myself as an individual to your firm of fourteen shares* in the Forres, Burghead, and Findhorn Permanent Investment Company, of date 18th July 1882, and recorded 25th November 1885.—Yours truly, ARTHUR DUFFES, manager of the said Forres, Burghead, &c., Company. P.S.—The said shares have been transferred to your name.—ARTHUR DUFFES, manager."

In December 1885 Duffes resigned his offices in connection with the society.

In June 1886 Messrs Grigor & Young raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Elgin against Robert Urquhart and Others, as trustees for the company, for payment of £200, or such other sum as may appear to be the amount due in respect of "the ten shares in the said company specified in the condescendence."

The pursuers in their condescendence set forth the bond and assignation in security, and stated that the same was duly intimated, and that the sum of £200 remained unpaid.

They further averred,—(Cond. 4) "The amount due on ten of the said shares as at 18th May 1885, as instructed by the pass-book therefor under the hand of the manager of the company, herewith produced, was £128, 15s. 2d., exclusive of interest since accumulated. When the said Arthur Duffes handed this pass-book to the pursuers he then, and afterwards, stated that it shewed the correct amount due to him on ten shares. It is provided by the rules of said company (No. IV.) that such pass-books shall be issued to the shareholders, and shall be held legal evidence in minute of the directors, that such payment shall not exceed the value at the time of such shares so withdrawn; and it is specially provided that, notwithstanding the value of said shares so withdrawn shall, with the profits credited thereon, as by Rule 7th, exceed the amount of subscriptions paid by the shareholder withdrawing, and simple interest thereon as aforesaid, the shareholder so withdrawing previous to his shares being fully paid, as stated in Rule 7th, shall have no farther claim than for said subscriptions and simple interest as aforesaid, or for the value of such shares, should the value be less than said subscriptions and interest. Any shareholder shall be allowed to sell or transfer his shares to any other person, whether a member of the society or not; provided always that in the case of a sale or transfer, a transfer fee of threepence per share shall be paid to the company at the completion of the transfer, over and above the legal expenses of the same, if any, and that all arrears, fines, penalties, or sums otherwise due to the company, shall be paid previous to the transfer being registered. . . ."

* The question came ultimately to refer to ten shares only.

all cases of dispute. The pass-book was delivered to the pursuers about the middle of October 1885."

The defenders stated that Duffes resigned office on 8th December 1885, and that it was not until 14th January 1886 that they recovered the books of the company, and that they then discovered that the shares stood in the shareholders' ledger in the name of the pursuers.

They further averred,—(Stat. 2) "No intimation of said bond and assignation in security has been made to the defenders or to the president, vice-president, and directors of the said company. There was no transference of the shares of the company to the pursuers." (Stat. 4) "On 18th July 1884 a sum of £100 was paid to the said Arthur Duffes in part of his subscriptions at credit of his shares, and the receipt therefor, dated 18th July 1884, and cheque, dated 17th July 1884, p. £100 on the company's bank account, are herewith produced, and referred to. At May 1885 the sum at the credit of the said Arthur Duffes in respect of the said ten shares was £23, 3s. 7d." (Stat. 5) "Since the said Arthur Duffes resigned, it has been found that during the period of his managership he had embezzled funds belonging to the company, amounting as at present ascertained to £168, 11s. 9d., and he is their debtor to that extent, exclusive of interest."

The pursuers pleaded;—"(3) The transfer of said shares being in competent form, and duly intimated to the company, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved. (4) The alleged payment of £100 to the said Arthur Duffes being ultra vires of the company, and in violation of its rules, cannot be pleaded as a set-off against the pursuers' claim. (5) Separatim, The said alleged payment not having been duly entered in the books of the company, and not appearing therein at 25th November 1885, cannot be pleaded as a deduction from the balance then shewn by the books to be due. (6) The alleged embezzlement by Duffes, and consequent loss, being due to the unwarrantable, wrongful, and illegal act of the defenders, is not pleadable as a set-off against the pursuers' claim."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers not being shareholders of the said company have no title to sue for payment of sums due under shares belonging to, or in name of a shareholder of the company. (2) No intimation of the bond and assignation in security in question having been made to the defenders, or to the president, vice-president, and directors of the said company, the present action is unfounded, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (3) The said Arthur Duffes being himself the manager of the said company, while at the same time he was the cedent and debtor of the pursuers, intimation to him alone was insufficient, and such intimation, in order actually to reach the proper parties, should have been made to the defenders, and the president, vice-president, and directors of the company. (4) There having been no absolute sale or transfer of the shares held by Duffes in the said company to the pursuers duly completed, they are not entitled to insist in the present action. (5) The company being creditors of the said Arthur Duffes for a much larger sum than ever stood at his credit in their books in connection with shares held by him, the defenders are entitled to set off both the sums embezzled by him and the sums paid to him against the claim now made by the pursuers in this action. (6) By the rules of the said company, shareholders can only withdraw therefrom on giving three months' written notice to the manager, and this regulation not having been complied with by the pursuers, the present action should in any case be dismissed.

A proof before answer was allowed in which the facts above narrated were proved.

On 9th April 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by bond and assignation in security for £300, dated 18th July 1882, and registered in the Books of Council and Session 5th November 1885, Arthur Duffes, solicitor, Forres, conveyed to the pursuers, inter alia, fourteen shares of the defenders' company in security of the said advances made by the pursuers to him: Finds that the said assignation was not duly intimated to the defenders: Therefore sustains the defenders' 1, 2, 3, and 4 pleas in law: Dismisses the action, and finds the pursuers liable in expenses."

Grigor Allan v. Urquhart.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The assignation had been sufficiently intimated to the company. The knowledge of the manager was the knowledge of the company,[1] and there was no necessity for further and direct intimation to the directors. The company, therefore, were in bad faith in paying the £100 to Duffes. When the company had put forward a manager with certain duties to perform, the public was entitled to trust to his duties being performed, and one of these duties was to communicate intimations of assignations to the directors. In the ledger, as shewn to Mr Grigor Allan on 25th November 1885, no mention was made of £100 having been paid to Duffes; the £100 still stood to the pursuers' credit. If the facts were not conform to that state of matters, the company must suffer. The intimation was, at all events, good as at 25th November, when the alteration in the share ledger was made. The share ledger was the only register of transfers kept by the company, and in several of the City of Glasgow Bank litigations such an entry had been held good. The pursuers were therefore, at all events, entitled to £23.

Argued for the defenders;—It was admitted no intimation had been made to the directors, and private knowledge on the part of the manager was not an equipollent therefor.[2] He only knew of the transaction in his private capacity, not qua manager. He was not entitled to register the assignation unless the company authorised him to do so, and accepted the assignee as a shareholder in the cedent's place. There must be such divestiture as to put the assignee in the cedent's place; there was no tertium quid. But the pursuers had not come as shareholders, they merely sued for a money payment. It was a condition precedent to a transfer of shares under the rules that the payment of the full amount due on the shares should be made. This had not been done, and therefore no transfer could legally have taken place.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case relates to the assignation of certain shares in a friendly investment society. The cedent was the manager of the society, and had very large powers, for he had in his own person all the official powers of the society. The shares in question belonged to him, and he assigned them in security for advances made to him. There was no formal intimation of the assignation to the society, and no transfer of the shares to the assignees' names on the register of the society. In point of fact, there was no register of transfers. There was a minute of the society permitting members to transfer their shares, but evidently that minute proceeded on the assumption that transfers were to be registered, though no register was ever opened for their reception. On the whole matter I have serious doubts whether shares in the society were capable of being made security for money advances. I do not express any opinion on that point, but I am clearly of opinion that the assignation in question was never completed by intimation. It is said that the granter of the assignation was the manager of the society, and that, therefore, it was unnecessary that he should intimate the assignation to himself. I do not agree in that view of the case. The fact that the granter was also manager only shews how necessary it was that the intimation should be regularly made. The private knowledge of the manager might have been founded on if a third party had made the assignation, but when the manager himself was the proprietor of the shares assigned the only effect is that no one but himself had an opportunity of knowing that any such assignation had been granted. In the circumstances of this society it was eminently necessary that the assignation should have been regularly and properly intimated. On this ground I am of opinion that this assignation is not effectual.

Lord Young.—The pursuers took an assignation to these shares in security for repayment of borrowed money. That is an experiment such as I think was never before attempted. It is not necessary to decide whether shares in a friendly society can be so assigned as security for a debt, though it is almost impossible to avoid forming an opinion on the question. My own opinion is that they cannot, otherwise than by substituting the creditor in the debtor's place as a member of the society. The defenders here are a friendly society under the Acts, and have a code of laws framed under the Acts with the authority of the statutes. According to these rules the shares of this society are of the amount of £25 each, to be paid up in fortnightly instalments of a few shillings each, and when the payments with profits amount to £25 on each share the member goes out of the society, the £25 being paid to him. Before he has paid up in full he may leave the society on three months' notice, taking the value of his shares at that date, but in that case he can never get more than he has paid with simple interest, but he may get less if the shares are worth less.

He may go out of the society in one other way, viz., by transferring his shares to someone else, but this he can only do after everything due to the society is paid up. I do not see anything in this consistent with the idea of a member making his shares security for a debt. I do not doubt (if there is nothing in the rules inconsistent with it) that if the society holds money immediately payable to a member that member may assign his claim to another, and the money will be payable on the simple doctrine of the assignation by a creditor of a debt due to him. There is nothing of that kind here.

At 18th July 1882, the date of the assignation, there was due, as we find from the pass-book, £75 on these shares. Did the pursuers expect to get more by the assignation than an assignation to that debt? They did not contemplate becoming members of the society, or if they did they failed to do so. Then was that an assignation to sums to be paid in by the debtor subsequent to July 18th? He did pay in such sums in point of fact; did he pay them in for himself as a shareholder, or was it as representing his creditor assignees? Now, in July 1884 he got £100 paid to him. The pursuers here say that that sum was paid to him in fraud of their rights. But the assignation was never intimated, or, if it was, it was certainly not before November 1885. I do not think it was intimated even then. What the pursuers rely on is, that the cedent was manager for the society, and it is said that his knowledge is equivalent to, or imports intimation to the society. Intimation of an assignation is, according to our law, necessary for two purposes; one is to complete the title, the other is to put a debtor in bad faith to pay to anyone other than the assignee. Now, it was not necessary here for the first purpose, but it was necessary for the second. Accordingly, taking that view, the pursuers say that the payment here to the cedent was a fraud. But the cedent here was not only manager of the society, he was also a creditor of the society. But his knowledge was not the knowledge of the society for such a purpose as the assignees maintain. His relation to the society was that of creditor and debtor; how, then, could his knowledge as creditor put the society in bad faith in making this payment? Apply the case to any bank in Scotland. The manager has a large sum at his credit, and in total ignorance that he has done anything to take away his right to claim that money, the bank, at his request, pay that sum to him. Does that put the bank in bad faith? They never knew of any assignation, and yet it is said that as the manager knew of the assignation, his knowledge being the bank's knowledge, the bank must be held to have known of the assignation too. Rational opinion rebels at such a notion, and yet it is the foundation of the pursuers' whole case. On that ground I would disallow the claim.

Then it was argued that the pursuers were shareholders in the society in respect of these shares in November 1885, when it appears an alteration was made in the ledger on the heading of Duffes' account. I do not think that that amounted to a transfer of the shares, or that the pursuers were acknowledged by the society as shareholders. Even if it were held that they were shareholders they would take nothing by it, for they could only hold subject to the payment made to Duffes prior to that. If they were shareholders then they must proceed to pay up what is still due on the shares, or withdraw on notice. But they are not paying up, and they have given no notice to withdraw, and therefore, if they are shareholders, they can take nothing by the action. In any view, I think the pursuers' case fails.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur. I do not think that this assignation was so intimated as to put the society in bad faith in paying to Duffes. That being so, the interest in the case is diminished to £23. If the pursuers have any right it is as shareholders only, and they have not taken the necessary steps under the rules to become shareholders; whether they could make themselves shareholders at all is, I think, doubtful.

LORD CRAIGHILL was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the assignation founded on by the pursuers was not duly intimated to the defenders: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against."

No. 17. DONALD STEWART SUTHERLAND, Petitioner (Appellant).—Rhind—Baxter.

Nov. 17, 1887.
Sutherland v. Barbour.

Property—Common property—Common interest—Alteration of buildings.—The proprietor of a shop in an area and of a dwelling-house above, the latter being on the street level, and both forming part of the same tenement, petitioned the Dean of Guild for authority to bring forward his dwelling-house to the line of the street. The petitioner's title was a disposition to "All and Whole that shop and dwelling-house in . . . together with a cellar in the front area . . . together also with a right in common with" the other proprietors of the tenement "to the solum of the piece of ground upon which the foresaid shop and dwelling-house are built." The other cellars in the area were the property of certain of these upper proprietors of the tenement. Held that the petitioner was not proprietor of the area, and that the other proprietors were entitled to object to his proposed alterations.

Superior and Vassal—Restrictions on building—Common feuing plan—Loss of plan—Proof—Onus.—A feu-charter, dated in 1825, providing for the erection of a tenement in a town, declared that it should not be in the power of the feuar to make any deviation from or alteration of a plan of the tenement, signed as relative to the feu-charter, "all which it is hereby specially provided may be stopped, demolished, or removed by us or our foresaids, or by any of the feuars of the said street, at the expense of the feuars offending." The tenement was erected in 1826. In 1887 the proprietor proposed to bring forward the front of the tenement to the line of the street by covering the area. Neighbouring feuars, with a title to object, objected on the ground that the proposed alteration was a deviation from the plan, but the plan itself was lost. Held that, as it was to be presumed that the existing buildings had been erected in conformity with the plan, the onus lay upon the proprietor to shew that the alterations proposed by him were not disconform to the plan.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.
I.

DONALD STEWART SUTHERLAND, baker in Edinburgh, heritable proprietor of the subjects Nos. 2A, 2, 4, and 6A Claremont Place, Edinburgh, presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court there for authority, inter alia, to bring forward the fronts of these subjects to the street, and in doing so to cover over the sunk areas in front, and to alter the stairs leading to these areas and to the cellars therein.

The petition was opposed by William Lawrie Barbour and others, proprietors of the upper flats of the tenements of which the petitioner's subjects formed a part, on the grounds (1), as regarded the whole subjects except No. 2, that the areas in front of these subjects, which the petitioner proposed to cover over, did not belong in exclusive property to him; and (2), as regarded all the subjects, including No. 2 (the area in front of which was admittedly the petitioner's property), that the proposed alterations were in contravention of the provisions of the feu-charter from which the titles of the petitioner and the respondents flowed.

No. 2A was at the west corner of Claremont Place. It consisted of a small shop and a house on the area level (part of the main-door house No. 2 forming the flat on the street level above No. 2A). The area was entered by a stair at the corner of Claremont Place, and turned the corner into West Claremont Street. It contained cellars, of which the eastmost alone belonged to the petitioner; the others, both those in front of 2A Claremont Place and those in front of 1 West Claremont Street, belonged to the respondent Barbour and others.

The petitioner's title to the property No. 2A Claremont Place consisted of a disposition by the Improved Edinburgh Property Investment Building Society, with consent of William Fraser, in favour of the petitioner, dated July 1878. This disposition conveyed to the petitioner "All and Whole that shop and dwelling-house in the area of No. 2 Claremont Place, . . . together with the baker's oven behind the foresaid subjects hereby disponed, and the solum of the ground on which the said oven is erected, being part of the tenement of land built on the area or plot of ground after mentioned, together also with a cellar in the front area, being the eastmost cellar therein, and immediately next to the stair leading into the area, and a right of access to the roof of said tenement for the purpose of cleaning vents and other purposes, together also with a right in common with the proprietor of the main-door house, No. 2 Claremont Place, and the proprietors of the adjoining tenements to the east to the back-green behind the same, and to the solum of the piece of ground upon which the foresaid shop and dwelling-house are built, in common with the proprietors of the subjects above the same, which said tenement, with the back-green pertaining thereto, is part of All and Whole that lot or area of building ground, lying, &c., particularly described in an instrument of sasine &c. [being the instrument of sasine following on the feu-charter set forth in connection with No. 2], together with the pertinents of the said subjects herein disponed: . . . But always with and under the burdens, provisions, obligations, and declarations specified in the foresaid instrument of sasine, dated and recorded as aforesaid, in so far as applicable to the subjects and others above disponed, and also with and under the burdens and declarations specified in a disposition" granted by James Paris, S.S.C., Edinburgh, in favour of Fraser, dated and recorded May 1869, which last-mentioned deed was a disposition of the subjects in favour of Fraser, his heirs and assignees, inter alia, "under burden of keeping in repair the pavement in the sunk area and stair leading thereto (my said disponee and his foresaids, and the subjects above disponed, being freed of all share of the expense of keeping up the roof of the tenement of which the said subjects form a part, and the pavement and railings in front of said tenement, the same being to be upheld by the proprietors of the dwelling-houses in the common stair of said tenement)."

The petitioner maintained that under these titles a right of property in the area was by implication conveyed to him, subject only to a right of access in favour of the proprietors of the other cellars, which access his proposed operations (he averred) would in no way impair.

The respondents, Barbour and the other proprietors of flats above No. 2A, were proprietors of the remaining cellars in the area. Barbour's title (and the others were similar) was a disposition by Paris in his favour of "All and Whole that dwelling-house, being the westmost half of the first flat above the street flat of the tenement built at the corner of West Claremont Street and Claremont Place, and entering by the common stair presently numbered 1 West Claremont Street, with a cellar in the area, being the second from the stair leading into said area"; and there was this declaration,—"Declaring always that my said disponee and his foresaids shall be bound to bear one-sixth part of the expense of upholding the roof of the said tenement of which the subjects hereby disponed form a part, common stair, rain, water, and other pipes and drains connected therewith, and railings and pavement in front of said tenement (the pavement in the sunk area, where the foresaid cellar is situated and stair leading thereto, being kept in repair by the other proprietors of said tenement)."

The respondents maintained that the petitioner had not an exclusive right of property in the area No. 2A, or at least that he was not entitled to execute any operations which would have the effect of altering their access to their cellars, which they stated would be the effect of the proposed alterations.

No. 2 Claremont Place was immediately to the east of No. 2A. It consisted of a main-door house (including the street flat above No. 2A), and area, with cellars therein, the petitioner being admitted by the proprietor of the whole including the area. The feu-contract, on the restrictions in which the only objection to this part of the petitioner's proposed alterations was based, was granted by Charles Rae and others, Rose's trustees, in favour of James Sutherland, and was dated July, August, and November 1825. It contained, inter alia, these clauses:—"And it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the said James Sutherland, and his foresaids, shall be bound and obliged against the term of Whitsunday 1826 to complete the houses to be erected on said area, and that the same shall be in strict conformity in all respects to the plan and elevation adopted for the said area made out by the said Adam Ogilvie Turnbull, approved of by the said trust disponees, and signed as relative thereto, strict conformity to which plan and elevation it is hereby agreed may be enforced as the buildings proceed, by application, when necessary, to the Judge Ordinary of the bounds; and further, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said James Sutherland and his foresaids are, and shall be, strictly prohibited, now and in all time coming, from making shops in the tenements to be erected by him on the said area to enter from Claremont Street, without prejudice nevertheless to their having shops in Claremont Place, if they shall so incline. . . . And, moreover, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that it shall not be competent to, nor in the power of, the said James Sutherland, or his foresaids, to make any deviation from or alteration of the plan and elevation above mentioned of the said tenement to be erected on the area hereby disponed, nor to erect any buildings of any description upon the background of the said area, . . . all which, it is hereby specially provided, may be stopped, demolished, or removed by us or our foresaids, or by any of the feuars of the said street, at the expense of the feuars offending; which whole burdens, provisions, declarations, and conditions contained in these presents are hereby appointed to be engrossed in the instrument or instruments of sasine to follow hereon, and in all the future transmissions and investitures of the said area or tenements to be erected thereon or any part thereof; and if the same shall not be inserted therein, such instruments of sasine and transmissions shall be ipso facto void and null, as if the said writing had never been made or granted."

This title was duly feudalised by instrument of sasine, the restrictions being duly entered in the record, and referred to and incorporated in the titles of all the respondents.

The question under this head was as to whether the alterations proposed by the petitioner were in violation of the plan referred to in the feu-charter. The plan itself had been lost, and each side maintained that the other was bound to produce it,—the petitioner on the ground that as he was admittedly proprietor of the area No. 2, it was for the respondents to shew that what he proposed to do with his property was forbidden by the clauses of restriction in the feu-charter; and the respondents on the ground that as it was to be presumed that the buildings had been originally erected in conformity with the plan, it was for the petitioner to shew that his proposed alterations kept within the limits allowed by the plan.

The question raised in regard to Nos. 4 and 6A was the same in principle as that regarding No. 2A. The details on this head therefore need not be given here.

On 5th May 1887 the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, with regard to the petitioner's proposed operations at 2A Claremont Place and at 4 and 6A Claremont Place, that these operations are not confined to his own property; and with regard to his proposed operations at 2 Claremont Place, finds that these operations would be an infringement of the conditions of the feu-charter from which the titles of the petitioner and of the respondents flow, and would be injurious to the property of the respondents: Therefore to this extent sustains the pleas in law for the respondents, refuses the warrant craved by the petitioner: Finds the petitioner liable to the respondents in expenses," &c.

The petitioner appealed.

The arguments on the question of the alleged contravention of the feuing plan sufficiently appear from the narrative on that point.

On the question of property in the areas other than No. 2, argued for the petitioner;—But for the circumstance that the respondents had the right of property in certain of the cellars here, it was plain on the authorities[1] that the right of property in the area was in the petitioner, the principle being that, unless there was something in the titles plainly to the contrary, the owner of the ground flat had the property in the solum on which the house was built, and also in the sunk area, the other proprietors of the tenement having merely a right of common interest, and in Johnston v. White[1] a conveyance of the solum, in terms almost identical with those here, was held not to alter this presumption of exclusive property in the proprietor of the ground flat. The question, therefore, was, did the circumstance that the respondents had a conveyance in property of certain of the cellars in the area make any difference? It did not. The solum on which the tenement itself stood, on the above authorities, was plainly the petitioner's property, and the respondents' property in the cellars gave them no higher right in the area than a servitude of access, coupled with their common law right of common interest. The petitioner, therefore, was not entitled to do anything to impair that right of servitude, nor anything which would be a source of danger to the tenement, but otherwise he might erect such shop-fronts as he pleased on what was his own property.[2] Mere loss of amenity was no valid objection where the objector's title was merely that of common interest.[2]

Argued for the respondents;—The cited cases related to proposals to build either over an area which had been expressly conveyed to the person so proposing,[3] or over an area to which he had an exclusive right of access, with an exclusive right of property in all the cellars in the area.[4] Neither of these elements occurred here, and that difference reduced the petitioner's right from that of exclusive property, subject to a right of common interest in the other part owners of the tenement, to a right of common property with them. The petition ought therefore to be refused.

At advising,—

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The appellant here, who is proprietor of certain heritable subjects in Edinburgh, asks for authority to bring forward the premises to the street, or, in other words, to build over the area in front of the subjects. The application is opposed by certain of his neighbours, and the Dean of Guild has refused his authority to the proposed alterations. The question is whether that judgment was well founded.

Sutherland v. Barbour.

The property of the petitioner consists of three different subjects—(1) 2A Claremont Place consists of a shop and dwelling-house, and a cellar in the front area. There are other cellars in that area which belong to other parties. (2) No. 2 Claremont Place, which adjoins the last mentioned lot, and which belongs entirely to the petitioner, including the area. (3) Nos. 4 and 6A Claremont Place.—These are two shops, and a house and a cellar in the area, but in this area also there are other cellars belonging to the respondent Church and others. The authority which the petitioner desires to obtain from the Dean of Guild is an authority to bring forward his houses to the street, or, in other words, to build over all the areas in front, and his claim to do so rests upon his alleged right to the property of all the areas. I think it was conceded that if he had not the property of all the areas his application is not well founded.

The first thing we must consider is, Has he the right of property in No. 2A Claremont Place? The title of that subject stands thus. There is conveyed to him,—"All and Whole that shop and dwelling-house in the area of No. 2 Claremont Place, with a baker's oven behind the said subjects, and the solum of the ground on which the oven is erected, with a cellar in the front area, being the eastmost cellar therein and immediately next to the stair leading into the area, and a right of access to the roof of the tenement for cleaning vents, &c., together also with a right in common with the proprietors of the main-door house No. 2 Claremont Place, and the proprietors of the adjoining tenements to the east to the back-green behind the same, and to the solum of the piece of ground on which the said shop and dwelling-house are built, in common with the proprietors of the subjects above the same . . . together with the pertinents of the said subjects." Now, it is plain enough from that description that the solum of the area is not conveyed to him per expressum, but it is said to be implied from the description. I do not think that we can imply any such right of property, and I do not think that any of the cases referred to support such a contention. There is here a definite description of the subjects conveyed, and these consist only of the shop with the solum on which it stands, and do not include the solum of the area. There is also conveyed a cellar in the area, but there are cellars belonging to other persons in that area, which I think makes it plain that the petitioner is not entitled to claim a right of property in the area itself.

If we next take the titles of Nos. 4 and 6A Claremont Place, we find that with a similar description there is conveyed the shop with the bakehouse, &c. The description is practically the same as in the case of No. 2A, which satisfies my mind that the petitioner has no right of property in the solum of this area also.

I think it is quite plain that the application is not well founded, because the petitioner admits that he is not entitled to build over the areas unless they belong to him. No right less than a right of property could sustain such a claim. That would therefore in my view prevent the appellant succeeding so far as relates to Nos. 2A, 4, and 6A Claremont Place.

The other property is in a different position. It is plain that in this instance the petitioner is the proprietor of the cellars and also of the area, and it may well be that he is entitled to bring forward his house to the street so far as regards this part of the subjects, although he is not entitled to do so as regards the other parts. The respondents object to the proposed alterations on the ground that they would be in contravention of the titles on which he holds his property. Referring therefore to the petitioner's title we find this clause,—"And it is hereby specially provided and declared that the said James Sutherland shall be bound and obliged against the term of Whitsunday 1826 to complete the houses to be erected on the said area, and that the same shall be in conformity in all respects to the plan and elevation adopted for the said area made out by the said Adam Ogilvie Turnbull, approved by us and signed as relative hereto, strict conformity to which plan and elevation it is hereby agreed may be enforced as the buildings proceed by application when necessary to the Judge Ordinary of the bounds"; while these conditions are inserted in this and subsequent titles—"And moreover, it is hereby expressly provided and declared that it shall not be competent to, nor in the power of the said James Sutherland or his foresaids to make any deviation from or alteration of the plan and elevation above mentioned of the said tenement to be erected on the area hereby disponed, nor to erect any buildings on the back . . . all which it is hereby specially provided may be stopped, demolished, or removed by us or our foresaids, or by any of the feuars of the said street, at the expense of the feuars offending." This right to stop the erection of any building is given to the other feuars, and there are the same restrictions and obligations in their titles. That being so, there is no doubt that the conditions may be enforced against the petitioner if he proposes to violate them—and it is said that he proposes to violate them—inasmuch as the proposed buildings would not be in conformity with the plan referred to. The petitioner, however, says in answer,—"You cannot tell whether I am violating that plan, because no such plan now exists, and if you wish to enforce it against me you must produce it." I cannot think that that is a sound argument. The house has existed for a long time, and presumably it was built according to the titles on which the property was held. I think that the petitioner must shew that his proposed work is in conformity with the titles, and consequently that he, and not the respondents, must produce the plan. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Dean of Guild is well founded, and that we should dismiss the appeal and affirm the judgment.

Sheriff of Ross, &c.
I.

In June 1886 Sir James D. Mackenzie of Findon and Mountgerald, in the county of Ross, Bart., granted a trust-disposition in favour of James Alexander Robertson, C.A., Edinburgh, and James Anderson, solicitor, Inverness, for behoof of his creditors, by which he conveyed to them the lands of Findon and Montgerald, with the whole writs, &c., of those estates.

For some years prior to the date of the trust-disposition Mr David Ross, bank-agent, Dingwall, acted as Sir James' factor on his estates, and in that capacity obtained possession of the writs, &c., applicable to the estates.

In September 1886 the trustees under Sir James Mackenzie's trust-deed raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dingwall against Mr Ross, in which they prayed the Court to ordain the defender to produce a list of all writs, &c., in his hands or under his control belonging to Sir James, or relating to his estate, and on such list being produced, to ordain the defender to deliver them to the petitioners.

The pursuers averred that the writs, &c., were necessary for the due administration of the trust-estate, and that they had suffered inconvenience by the defender's retention of them.

The defender claimed to be entitled to retain the title-deeds, writs, &c., until he was paid an account which he averred to be due to him. The account subsequently founded on consisted solely of sums due to him as salary as factor, and for outlays properly incurred by him in the exercise of his factorial duties.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers being now in right of the writs, titles, books, and others mentioned, are entitled to delivery thereof, as prayed for.

The pursuers afterwards added the following pleas:—(1) The defender, as factor, having admittedly received rents sufficient to meet his advances as factor, was bound to discharge all burdens affecting the estate out of such rents, before making cash advances to the truster. (2) The defender having made cash advances to the truster, while there were burdens undischarged, must be held to have made them on his own personal responsibility.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender having acquired actual possession of the writs, books, and documents referred to, from the owner thereof, is entitled to retain possession of them until paid the amount due to him under his contract.

On 8th November 1886 the Sheriff-substitute (Crawford Hill) pronounced an interlocutor in which he, inter alia, found that the defender was entitled to retain the writs, &c., in his possession until he was paid the balance due to him on his intromissions.*

On appeal the Sheriff (Cheyne), on 11th December following, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor of 8th November last: . . . Finds, as regards the defender's first plea, that the defender is entitled to retain all books and documents that came into his possession in his capacity of factor on the truster's heritable estates until any salary due to him as factor has been paid, and his reasonable factorial outlays have been made good; but that he is not entitled to retain said books and documents in security of cash advances made by him to the truster," and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed.

It appeared from the accounts produced by the defender that with the exception of £477, 13s. 9d. of outlays in connection with drainage, the account between him and his principal had been settled in the end of February 1885. The defender claimed retention of the books and documents in respect of that sum, and in respect of a balance on general factorial outlays of £1661, 19s. 9d., in all £2139, 13s. 6d. It appeared that during the period from February 1885 to the close of the account, the defender, as factor, had received upwards of £2600 of rents, but the entries on the credit side of the account shewed that he had paid these rents when received into the truster's private bank account.

On 21st March 1887 the Sheriff-substitute sustained the pursuers' second additional plea in law, and decerned against the defender.

On appeal the Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of date 21st March last: Finds that on a proper statement of accounts there is no balance due to the defender qua factor on the truster's heritable estates, though the truster is largely indebted to him in respect of cash advances; and having regard to this finding, and to the findings in the interlocutor of 11th December 1886, decerns against the defender in terms of the prayer of the petition."[*]

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the defender;—The case of Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard[1] was precisely in point. The right of retention of any article handed over for the purposes of the employment rested simply on contract. The person employed was bound to hand over the article deposited with him when the employer fulfilled his part of the contract, viz., the payment for outlays and salary in executing the same, and no earlier.

Argued for the respondents;—The case of Meikle & Wilson was one where the person claiming to be entitled to retain documents had done work by means of the material which he retained. Papers and documents of this kind were extra commercium, and it was only by the action of the law that even a law-agent could get a lien over them. The law-agent's lien was a creation of the law, and if the lien here claimed was upheld it would place the law-agent in a worse position than anyone else, his right of retention being very limited.[2] A factor could retain goods which he could realise in the market, but papers, title-deeds, &c., were in a different position, and could not be retained even by a law-agent

[*] "NOTE.—The account prefixed to the affidavit, No. 5 of process, and therein described as an account-current between Sir James Dixon Mackenzie and the deponent (defender), as his factor on the estates of Findon and Mountgerald, undoubtedly bears out the defender's statement, that the rents received by him during the period embraced by it were (with few exceptions) paid by him on the day they were received, or within a day or two thereafter, into Sir James' private bank account; but it also shews that he regularly debited himself with them as received, and then took credit for the same sums on the other side as payments to his constituent. What he now proposes to do is to remodel his factorial account by striking these sums out of both sides of it, treating them in effect as if they had been paid directly to Sir James by the tenants. In my opinion he is not entitled so to do. The rents received must stand in the factorial account as against the factorial outlays; and as there was at the date when the payments to Sir James were made a large unsettled and growing balance of factorial outlays due to the defender, these payments must, in my judgment, be regarded as advances of cash made to Sir James by the defender in his private capacity. This view warrants the finding in the above interlocutor, and is in accordance with the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute, whose interlocutor I have, however, thought it necessary formally to recall, as it sustains a plea which is not happily expressed."

in security of cash advances, even where he averred that it was matter of express contract that he should have the power so to retain them.[1]

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question which arises here is not, I think, attended with difficulty. It appears that Mr Ross was factor for Sir James Mackenzie on his Highland estates, and in that capacity he obtained possession of various books and documents for the purpose of his employment. The affairs of Sir James being embarrassed, the pursuers were appointed trustees under a trust-deed for payment of creditors, and they have called on Mr Ross to give up these papers. Mr Ross says that he is ready to restore the documents when his factorial accounts are settled, but that till that is done he is not bound to do so. The question here is, whether the plea is well founded.

The Sheriff has proceeded on a rather special view of the course of dealing pursued by Mr Ross in his factorial duty, apart altogether from the general law of retention. The Sheriff says that the factor had uplifted rents from the tenants, and that if he had applied those rents to the extinction of his claim nothing would now be due to him; but that, instead of doing so, he paid them into the bank account of his principal. He finds, therefore, that this is a claim to retain against a loan of money, which he says—and rightly—is not competent. I do not think that that element enters into the case. The rents were the property of Sir James Mackenzie, and not the property of the factor, and he rightly paid them to the credit of his employer. Whether the factor could have applied them as suggested is a question which does not arise in this case. There is no dispute here that there is a balance due to Mr Ross on his factorial accounts, and we are to decide whether the factor can retain these documents till that balance is paid. This is not a case of hypothec in the true and strict sense of the word, but is a right of retention arising out of mutual obligations under a contract. We had occasion to consider the question in an almost precisely parallel case, viz., Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard (8 R. 69). That was a case where papers had been placed in the hands of an accountant for the purpose of collecting book debts. A similar plea to that stated here was put forward in that case. We were there very clearly of opinion that the accountant's right to retain the papers was not a right of lien, but a right of retention rising out of the conditions of the contract, one of which was, that the accountant was bound to restore the documents when the employment came to an end, but was not bound to do so until the other party fulfilled his part of the contract. That is precisely the case here. The nature of this claim is precisely the same. I may read two sentences from Lord Gifford's opinion in that case, which very clearly set forth my views in the present,—"I agree that this is not a case of lien. It is simply a case of the retention of a subject put into a person's hands for a special purpose, and resolves itself into a case of the relative duties of parties under a contract. The one party to it is bound to perform his part of the contract just as much as the other. The counterpart here of the duty of the one party to do the piece of business is that the other shall pay the price, and I think that until the latter is done, the party employed need not hand over articles which were put into his hands to enable him to fulfil his part of the contract." That view is sufficient for the disposal of this case.

Robertson v. Ross.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The case is, I think, one of lien, a word which expresses a legal right of retention. The pursuers seek to recover the books and papers specified in their petition, which are averred to be in possession of the defender. These books are the property of the pursuers as trustees for Sir James Mackenzie, whose title they have. The question is thus the same in all respects as if Sir James Mackenzie were suing. The pursuers are entitled to recover any property belonging to Sir James from anyone who has not a lawful right to retain it. These books came lawfully into the hands of Mr Ross on a contract between him and Sir James. He holds them under that contract now, and what he desires is, that his debt under the same contract shall be satisfied before the other parties' right is satisfied by his handing over the books. I expressed more than once during the argument my opinion, that every right to retain property belonging to another, whether you call it retention or lien, must stand on paction express or implied. The owner may make any lawful contract he likes respecting his property. He may pledge it on any terms agreed on between him and the other party to the contract. He may pledge anything which is capable of being put into the possession of another. But the law in the absence of an express contract implies a right of retention in a variety of circumstances. The most familiar instance is where property comes into the possession of another than the proprietor under a contract which creates rights hinc inde. The law then implies a right to retain possession until the debts under the contract are paid. The debt, however, must arise out of the contract on which the possession was obtained and is held. That is the explanation of all the ordinary liens. I do not know how else they can be accounted for. The right must proceed from the owner of the property or someone in his right.

It is said that there is something peculiar about books and papers, especially title-deeds,—that they are extra commercium. That is rather a difficult idea to follow. The notion is that there is a special law which entitles admitted law-agents to retain deeds—a right which does not exist in other persons. I think that idea is unfounded. The right to retain books and papers which the law allows to law-agents is just the lien implied under the contract on which they possess them.

The idea that papers are extra commercium would operate very curiously. Suppose a man sends his charter-chest by a carrier, and the carrier proposes to retain the box and its contents till the carriage is paid. The answer is—No, papers are extra commercium; or would the right depend entirely on the fact that the papers were enclosed in a box? It appears to me clear that the carrier would have his lien or right of retention over the papers till his claim was satisfied. The writer's lien is in no way distinguishable from this. I suppose again, if a man deposits his title-deeds with one of those custodiers who advertise now-a-days safe keeping of documents, &c., the ordinary law would apply, and the restoration of the documents would only be ordered when the other part of the contract had been fulfilled. I do not understand the phrase extra commercium as applied to papers. Anything is extra commercium in this sense, which will not sell in the market, and I do not know that papers will not sell in all cases. On the contrary, if they are old and curious they may fetch large sums.

Now, with respect to a factor, I see no reason why the ordinary law should not apply. If a factor goes out of his factorial business, if for instance he becomes a money-lender, the law will not imply a contract entitling him to retain factorial papers in security of lent money. The law-agents' lien there affords an illustration, for it only applies to their ordinary business charges under the contract on which the possession is held. If an express bargain were made that the papers should be retained as security for the loan, the law would give effect to it, but it would not imply such a contract. Why then should the same law not apply to the factor here? He has unsatisfied claims under the contract, and he is asking the law in the absence of express contract to imply his right. We considered that very case in Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard, and decided in the factor's favour on what we considered the rules of common law. If I thought that decision doubtful, I should not hesitate to go back on it and reconsider it, and if I thought it wrong I should not hold we were bound to follow it. But I am of opinion the case was rightly decided according to the true principles applicable to the matter. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff here were both of opinion that the factor had a right of lien for his charges as factor. The Sheriff pronounced judgment to that effect on 11th December, but he went on to say that the factor was not entitled to retain the documents "in security of cash advances made by him to the truster." I agree there with the Sheriff in his view, but then, I think, he goes quite wrong when he says in effect "you might have paid your account out of the rents, but, instead of doing so, you handed over the whole rents without deduction to your constituent, leaving your account unpaid; the effect of this is that your account must be esteemed to be paid, and you are a moneylender to the amount of it." I think that is extravagant, and therefore I dissent from the Sheriff on the one point on which he differs from the Sheriff-substitute.

Nov. 17, 1887.
Robertson v. Ross.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the right of retention here pleaded is lawful, and that the law will imply it in the absence of express contract to the contrary. I am therefore of opinion that the appellant is entitled to prevail.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The case of Meikle & Wilson v. Pollard was cited by the appellant as the authority on which he relied. It is not possible to distinguish that case from the present. I think that I am bound to follow it, and therefore I agree with the judgment which your Lordships are about to pronounce. I think it right, however, to say that, so far as I can judge, the decision in Meikle's case was an entirely new departure. If the law laid down there is sound, we should never have heard of the law-agent's hypothec as an exceptional right. We should never have heard of it at all, for there would have been no necessity for its existence. Being bound, however, by the decision in the case of Meikle, I agree in the judgment now to be pronounced.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn.
M.

In June 1885, John Stephen Stephen, B.M., Edinburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Elgin against Robert Anderson, grocer there, in which he prayed the Court to interdict the defender from entering the sittings in the seat or pew, No. 22, in the area of the parish church of Elgin, and from occupying, using, encroaching, or intruding on the same, or in any other way interfering therewith, so as to prevent the free use and occupation thereof by the pursuer, or others having his authority.

Interim interdict was granted.

The facts of the case, which were not disputed, were as follows:—

By disposition and assignation dated 27th August 1875, Mrs Jane Sutherland or Anderson, Eden House, Elgin, conveyed "all my right and interest in and to the pew numbered 22 of the area of the parish church of Elgin, with the said pew itself, in so far as I have right thereto," to Miss Anne Stephen, residing at Friars House, Elgin, of which she was proprietrix. The pursuer was nephew and heir-at-law to Miss Stephen. Miss Stephen and the pursuer used the seat from the date of the disposition till the raising of the action.

By disposition, dated 8th, and recorded 23d November 1876, Mrs Jane Sutherland or Anderson disponed certain house property in Elgin, of which she was proprietrix, to Robert Anderson, the defender, together with the parts and pertinents thereof.

The pursuer stated;—(Cond. 3) "The defender has, since the death of the said Miss Anne Stephen, without leave of the pursuer, and without any right or title whatever, used and occupied a portion of the sittings in the said seat or pew No. 22, in the area of said church; and the defender refuses to cease said use and occupation, and has thereby encroached upon the use and occupation of the said sittings by the pursuer or others authorised by him, and prevented the pursuer's full and complete occupation thereof."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer as heir-at-law foresaid, having right to the seat in question, is entitled to interdict against the defender as craved.

The defender averred that Friars House was not liable to be assessed for the maintenance or repair of the parish church. He admitted that he had taken possession of the pew, and averred that the pew was conveyed to him under the disposition of November 1876, as an inseparable pertinent of the house property thereby conveyed to him.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer has no title to insist in the action. (2) The pursuer's author not being a heritor liable to be assessed in the maintenance of said church, her alleged right to the seat in question was incapable of descending by inheritance. (3) The said pretended disposition and assignation in favour of Miss Stephen falls to be set aside by way of exception. (4) The pretended disposition and assignation founded on by the pursuer, being illegal and inept, can convey to the pursuer no right to the sitting in question, in respect that the right to same forms a pertinent of the defender's property, and cannot be separated therefrom.

From documents lodged by the parties, it appeared that the parish of Elgin was partly burghal and partly landward. The parish church was rebuilt in 1828, and Lewis Anderson, who was then proprietor of the subjects conveyed to the defender, was assessed in a portion of the cost of the erection of the church effeiring to the rental or value of the property.

In 1825 a rental of the parish had been made up by assessors appointed by the Sheriff, and in that rental the nett rental of the property in question was assessed at £109, 5s. The assessors in their state of rental made this statement:—"The only deduction which we have judged proper to make from the landward part of the parish is the stipend payable to the ministers, and we have considered it our duty to deduct from the rental of the household property of the parish the sum of 5 per cent as an equivalent for repairs on the said household property."

In October 1828 the sittings in the church were divided among the heritors. The procedure and decreet of division bore,—"The Sheriff-substitute stated to the gentlemen assembled, that in consequence of the petition presented to him by the heritors of the parish and their committee, he had, in terms of the prayer of that petition, appointed various intimations to be made preparatory to dividing the area of the new church amongst the persons who had contributed to the building thereof."

It further appeared that the heritors were called to make choice of seats in the church according to their rentals, and that pew No. 22 was chosen by Mr Anderson as part of the number of seats falling to him.

In the division no distinction was made between the heritors in the burghal and those in the landward districts of the parish.

On this state of the facts, on 27th May 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Rampini) pronounced an interlocutor in which, after findings in fact, he found in law,—"That in respect of the infeftment following on the disposition in favour of the defender, he has acquired a heritable right in and to the pew or seat in question, and that he is entitled to occupy and possess the same in preference to the pursuer: Therefore recalls the interim interdict formerly granted: Dismisses the petition."

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—A church seat was not inseparable from the lands in a burghal parish. The Court had recognised that property in church seats was in such parishes intra commercium,[1] and the law allowed within burgh a reallocation of seats among heritors inter se. The defender's contention involved manifest injustice. According to it even when a parishioner's property ceased to be residential his church seat must remain attached to it, and he might have no seat in the church attached to his new residence, though liable to be rated on it for repairs on the church along with all other feuars.[2] Where the allocation proceeded on the principle of valued rent, as it did in landward parishes, it was admitted that the seat was inalienable. The same rule would be applied to the landward part, but not to the burghal part, of landward burghal parishes. Here the real rent was the basis taken, and that varied the right. Where the allocation is according to real rent the assessments are so also, and a person who built on his feu and was liable to be assessed on the increased value was entitled to proportionate sittings. Constant reallocation was impossible, and the only mode of avoiding the injustice and inconvenience was to hold seats allocated on real rent separable. The mode of allocation here followed was, except with consent of all the proprietors in the burgh, illegal.[2] The burgh, it was decided in Stephen v. Anderson.

Downie's case was to be treated as a unum quid, quoad assessment for repairs on the church, and the defenders could not point to any case where in a landward burghal parish the burgh was not so treated as well with regard to allocation as to assessment. The difficulty in this case arose from the fact that an incompetent mode of allocation had been adopted in the burghal part of this parish.

Argued for the defender;—This seat was an inalienable pertinent of the defender's property. The parish had been treated in an exceptional though perfectly competent way, and a character had been impressed on the seats which must remain so long as the church remained. The mode of division put the burghal seats in exactly the same position as if they had been allocated to landward portions of the parish. The division made no distinction between lands in one part of the parish and lands in the other. It was admitted that the general mode of allocating seats in burghs was to treat the magistrates as one heritor.[1] In such cases after the area was divided the seatholders did not hold the seats as a part and pertinent of their property, but the course pursued here was competent. There was no legal necessity to apply to the valued rent for assessment; it was competent to go to the real rent, and that was the proper course where it had been resorted to before.[2] There was no hardship here to the pursuer, as he could only, in any view, be liable to assessment if a new church were built,[3] in which case a reallocation would be made. Where the allocation had been made in the ordinary way among landward heritors, seats were a pertinent of the property.[4] A seat could not be let,[5] and a fortiori it could not be sold. The magistrates of a burgh when treated as the sole heritor could allocate seats among the burgesses, but then they were in a position analogous to a heritor allocating his own seats among his tenants—they were merely trustees for those who sat in the church.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer, in the inferior Court, prays for interdict against the respondent interfering with his possession of a sitting, No. 22, in the parish church of Elgin. The title of the pursuer is a disposition and assignation, dated 22d August 1875, by which Mrs Jane Sutherland or Anderson conveyed that pew and the right of sitting there to his aunt, to whom he was heir-at-law. The defender, on the other hand, maintains that this and several other sittings belong to him as proprietor of certain house property in Elgin, which was conveyed to him by the same lady, as part and pertinent of the estate expressly conveyed, and that, as such, it cannot competently be separated from the property. I am of opinion that the defender is right, and I shall explain my reasons very shortly. The area of the parish church was divided in 1828 on the principle that every proprietor in the parish should have a portion of the area allocated to him and his property separately. The landward part of the parish embraced certain properties of large annual value, while the burgh properties were generally smaller, but all proprietors were dealt with on the same footing. The proceedings in the division establish that very clearly. They began with a rental of the parish, as ascertained in October 1825, being made up, and a specific value was put on every subject both in landward and burghal parts of the parish, distinction being made between the rents of lands and houses. The reason for this is brought out very clearly in a note appended by the assessors to the roll. They say that they submit a state amounting to £15,377, 9s. 6d., which they say is a fair rental of the parish. The note goes on to say,—"The only deduction which we have judged proper to make from the landward part of the parish is the stipend payable to the ministers, and we have considered it our duty to deduct from the rental of the household property of the parish the sum of five per cent as an equivalent for repairs on the said household property." That explains the distinction I alluded to. In every other respect the rental is made up in exactly the same way. Mr Anderson, who was then proprietor of the property here in question, was entered at an annual value of £109, 5s.

[5] Duke of Roxburgh (Heritors of Jedburgh), June 1, 1876, 3 R. 728, see Lord President.

A minute of the Presbytery follows on 11th August 1826. In the proceedings of which that is a minute appearance was made for the heritors, in the ordinary sense of the word, and also for the feuars of the town. The gentleman who appeared for them stated that a contract had been entered into for the erection of a new church, and he produced the rental just referred to. The Presbytery then having considered the contract and the roll "unanimously approved thereof, and appointed the contract to be entered into in terms of said minute, and to be extended in due form quam primum. The Presbytery also did and hereby do decern against the whole heritors, feuars, and other proprietors of the town and parish of Elgin for the foresaid sum of £6286 sterling contained in said minute of agreement, and appoint the said Mr Patrick Duff to apportion the said sum among the several heritors, feuars, and other proprietors according to their several rents as stated in the rent-roll produced and approved of by the Presbytery." Then follows the usual certificate and application to the Court for letters of horning. This brings it out plainly that Mr Anderson was assessed on his property for his proportion of the expense of building the church precisely as if he had been a heritor in a landward parish, and all the other heritors and feuars were assessed in the same way. In short, the imposition of the assessment was made precisely in the same way as if the parish had been entirely landward.

Then followed the division of the area before the Sheriff-substitute. That functionary, at a meeting at which everybody interested was represented, stated to the gentlemen assembled, that in consequence of the petition presented to him by the heritors of the parish and their committee, he had, in terms of the prayer of that petition, appointed various intimations to be made preparatory to dividing the area of the new church amongst the persons who had contributed to the building thereof, and then called upon the heritors in the order of their interests to come forward and choose their family seats. Upon that follows the choice by heritors, including proprietors in the burgh, and the leading heritor, the Earl of Fife, chose his sittings, seventeen in all, and then the others in like manner. Mr Anderson chose the seat No. 22 in the area. The Sheriff then called on the heritors to take their choice of the remaining seats, and accordingly the Earl of Fife began and was followed by the others, amongst them by Anderson, who chose four seats in the gallery. He thus got one seat in the area and four in the gallery, and he had contributed a sum in proportion to the value of his property to the building of the church.

Now this decision was carried out as if there had been no burgh in the parish at all. I have not heard it contended that that is an illegal proceeding. It appears to me perfectly legitimate, and it is a course which is often followed in similar cases. We must, therefore, take it that the division was lawfully made. What, then, is the result with regard to the sittings? I do not think that is doubtful, because, according to Erskine, they are parts and pertinents of the estate in respect of which the allocation is made. They are also inseparable parts of the estate, for the obvious reason that if they could be sold to a stranger the consequence would be that the inhabitants of the property would be deprived of their right of occupying seats in the parish church. It does not matter what the extent of the property may be. The people who are to sit in the Earl of Fife's sittings are much more numerous, no doubt, than those who are to sit in right of Mr Anderson, but the principle is the same. Proprietors both large and small hold sittings, not absolutely in property, but in trust for themselves and the persons on their estates, and therefore it is that sittings cannot be disjoined from the properties, because if they were it would be a breach of trust on the part of the proprietors. I am very clearly, therefore, of opinion that this seat was an inseparable pertinent of the property to which it was attached at the time the church was divided.

No doubt there is another way in which a church may be divided in such a case as the present, viz., by treating the magistrates of the burgh as one heritor representing the interests of the whole inhabitants. When the area is so divided obviously the right or interest acquired by any one inhabitant is of a very different kind to what we have here. In that case no individual property has any sittings attached to it, and therefore the same rules cannot apply. The only party in the burgh to whom sittings are allocated is the corporation, and they may use their discretion, having received an adequate share, in subdividing the sittings among the inhabitants. There a different rule must be applied. That is one perfectly legitimate way of dividing the church, and the way adopted here is the other legitimate way. It seems to me, therefore, that the disposition and assignation on which the pursuer relies is good for nothing, because it would have the effect of separating an inseparable part and pertinent from the property to which it belongs. On the other hand, the defender here, as the disponee infeft of Mr Anderson, possesses this sitting No. 22 as part and pertinent of his estate. I have, therefore, come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff, though I cannot adopt his grounds of judgment.

LORD MURE.—We have had a full reference to all the authorities applicable to this case, and I quite concur in the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived. If the question had arisen with regard to a purely landward parish, there could be little doubt that the defender was entitled to undisputed possession of this sitting in the church. It is settled in such cases that the sitting could not be separated from the property to which it was allocated. It passes as a pertinent of the property without any express grant. No doubt there are special cases in partly landward and partly burghal parishes where the magistrates of the burgh, under a particular arrangement, are owners of a part of the area of the church for the benefit of the town, and in such cases different rules may be applicable; but under the circumstances in which this seat was allocated to Anderson the division was made according to the rules applicable to purely landward parishes, and every heritor has his seat specially allocated to him. The seat is attached to the property, and the property carries the seat with it.

Lord Adam.—The solution of this question is to be found in what Mr Balfour said, that a right to a seat in a parish church is a pertinent of the property in land to which it is allocated, and that it cannot be separated from the land. I understand that that is the law with regard to landward parishes, in fact it was not disputed that that was the law until late in the argument advanced by the Dean of Faculty.

Here, though the parish is partly burghal, the whole was treated in the allocation as if it was purely landward. The seats were allocated in respect of the land held by the heritors, and such a course was perfectly legitimate. I think, therefore, that the same rules must be applied as if the parish had been altogether landward. It was argued by the Dean that the principle of non-alienation does not apply, even in landward parishes, where the assessment is put on real rent. There is no authority for that proposition that I know of. Though such a result might be desirable it could not be reached by the Court, and would require legislation. I therefore concur in the judgment proposed. I am authorised to state that Lord Shand concurs in the judgment.

Lord Shand was absent at the advising.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Mrs Jane Alston, matron of the Cowglen Fever Hospital, Pollokshaws, raised an action of damages for alleged slander against James Macdougall, a member of the Parochial Board and Local Authority of the parish of Eastwood and of the management and sanitary committees of those bodies, by which committees the Cowglen Fever Hospital was managed.

The slander was alleged to have been uttered at a meeting of the parochial board and local authority on 3d January 1887.

The summons was signeted on 3d March, and was served by registered letter, in terms of sec. 3 of the Citation Amendment Act, 1882.* The letter was registered between 5 and 6 P.M. on 3d March, and could not reach the defender on that day.

In these circumstances the defender pleaded (2) that the action was excluded in respect that it had not been commenced within two months after the cause of action had arisen, as required under sec. 118 of the Public Health Act, 1867.*

On 15th June 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) sustained that plea, and dismissed the action, with a finding as to expenses.†

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The action was commenced within two months of the cause of action having arisen. The commencement of an action was the signeting.[1] At all events the summons was executed within the statutory two months. It was posted is to be served, or to his last known address, if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation, ... a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons or petition or other document required by law, in the particular case, to be served with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, or containing such other citation or notice as may be required in the circumstances, and such posting shall constitute a legal and valid citation, unless the person cited shall prove that such letter was not left or tendered at his known residence or place of business, or at his last known address if it continues to be his legal domicile or proper place of citation."

* Sec. 118 enacts,—"The local authority and the board shall not be liable in damages for any irregularity committed by their officers in the execution of this Act, or for anything done by themselves in the bona fide execution of this Act, and every officer acting in the bona fide execution of this Act shall be indemnified by the local authority under which he acts in respect of all costs, liabilities, and charges to which he may be subjected, and every action or prosecution against any person acting under this Act on account of any wrong done in or by any action, proceeding, or operation under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen."

† "OPINION.— . . . But the second plea in law for the defender, which is, that 'the present action should be dismissed, in respect that it is excluded by section 118 of the Act 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101,' must be sustained. This section provides that 'the local authority and the board shall not be liable in damages for any irregularity committed by their officers in the execution of this Act, or for anything done by themselves in the bona fide execution of this Act; and every officer acting in the bona fide execution of this Act shall be indemnified by the local authority under which he acts, in respect of all costs, liabilities, and charges to which he may be subjected; and every action or prosecution against any person acting under this Act, on account of any wrong done in or by any action, proceeding, or operation under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen.' Now, has the present action been commenced within two months after the cause of action has arisen? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it has not. The cause of action originated on the 3d of January 1887 by the speech of the defender at the meeting of the local authority. The summons in this action was signeted on the 3d of March 1887. It was not served by a messenger-at-arms, the pursuer contenting herself with the more easy and economical, but, at the same time, perfectly competent, way of serving the summons by a registered letter. This letter was registered between the hours of five and six P.M. on the 3d of March, the last day of the two months. Now, it could not reach the defender on the same day, and it was for that kind of case that subsection 2 of section 4 of the Act 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 77, was enacted, which says that 'the induciæ or period of notice shall be reckoned from twenty-four hours after the time of posting.' Therefore the time of notice must be reckoned in the present case from the 4th of March 1887, and consequently more than two months elapsed before the commencement of the present action, and therefore it must be dismissed."

on the last day of the period, and even though it did not reach the defender till next day that was sufficient. Further, the words of the statute were quite unambiguous—the act of posting constituted a valid citation, and it could not be doubted that an action had been commenced when it had reached that stage. Subsection 2 of section 4 of the Act, which was quoted by the Lord Ordinary, merely gave a longer induciæ in the case of a summons served by post, because of the longer time a summons so served took to reach a defender.[1]

Argued for the defender;—To hold that signeting constituted the commencement of an action would defeat the limitation, because a summons might be signeted on the last day of the two months, and then be kept without further steps being taken in it for a year and day. With regard to the execution, the summons was dated on the day on which it was signeted, and the execution would bear to be of the same date, but under subsec. 2 of sec. 4 of the Act it only came into force "twenty-four hours after the time of posting."

Lord President.—Two points are decided in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The action is said by the pursuer to have been commenced within two months after the cause of action had arisen, because the summons was signeted within that time. The Lord Ordinary held that signeting is not the commencement of an action, and in that decision I entirely concur. It runs through all the cases that the word "commencement," used as it is here, means the time at which the defender was cited, and, therefore, it is impossible to sustain the plea that signeting is the commencement of an action.

But there is another question raised, and that refers to execution. The question is whether the summons was not executed within two months of the cause of action having arisen. The cause of action arose on 3d January; was the summons executed within two months of that time? What took place is sufficiently proved by the warrant of execution. A letter containing the summons and other particulars required by the statute was posted on 3d March. Now, the 3d section of the Citation Amendment Act, 1882, enacts that any summons may be executed by an officer of Court as under the old law, "or by an enrolled law-agent, by sending to the known residence or place of business of the person upon whom summons, warrant, or judicial intimation is to be served . . . . a registered letter by post containing the copy of the summons . . . . with the proper citation or notice subjoined thereto, or containing such other citation or notice as may be required in the circumstances, and such posting shall constitute a legal and valid citation." It appears to me that these words of the statute are not ambiguous; they distinctly provide that the posting of a letter shall constitute legal and valid citation. Giving, then, fair effect to the words, I cannot resist the conclusion that citation on 3d March was valid citation of the defender. The word "posting" is not ambiguous, for as soon as a letter is put into the post-office it is in the keeping of the postmaster-general, and is beyond reach of recall. This construction is supported by the terms of schedule 1 of the Act, which gives a form of execution, "executed . . . by posting on last . . . at the post-office of . . . with citation subjoined." The only answer to that view (and it satisfied the Lord Ordinary) is founded on section 4, subsection 2, of the Act. "The induciæ or period of notice shall be reckoned from twenty-four hours after the time of posting." The Lord

Ordinary seems to think that that is inconsistent with the notion that posting constitutes legal and valid citation. It seems to me that there is no inconsistency, and that the two sections are in complete harmony. I see the reason easily enough for giving longer induciæ to a defender when citation is by letter, because of the time which must elapse between the posting and the receipt of the letter. I therefore think the defender here was well cited.

Succession—Legacy—Direction to trustees to pay on event happening which did not take place.—By codicil to his will a testator left a legacy of £500, "which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacies mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over." The legacies in clause D were contingent on the testator surviving his mother, an event which did not occur. Held that the terms in which the direction was expressed did not import a condition into the legacy, and that the legatee was therefore entitled to payment.

HENRY COWE, Glasgow, died on 30th March 1881, leaving a holograph deed of settlement, dated 10th December 1879, and two codicils, dated respectively 7th January and 8th September 1880. Mr J. L. Grant, Aberdeen, and two others were executors under the deed.

The will was divided into four parts, headed A, B, C, and D. By clause A a liferent of his whole property was left to his mother.

By clause B, which was subsequently recalled, certain special legacies were bequeathed.

By clause C, which commenced with these words, "Should I, Henry Cowe, die before my mother, Hannah Watson, my property which she has had the liferent of is, after her death, is to be governed and divided as follows," the liferent of his property was to go to his sister in the event of her surviving him and his mother, and there were directions as to the disposal of the fee after her death.

Clause D was only to take effect in the case of the testator surviving his mother. There were under this head various bequests of money, &c.

By the codicil of 8th September 1880 the following bequest was left:—"In addition to any legacy mentioned in this will by which he may be left any property, of whatsoever kind, to Peter Cowe or his next of kind (as designated in a previous clause of this codicil), I leave the sum of five hundred pounds stg. (£500), which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacys mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over."

The testator was survived by his mother, who enjoyed the liferent of the property till her death in 1886.

The legacies and provisions contained in clause D of the will having thus lapsed, a question arose whether the legacy bequeathed to Peter Cowe in the codicil was payable, or whether it fell along with the provisions of clause D.

Macdougall.

Ordinary seems to think that that is inconsistent with the notion that posting constitutes legal and valid citation. It seems to me that there is no inconsistency, and that the two sections are in complete harmony. I see the reason easily enough for giving longer induciæ to a defender when citation is by letter, because of the time which must elapse between the posting and the receipt of the letter. I therefore think the defender here was well cited.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, in so far as it sustained the defender's second plea in law and dismissed the action, and remitted to him to proceed.

JOHN L. GRANT AND OTHERS (Cowe's Executors), First Parties.—Goudy.
PETER COWE, Second Party.—G. W. Burnet.

Succession—Legacy—Direction to trustees to pay on event happening which did not take place.—By codicil to his will a testator left a legacy of £500, "which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacies mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over." The legacies in clause D were contingent on the testator surviving his mother, an event which did not occur. Held that the terms in which the direction was expressed did not import a condition into the legacy, and that the legatee was therefore entitled to payment.

B.

HENRY COWE, Glasgow, died on 30th March 1881, leaving a holograph deed of settlement, dated 10th December 1879, and two codicils, dated respectively 7th January and 8th September 1880. Mr J. L. Grant, Aberdeen, and two others were executors under the deed.

The will was divided into four parts, headed A, B, C, and D. By clause A a liferent of his whole property was left to his mother.

By clause B, which was subsequently recalled, certain special legacies were bequeathed.

By clause C, which commenced with these words, "Should I, Henry Cowe, die before my mother, Hannah Watson, my property which she has had the liferent of is, after her death, is to be governed and divided as follows," the liferent of his property was to go to his sister in the event of her surviving him and his mother, and there were directions as to the disposal of the fee after her death.

Clause D was only to take effect in the case of the testator surviving his mother. There were under this head various bequests of money, &c.

By the codicil of 8th September 1880 the following bequest was left:—"In addition to any legacy mentioned in this will by which he may be left any property, of whatsoever kind, to Peter Cowe or his next of kind (as designated in a previous clause of this codicil), I leave the sum of five hundred pounds stg. (£500), which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacys mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over."

The testator was survived by his mother, who enjoyed the liferent of the property till her death in 1886.

The legacies and provisions contained in clause D of the will having thus lapsed, a question arose whether the legacy bequeathed to Peter Cowe in the codicil was payable, or whether it fell along with the provisions of clause D.

Grant v. Cowe.

A special case was therefore submitted to the Court, to which the executors of Henry Cowe were the first parties and Peter Cowe the second party.

The following question was submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"Are the parties of the first part bound to make payment of said legacy of £500 as a valid and subsisting legacy?"

Lord President.—This singular settlement is divided into four parts, distinguished by the letters A, B, C, and D. The part A conveys the testator's whole property, "whether real, fictitious, moveable, heritable, or personal," in liferent to his mother. That provision has never been recalled. The provisions of part B are all recalled, and therefore the will consists of part A and of parts C and D, which are said to constitute alternative wills—one to receive effect if the mother survived the testator, the other if she predeceased him. She did survive her son, and therefore D does not receive effect. Part C is therefore the only part of the will, which in the circumstances which have arisen falls to have effect given to it. There is, however, a codicil, the last bequest of which is thus expressed,—"In addition to any legacy mentioned in this will by which he may be left any property, of whatsoever kind, to Peter Cowe or his next of kind (as designated in a previous clause of this codicil), I leave the sum of five hundred pounds stg. (£500), which is to be handed over along with or at such time as legacys mentioned in clause D of this will are paid or handed over."

Taken by themselves, these words present no difficulty, but the legacies "in clause D of this will" can never be handed over, because they are only to be given if the testator survived his mother. What, then, is the effect of the words? I cannot spell out any condition as being attached to the bequest of £500; the words seem to me to be merely in the form of a direction to trustees to pay the bequest along with or at such time as those given in part D. If we look at the words as merely importing such a direction to the trustees, I do not think that the mere impossibility of carrying out the direction operates as a destruction of the bequest. Speaking generally, I cannot think that where there is a direction as to the time of payment and a difficulty arises as to the direction being carried out, that is subversive of the bequest, if it is made in clear terms. Therefore in whatever way you construe the words "hand over," I do not think they can destroy the bequest.

Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Adam.—The words of gift here are clear, and I do not think that any condition is imposed on it. The latter part of the clause is nothing but a direction to the trustees, and I do not think that any direction, however difficult it may be to carry it out, will operate to destroy a clearly expressed bequest. I therefore think that the period of payment was the date of the mother's death.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court answered the question in the affirmative.

Salmon-fishings—Division of, where ex adverso of adjoining properties—Property—Marches.—In a question as to the boundary between salmon-fishings ex adverso of two seaboard properties, circumstances in which it was held that a stream which at low water divided the foreshores of the properties unequally did not constitute a natural boundary between the salmon-fishings so as to displace the ordinary legal rule of division applicable to such cases in the absence of prescriptive possession.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
B.

BY crown-charters, dated in 1612 and 1671, the burgh of Tain was in right of certain subjects therein described, bounded on the north-west by the Dornoch Firth, on the north-east by the open sea, and on the south-east at low water by the Fendom Burn or Inver Channel, which at high water formed an estuary called Inver Bay, with the salmon-fishings ex adverso of these subjects.

Captain W. H. E. Murray of Geanies was infeft in certain subjects, called the lands of Arboll, and others, with the salmon-fishings ex adverso thereof, lying to the south-east of the above-described lands belonging to the burgh of Tain, and separated from them by the Fendom Burn or Inver Channel or Bay.

On the western side of the Fendom Burn or Inver Channel were the lands of Morrichmore, which were commonty lands belonging, inter alios, to the burgh of Tain, Captain Murray, and Mr MacLeod of Cadboll. The foreshore of the Morrichmore extended several miles in length, with an average breadth of about a mile from high to low-water mark on the north-west side. The lands of Morrichmore were not contiguous to any of the lands belonging to the burgh of Tain in the vicinity.

The burgh of Tain having claimed right to the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the Morrichmore, and alleging that the exercise of this right was being interfered with by Captain Murray or his tenant, brought this action of declarator against Captain Murray and his tenant to have the boundaries of the fishings defined. They asked to have it found that "the legal boundary or march between the salmon-fishings belonging to the pursuers in the estuary or sea adjacent to All and Whole the lands of Morrichmore, in the county of Ross, also belonging to the pursuers, on the one part, and the salmon-fishings belonging to or claimed by the defender in the estuary or sea adjacent to All and Whole the lands of Arboll, or part thereof, also belonging to or claimed by the defender, on the other part, is the medium filum of the Fendom Burn and Inver Channel at low water, as delineated with a red line laid down on the copy Ordnance map produced herewith, or such other line as shall be found to be the legal boundary or march between the said respective salmon-fishings in the course of the proceedings to follow hereon."

It was admitted that neither party had any grant of the foreshore, and that there was no possession which could be appealed to by either party as instructing their rights.

The pursuers averred, inter alia,—(Cond. 7) "The Fendom Burn is a large stream formed by the confluence of a considerable number of burns. In ordinary spring tides the sea runs up it for 3¼ miles above the western march of the defender's lands (the march nearest to the Morrichmore). At low water the channel of the Fendom Burn at the said march is 246 feet in width, and too deep to be forded. In order to cross from the defender's lands to the Morrichmore at low water, it is necessary to take a boat out by sea, or, passing entirely off defender's lands on to those of others, to proceed up the stream to a ford situated at fully half a mile's distance from the nearest march of defender's lands, and to travel back from that ford upwards of a mile on the lands of Morrichmore or the foreshore in order to reach the fishing-ground and the nets. This ford is available only at low water, the depth at high water being from 8 to 10 feet, according to the state of the tides. At no state of the tide is it possible to pass by land or ford from the defender's lands to the Morrichmore or the Whiteness Sands, except by passing through the lands of other proprietors; and when the ford above mentioned is not available, on account of the state of the tide, this involves a detour of several miles. The statement in answer with reference to the character of the Fendom Burn and the Inver Channel, and the ascent of fish, is denied. Explained that only at the sand bar at the mouth of the channel are the sands ever shifted by the action of storms, and that taken one year with another they resume the normal position shewn on the Ordnance map."

The defender answered,—" Admitted that in ordinary spring tides the sea runs up the said channel for 3½ miles beyond the western march of the defender's lands opposite to the Morrichmore, Mr Robert Bruce Æneas MacLeod of Cadboll being the proprietor of a portion of the conterminous lands of Inver. Denied that the Fendom Burn is properly speaking a fresh-water stream at all, but explained that it is a water-course by which the superfluous water from the Morrichmore and the adjoining lands drains in ordinary weather into the head of the Inver Channel or Bay, and that in drought it is totally dry. Under no conditions is it practicable for the ascent of fish of the salmon kind, nor have they ever been found there. The said Inver Channel is therefore merely an indentation of the coast (a large part of it being on the foreshore ex adverso of the defender's lands), in which the water is entirely salt at all states of the tide. The retention of water in the said channel being assisted by a sand bar at the mouth thereof, and the bed of the bay being composed of soft sand, the course of the channel at low water is constantly changing. After very high tides the channel has been noticed to alter its course by several hundred yards, and its configuration now is entirely different from what it was when the plan produced by the pursuers was made by the Ordnance Survey in 1872." The defender further stated that he was willing to accept a line laid down on a plan produced by him as the western boundary of his right of exclusive salmon-fishing ex adverso of his lands of Arboll, as distinguished from that ex adverso of the lands of Morrichmore, reserving to himself right to vindicate his share of the fishings ex adverso of the commonty at any time thereafter. This line was in the direction of a perpendicular drawn at right angles to the straight line of coast.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) All parties not called. (4) Upon a sound construction of the defender's titles, and the possession that has followed thereon, he is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (5) The line of march contended for by the defender being the true and lawful line of march of the defender's exclusive right of salmon-fishing, decree ought to be pronounced accordingly.

Subsequently, in order to meet the defender's second plea, a supplementary action was brought against the Lord Advocate as representing the Crown, and Mr MacLeod of Cadboll, for any interest they might have as common proprietors of the lands of Morrichmore, or of the salmon-fishings ex adverso thereof, but neither of them appeared to defend.

Thereafter, on 20th July 1886, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) remitted to Mr George Miller Cunningham, C.E., " to consider the statements of parties on record with the plans produced, and to inspect the locality; and having met with and heard the parties or their agents, to report upon the pursuers' statements contained in the seventh article of the condescendence, and the defender's counter statements in answer thereto, with special reference to the boundary lines claimed by the respective parties, and to lay down on a copy of the Ordnance Survey map such line or lines, on any principle tending to elucidate or illustrate the question in dispute, which may be suggested by either party, or which the reporter may deem proper; and directs the reporter to accompany his plan with such explanations as he may think necessary or useful."

* The report bore,—" . . . I beg to report with particular reference to the pursuers' statements contained in the seventh article of the condescendence and the defenders' counter statements in answer thereto in the first of the conjoined actions, that the defender's lands of Arboll lie to the south-east of the pursuers' lands of Morrichmore, and are separated therefrom at high water by Inver Bay, and at low water by the channel of that bay.

"The Fendom Burn is a very small stream running into the head of Inver Bay, the head of bay being about a mile and a-half from the western march of the defender's lands. A short distance further up at South Pitnellies the burn is little else than a mere ditch; it does not appear to the reporter to be in any sense of the word a salmon river.

"The Fendom Burn from its source to where it enters the bay is about four miles in length following the sinuosities of the stream, and of this length it is tidal for about a mile and a-half.

"At low water the width of Inver Channel opposite the western march of the defender's lands is about 246 feet, but whether it can be forded depends on the state of the tide. On the 18th of August last the depth of water in the channel opposite the defender's march was at low water two feet six inches.

"I have prepared a plan extending from the village of Inver to where Inver Bay joins the Dornoch Firth, shewing the position of the channel on the 18th of August last, and the depth of water at various points along it, marked in feet and inches as it was at low water on that day.

"It will be seen that at the bar, or where it joins the Dornoch Firth, the water was just six inches deep, and for a distance of 400 yards up the channel it did not exceed at any place one foot in depth. Further up it got deeper, varying from one to eight and nine feet. I may mention that the tide on 18th August was said to be an exceptionally low one, and the depth of water at low water of spring-tides may therefore sometimes be a foot or so more than marked.

"The range of the tide on the above date was eleven feet five inches. By the Admiralty chart the range of ordinary spring tides is eleven feet.

"The depth of water at the bar is at low water almost the same as at the village of Inver, and the practicability of fording the channel at either place depends entirely on the state of the tide. When Inver Bay cannot be forded at any point, no doubt a long detour would be necessary to get from the lands of the defender to those of the pursuers, unless by using a boat to cross Inver Bay.

"At the request of the pursuers I have marked on the Ordnance map in blue and lettered A B the ford referred to by them as 'a ford situated at fully half a mile's distance from the nearest march of defender's lands.'

"No doubt this ford would be generally used by anyone coming down the road leading directly to it from the main road on the south; it is, of course, only available at or about low water. But the channel can be forded equally well at other points between that and the Dornoch Firth, and the reporter himself forded it in a cart on 7th August last at two places below the village of Inver.

"I have at the request of parties laid down in blue on the Ordnance six-inch map the course of the Inver Channel as on the 18th of August last. It will be seen that it has changed very considerably since the date of the Ordnance

Magistrates of Tain v. Murray.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 10th June 1887, pronounced an interlocutor, finding and declaring "that the legal boundary or march between the salmon-fishings belonging to the pursuers in the sea adjacent to the lands of Morrichmore, in the county of Ross, on the one part, and the salmon-fishings belonging to the defender in the sea adjacent to the lands of Arboll, on the other part, is in a line laid down by Mr George Miller Cunningham, C.E., marked A B, and coloured red on a copy of the Ordnance Survey map, signed by the said George Miller Cunningham, and dated 17th December 1886, and 17th May 1887, and decerns." *

Survey in 1872; but there is nothing remarkable in that, as the whole bay being of sand the action of wind and tide must bring about frequent changes.

"I was asked by the pursuers to define 'the medium filum of the channel of the Fendom Burn and Inver Bay at low water.' I have accordingly drawn a dotted blue line down the centre of the Inver Channel as it was on 18th August last. I do not consider that channel to be the Fendom Burn, because in my opinion the Fendom Burn terminates where it enters Inver Bay, about a mile and a quarter above the village of Inver. . . .

"I have also laid down on the Ordnance map a dotted red line, indicating what I think very fairly represents the general outline of the coast along a considerable portion of the Dornoch Firth at the place in question. I find that the line so laid down is a segment of a circle having a radius of two and a-half miles, and I have drawn from the centre of that circle a strong red line to the west boundary of the lands of Arboll, and therefore a line at right angles to the direction of the circumference of the circle at that point; and if I am right in the conclusion which I have formed regarding the matters dealt with in this report, I would respectfully submit that the line so drawn should form the western boundary of the fishings of Arboll.

"With reference to this last paragraph, the agents for the pursuers write to me, of date 22d ult.:—'We do not, in the meantime, criticise the principle you propose to adopt in drawing the boundary line between the respective fishings of the parties, that being a matter of law which the Court will require to decide. But on the assumption that your principle is the correct one, we beg to point out to you a fact which appears to us to affect materially the general outline of the coast. The pieces of ground named on the Ordnance map Innis More and Innis Bheag, together with the intermediate ground, are part of the Morrichmore, and not part of the foreshore merely. It is only in very exceptionally high tides, such as may not occur in any one year, that these pieces of ground are covered with water, and when this does occur the Morrichmore is flooded also. We request you to be so good as inquire and report as to this, and, whatever conclusion you may arrive at, to lay down on the Ordnance map such a line as, on your principle, will be in accordance with the fact, or assumed fact.'

"Whether the pieces of ground or foreshore marked on the Ordnance map Innis More and Innis Bheag, together with the intermediate ground, form parts of the lands of Morrichmore, belonging to the pursuers, is not for me to determine. Innis More and Innis Bheag are pure sandbanks, surrounded by water at high water of all ordinary spring tides, and covered with water at exceptionally high tides; the 'intermediate ground' referred to is unquestionably foreshore. The principle I have adopted cannot apply where I am asked to include what, in the most favourable view for the pursuers, can only be considered as two islands and a very large amount of foreshore, and I am therefore unable to draw the line required."

Subsequently, on 17th May 1887, a second remit having been made to him, Mr Cunningham lodged another report bearing that Innis More and Innis Bheag, referred to in the letter of the pursuers' agents quoted above, were completely surrounded by water, even at the lowest tide.

* "OPINION.— . . . The pursuers' contention that the medium filum of the Fendom Burn and Inver Channel should be adopted as the boundary line proceeded upon the averment that the Fendom Burn and Inver Channel (at all times

Magistrates of Tain v. Murray.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had gone wrong in fixing a boundary other than the natural boundary. The principle introduced by Mr Cunningham was a novelty. He admitted that he had not taken the average straight line of coast. The question was from what point was the sea line to start, and the answer to that question depended on the matter of fact, what was foreshore and what was not. The shore on the west side of the burn being connected with the lands of Morrichmore by permanent physical connection, it was all foreshore. The right of salmon-fishing was an accessory right to be exercised at various stages of the tide, from the highest to the lowest, and it was only when the tide was out that one could tell what was foreshore. When the tide was out, there was a distinct physical feature separating the defender's fishings from those of the pursuers. The Fendom Burn and Inver Channel were sufficiently marked and sufficiently permanent to make a satisfactory boundary. One result of the Lord Ordinary's judgment was that the defender was thereby found entitled to overleap the natural boundary of river and sea, and to have a right of fishing in places which he could reach only by passing through the property of others. It did not affect the pursuers' case that there were no salmon in the burn. The previous cases[1] did not apply, as no question of the physical separation of the lands had been raised in any of them.

The respondent argued;—The boundaries of salmon-fishings ran from high-water mark, and in any case the boundary proposed by the pur-practically the same in line and direction) afforded a natural boundary between the properties of the parties respectively, and should therefore be accepted where it reaches the sea as the point from which the boundary line of their respective fishings should be drawn seaward. The ascertained facts, however, do not coincide with the pursuers' statements.

"From the report of Mr Cunningham it appears that the Fendom Burn is not at all of the character alleged by the pursuers; that it terminates where it flows into the Inver Channel at a considerable distance from the sea, and does not there form any boundary between the properties of the parties; while the Inver Channel cannot be regarded as a boundary at all, its character and line being subject to great and frequent changes through the effects of sea and wind.

"There being, therefore, no natural boundary which can be appealed to in aid of the solution of the present question, and no possession on the part of the pursuers proved or offered to be proved which could throw light upon the rights of parties, it appeared to me that the only-mode which could be adopted to fix the boundary line which the pursuers desire to have fixed was that which was followed in M'Taggart v. Macdouall (5 Macph. 534). I called the reporter's attention to that case, and desired him to lay down a boundary line between the fishings of the parties on the principle there adopted and since approved (Keith v. Smyth, 12 R. 66). Mr Cunningham did not find it possible to follow exactly the mode adopted in M'Taggart's case, on account of the difficulty (arising from the natural contour of the coast line) in obtaining any straight line which would represent the average line of coast. But he suggests a line of boundary which appears to be as favourable for the pursuers as any they could get, unless it were a perpendicular line dropped seaward from the mouth of the Inver Channel. This line (from the mouth of Inver Channel) is, in my view, for several reasons, a line to which the pursuers are not entitled. I adopt, therefore, the line suggested by Mr Cunningham, and find that to be the boundary between the fishings of the parties."

suers was a most fluctuating one, the Fendom Burn being a mere ditch for some distance above where it entered the sea. The principle of M'Taggart's and the other cases[1] fell to be followed. It might be true that the reporter had not exactly followed these, as he had not adopted an average straight line of coast from which to drop his perpendicular, but he explained that that was not practicable. The fact that he had taken that course was rather against the defender's interest, but the latter was content that it should be as the reporter had fixed it.

Lord President.—The pursuers and the defender who has the only substantial interest in the question at issue—viz., Captain Murray of Geanies—are the owners of certain lands on the south shore of the Dornoch Firth, and have also each of them a grant of salmon-fishing in connection with their lands,—these fishings being expressed in the grant to be ex adverso of the lands possessed by each. There is no boundary of any kind to be found in the titles as between the fishings belonging to each party, and there is no possession which can be appealed to as defining and fixing the boundary. Accordingly, the point which we have now to determine is whether the line which is claimed by the pursuers in their summons as the boundary between their fishings and the defender's is consistent with the right of each party to the fishings ex adverso of their lands.

The pursuers' claim is that the legal boundary or march between their fishings and those of the defender is "the medium filum of the Fendom Burn and Inver Channel at low water as delineated with a red line laid down on the copy Ordnance map," produced with the summons. The circumstances of the case have been very sufficiently brought out by the reporter to whom a remit was made by the Lord Ordinary, and they are very few in number. The Fendom Burn runs into what is called Inver Bay, which is an indentation on the southern shore of the Dornoch Firth, but which appears to be almost entirely dry at low water, and we are informed by the reporter that it is "a very small stream running into the head of Inver Bay, the head of bay being about a mile and a-half from the western march of the defender's lands." "A short distance further up," the reporter adds, "the burn is little else than a mere ditch." It also appears that before this burn enters the head of Inver Bay, it does not form the boundary between the lands of the pursuers and the defender, because the lands of the defender do not extend up that length. Between his lands and those of the pursuers there intervene certain lands belonging to Mr MacLeod of Cadboll, and accordingly until the burn reaches Inver Bay it is in no sense the boundary between the lands of the two parties. But it is said that after it does reach the bay either it or the Channel of the Bay,—by whichever name we call it,—forms the boundary between the salmon-fishings of the two parties. It is necessary to see what would be the effect of a decerniture in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons. It would certainly have this effect, that it would cut off from the defender's salmon-fishings a very considerable portion of the foreshore which according to the ordinary meaning of language lies ex adverso of his lands. The ordinary run of the bed of the Fendom Burn is from south to north. It runs from south to north until it reaches the Dornoch Firth, but in the course of its passage through Inver Bay where at all states of the tide the fresh water of the stream is largely mixed with salt, the channel takes sudden turns, and at one place it bends sharply east, and interposes itself between the lands of the defender and the water of the Dornoch Firth. It is said by the pursuers that that natural boundary must be fixed as the boundary between the fishings of the two parties although the result is to cut off from the defender's fishings a large portion of fishing ground which naturally belongs to him,—and which would undoubtedly be his otherwise. That is a very startling result.

[1] Supra, p. 87.

But when we come to consider what sort of a boundary the pursuers seek to establish, we find it is a boundary which is not likely to be permanent. Since the Ordnance Survey map was prepared in 1872 we know that it has proved to be of a quite shifty nature. Tide and wind and other circumstances may change it at any time, so that the water may find its way by a straight course to the sea instead of by the present line. So that instead of this suggested boundary being a natural one, it is one of a very uncertain character. I am, therefore, of opinion with the Lord Ordinary and the reporter that it is not a boundary which can be adopted. I think we ought to adopt the ordinary course, and fix the boundary on the same principle as in the cases of M'Taggart v. Macdouall and others.

The reporter has not precisely followed the rule of M'Taggart's case, because he has not laid down a straight line defining the average line of coast. The line he has laid down is a segment of a circle, and from the centre of the segment he has projected a perpendicular to the west boundary of the defender's lands. If the pursuers had had any interest to challenge that result, I should have been inclined to remit the matter back to the reporter to lay down a line in accordance with the rule of M'Taggart's case. But the pursuers have no such interest. Their interest is to have the line fixed a great deal further east, and if they fail to obtain that, the line which the reporter has adopted is more favourable to them, and less so to the defender, than a line in accordance with the recognised rule of the cases to which I have referred. The defender does not press this point,—and it does not appear to be very material to him to do so. The important point is that there is nothing in the so-called artificial boundary which the reporter has adopted to interfere with the general rule of law which must be followed where there is no boundary in the title, and no possession to interpret the boundary. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Mure.—I concur. I think that the Lord Ordinary and the reporter have done right in rejecting the boundary which the pursuers ask should be laid down between their fishings and those of the defender; and I agree with them in the opinion that upon the facts as disclosed there is no natural boundary which can with justice to the interests of all parties be taken as the line separating the one fishing from the other. It is clear from Mr Cunningham's report that the stream in question is a very small one, and that its channel is of a very shifting nature after it becomes mixed with the salt water of Inver Bay. It forms in no sense a permanently fixed boundary. That being so, I agree with your Lordship that in such circumstances an artificial line fixed in conformity with the rule which was established in the case of M'Taggart v. Macdouall should be taken as the boundary when that can be done. It is true that the reporter has not exactly followed that rule, but as in the circumstances explained by your Lordship the pursuers have no interest to insist upon that, and the defender does not press it, I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Adam.—Both parties in this case hold a grant of lands with the salmon-fishings ex adverso of these lands. The lands in question are situated on the shore of the Dornoch Firth; they are at no part contiguous to one another, at least upon dry land,—the inlet of Inver Bay intervening between the left boundary of the one subject and the right boundary of the other. Prima facie, where neighbouring proprietors have rights of salmon-fishing ex adverso of their lands, the proper mode of defining these rights is by drawing a line seawards perpendicularly to the straight line of shore on the property of each, and it is not disputed that that rule is to be given effect to in this case as regards the foreshore on the left bank of this channel. It is further not disputed that if there is no natural boundary the foreshore claimed by the pursuers is ex adverso of the defender's lands, and if that be so it cannot be ex adverso of the pursuers' lands also. It is clear that it cannot be ex adverso of both properties, so as to belong to both parties alike, and accordingly the pursuers claim to have the boundary fixed upon another ground. It is said that the Fendom Burn and the Inver Channel constitûte a natural or physical boundary between the two fishings. I do not say that the ordinary rule by which boundaries are fixed in the case of ex adverso grants of fishings must not sometimes bend to physical facts. But I am satisfied that this feature is not to be found in the present case. The Fendom Burn and channel is not a well-defined stream, and its course is so varying through the foreshore that it does not possess these natural or physical features which can be allowed to interfere with the ordinary rule which defines the rights of proprietors of fishings ex adverso of their lands.

Election Law—County Franchise—Service Franchise—Soldier—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. c. 3), sec. 3.—A soldier who has, in respect of his position in the army, lived in separate apartments in barracks for the qualifying period, is entitled as a servant of the Queen to be enrolled in the register of voters as tenant of a "dwelling-house."

Held further, that commissioned officers who each had the exclusive occupation of a bedroom for the qualifying period, but took their meals in a mess-room, to which they had a common right, were also entitled to be placed upon the roll of voters.

Registration Appeal Court. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. B.

At a Court for the Registration of Voters for the Partick division of the county of Lanark, held at Maryhill on 8th October 1887, John Gay, sergeant-major, Maryhill Barracks, claimed to be enrolled as a voter in that division "as tenant of house in Maryhill Barracks in virtue of service."

Thomas M'Gill, a voter on the roll, objected on the ground that "Gay was not tenant of the premises founded on in the manner required by the statute, but simply the occupier in respect of his service as a soldier in the British army, and therefore was not entitled to the franchise."

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) rejected the claim, holding "that the occupation of premises in barracks by a soldier on duty could not be regarded as tenancy in the sense of the Act of Parliament."

Gay took a case for appeal.

The facts stated were that "Gay, in respect of his position in the British army, had occupied exclusively separate apartments by himself and family in Maryhill Barracks for more than a year prior to the 31st July 1887, and was still in the occupancy thereof—it being the rule to provide married men whose families reside with them in barracks with rooms for their exclusive use."

The question of law stated in the case was:—"Whether a soldier who has lived in separate apartments in barracks for the qualifying period is entitled to be put upon the roll as tenant of a house in virtue of the Representation of the People Acts?"

The Sheriff-substitute stated that in the event of his decision being reversed, the names of fifty-one other soldiers, as to whom the facts were the same, would fall to be added to the roll.

He further stated that there were four claimants whose claim he had excluded on the same ground as Gay's, but as to whom the facts were that they were commissioned officers having each the exclusive occupancy of one bedroom but who took their meals in a mess-room, to which they had each a common right.

Argued for the appellant;—The case fell within the words of the Statute of 1884 (quoted in Lord Mure's opinion, infra). He was in the employment of the Queen, and had in virtue of his employment a "dwelling-house" of which he had exclusive occupancy. Further, soldiers in the like position had been entered in other Registration Courts, and the point was concluded by the authority of the Crieff case,[1] and by English decision.[2]

No appearance was made for the respondent.

Lord Mure.—The question stated in this case is a short and simple one. It depends on the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, which provides that "where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment, and the dwelling-house is not inhabited by any person under whom such man serves in such office, service, or employment, he shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act and the Representation of the People Acts, to be an inhabitant-occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant."

Under that clause of the statute these persons claim to be enrolled on the ground that by virtue of their employment they have the occupation of rooms in Maryhill Barracks, and that that entitles them to be enrolled as inhabitant-occupiers in the sense of the Act.

The admitted facts are that the appellant Gay, in respect of his position in the British army, had occupied exclusively separate apartments by himself and family in Maryhill Barracks for more than a year prior to 31st July 1887, and was still in occupancy thereof—it being the rule to provide married men whose families are allowed to reside with them in barracks with rooms for their exclusive use. This, then, is the position of this man. He is in the employment of the Queen, and occupies exclusively separate apartments in the barracks, and was still in occupation of them when the Sheriff came to consider his claim at the Registration Court. That being so, I am unable to see any ground for holding that the case of a man so situated does not fall within the provision of the statute I have quoted. I think the appellant comes within the express words of the statute, and that the claim should have been admitted. The Sheriff says that he "rejected the claim, holding that the occupation of premises in barracks by a soldier on duty could not be regarded as tenancy in the sense of the Act of Parliament." But the Act itself says that a man in the employment of anyone, who inhabits a dwelling-house in virtue of the employment, is deemed an inhabitant-occupier as a tenant. At one time a difficulty was felt, as in the Crieff case last year, from the fact that rooms only, and not a house in the ordinary sense, were the subjects of occupation. But the Act of 1884, by sec. 7 (subsec. 4), gives an interpretation of the expression dwelling-house as meaning "any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling." I think, therefore, that the Sheriff's judgment should be recalled, and the claimant held entitled to be enrolled. In the Crieff case last year we were referred to the authority of an English decision. I have referred again to the volume cited to us then, and find that in England a claimant was admitted in precisely the same circumstances as we have before us here.

I understand that your Lordships are of opinion, as I am, that there is no room for distinction as to the case of the four officers referred to in the second part of the case.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also entirely concur. I think the case is decided by the case of Atkinson v. Collard in the Queen's Bench Division, to which your Lordship has referred.

ALEXANDER LEMON (Inspector of Eastwood), Pursuer (Respondent).—J. C. Lorimer—Guy.

JAMES WALLACE (Inspector of St Nicholas), Defender (Appellant).—J. C. Thomson—Shaw.

Poor—Settlement—Proof—Parish Register.—In an action of relief of a pauper's aliment brought against one of the two parishes in which a town was situate, it was proved that the pauper was born in the town in 1811. The only evidence that the pauper was born in the defender's parish was an entry of the birth and baptism in the Register of Births and Baptisms kept for that parish, and an entry in a register of baptisms kept by the minister of a chapel of ease within the parish. Held that there was sufficient proof that the pauper had been born in the parish.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff. M.

ISABELLA M'FARLANE having become chargeable as a pauper in the parish of Eastwood, this action was raised at the instance of the inspector of poor of that parish against the inspector of poor of the parish of St Nicholas or City Parish, Aberdeen, as her birth parish, for the amount expended on her relief.

M'Farlane had never acquired any residential settlement. The pursuer averred that the pauper had been born in the parish of St Nicholas or City Parish, Aberdeen (one of the two parishes in which Aberdeen is situated), in the year 1811, being the daughter of Andrew M'Farlane, soldier in the Fifeshire Militia, which was then quartered in Aberdeen, and that she had been baptised there on 11th April 1811.

The defender denied the pursuer's averments, and further, in any view, disputed liability for advances prior to 14th June 1882, the date when the particulars of the pursuer's claim were sent to him, although he admitted that formal notice of chargeability had been sent in 1877.

The following summary of the evidence in the case is taken from the note to the Sheriff-substitute's (Brown) interlocutor:—"(1) I hold there is legal evidence that the pauper was the daughter of Andrew M'Farlane, a weaver, who was in the Fifeshire Militia, and of his wife Janet Mackie. The pauper herself said so, the regimental documents produced shew that there was an Andrew M'Farlane, a weaver, in that regiment between the year 1807 and 1813, and the baptismal certificate * produced proves that spouses of the above names had a daughter baptised in Aberdeen on 11th April 1811, a date corresponding with the age which the pauper assigned to herself. There is the further corroborative evidence of the witness Mrs Scott, who was acquainted with the pauper's parents, and states their history in connection with Aberdeen, the father more particularly being a weaver and militiaman. (2) I also hold it to be by sufficient evidence established that the Fifeshire Militia was embodied and stationed in Aberdeen from about August 1810 until March 1812. It is a more doubtful point, but I also consider it to be proved, that that regiment occupied the barracks during their residence in this city. . . . (3) If the identity of the pauper as the daughter of Andrew M'Farlane of the Fifeshire Militia is made out, it is undoubtedly proved by the extract above referred to, and by the register of baptisms in the handwriting of the Rev. Mr Paull of the College Church, afterwards of Tullynessle, spoken to by his son, Mr Paull, advocate, Aberdeen,† that the pauper was baptised in the parish of St Nicholas."

The Sheriff-substitute (Brown), on 12th February 1887, found that the pursuer had failed to prove that the pauper was born in the defender's parish, and assoilzied him.‡

* That certificate was:—"Aberdeen, 11th April 1811.—Andrew M'Farlane, soldier, Fifeshire Militia, and his spouse, Janet Mackie, had a daughter born named Isabella, baptised by the Rev. James Paull in presence of Janet Bogie and Mrs Smith."

† Mr Paull deponed,—"I know it is a tradition in the family that my father acted as chaplain to the forces. I produce a record of baptisms in Greyfriars' parish made by my father. The entries are in his own handwriting. I find in this book, under date April 1811, an entry in the following terms:—'Andrew M'Farlane, Fifeshire, daughter.' From this word 'Fifeshire' I infer that that is the record of the baptism of a soldier's child. There are several other entries of a similar kind."

‡ "NOTE.— . . . Beyond these three propositions [referring to the three propositions narrated above] I am unable to find anything that can be said to fall within the category of proof. They no doubt in themselves present an unusual combination of circumstances; and there are other facts from which the probability of the pursuer's case may be very forcibly argued. There is evidence that a certain proportion of the wives and married soldiers lived in the barracks, and I impute the same rule to militiamen in residence; and apart from any special reasons assigned for it, I think there is an inherent probability resting on the gregarious habits of soldiers, that married men unable to find quarters in the barracks would look for them in the immediate neighbourhood. But disturbing elements here cut into the case, with the result, as it seems to me, of placing the pursuer within the action of the principle, which is a rule at once of logic and of law, that when the circumstances of a case are explicable by either of two hypotheses, these are mutually destructive, and neither can receive effect. The following facts may be referred to in illustration of this position. The register of baptisms kept by the Rev. Mr Paull is really only a congregational record, and accordingly it contains numerous entries of persons residing out of the parish of St Nicholas, but resorting to the College Church from the adjoining parish of Old Machar. It is a well-settled principle of evidence that a baptismal register proves nothing beyond the fact of baptism; and that indeed was strongly emphasised by the present Lord President, in the case of Beattie v. Nish, 5 R. 775, where he rejected a statement of the place of birth occurring in a certificate of baptism as any evidence that the birth took place as stated; but here the inconclusiveness of the register for anything but baptism stands established, not only by presumption but proof. The pursuer urges the tradition in Mr Paull's family of his father's connection as chaplain with the forces; but that is a consideration which seems to me to tell quite as much in favour of the defender; for, within reasonable limits, that would be an inducement to soldiers to take their children for baptism to his church, in whatever parish they resided. Even on the assumption that the Fifeshire Regiment occupied the barracks, and that none of the troops were in billets, the residence of the pauper's father within the parish of St Nicholas, he being a married man, is only a matter of more or less probability. But the distinct weight of the evidence appears to me to be, that married soldiers who had not accommodation provided for them in the barracks were not placed under any military restriction as to where they should find quarters; and there is nothing, therefore, to make it an unreasonable supposition, destructive of the hypothesis on which the pursuer's case is built, that the pauper's father resided out of the parish of St Nicholas. Another counter probability in favour of his case is urged by the defender, on the evidence that the pauper's father was a weaver, and that this industry was mainly prosecuted in Hardgate, and other districts situated within the parish of Old Machar,—the suggestion being that he eked out his scanty pay as a militiaman by following his own civilian calling, and probably out of the parish of St Nicholas. . . . But without entering further upon the details of the evidence, it appears to me to be impossible, with reasonable certainty, to affirm that the pauper was born in the parish of St Nicholas; and that entitles the defender to prevail. . . . ."

* "NOTE.—I cannot help thinking that in this case the Sheriff-substitute has been too strict. The time has gone by for evolving legal riddles out of the work of relieving the poor. It is a business of a very practical kind, and while no parish is to be held liable for advances without reasonable evidence that the pauper truly belongs to it, it is really too much to expect inspectors to be able to trace as exactly as if they were claiming some rich succession the early history of the unfortunate persons who, in their old age, and after spending often a wandering life in the humblest ranks of society, find an asylum in the poorhouse. The only interest the public have in the question is, that it shall be made reasonably certain that the pauper was born in the parish somewhere, where or in what particular spot is of no moment, unless, as curiously enough has sometimes happened, the house is exactly on the line which divides two parishes.

"The pauper Isabella M'Farlane applied to Eastwood for relief in October 1877; she was then sixty-six years of age, and, according to her own declaration, her father's name was Andrew M'Farlane, who was in the militia in Aberdeen; her mother's name was Janet Mackay or Mackie, and she had always believed that she was born in the city of Aberdeen. The defender observes that this statement does not prove much, for the city of Aberdeen is a wide term, and although in 1811, when the pauper was born, the barracks were occupied by the Fifeshire Militia, and there was in it a soldier of the name of Andrew M'Farlane, who is abundantly identified as the pauper's father, it by no means follows that being a married man he would live in the barracks, and if not in the barracks, who can tell that he did not live outside of the parish of St Nicholas altogether? Old Machar parish was then indeed not so populous a part of Aberdeen as it is now; but it is not proved that the pauper was not born there. I think that the practical answer to this ingenious reasoning is, that this would have involved a considerable walk to and from the barracks, and

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case we have very elaborate opinions from the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff-principal, the one holding that the pursuer has not made out his case,—viz., that the pauper was born in the parish of St Nicholas,—and the other holding that the pursuer is entitled to a judgment in his favour. I can hardly say that the Sheriff has a clear opinion that the pursuer's case is proved, for he seems to hold that something short of legal evidence is all that is required in order to make the parish of settlement liable to the relieving parish in a case such as the present. I cannot agree with that opinion. If a relieving parish seeks to make the parish of birth liable, the pursuer in such an action must establish that liability as matter of fact by competent legal evidence. It is simply a jury question. I differ, therefore, from the Sheriff in the first paragraph of his note.

But I am satisfied that the Sheriff has come to a right conclusion, and although the case is a narrow one, that there is sufficient evidence to justify the decision against the parish of St Nicholas. The pauper was undoubtedly born in Aberdeen, and if it were not that Aberdeen consists of two parishes,—viz., St Nicholas and Old Machar,—there would be an end of the case. Accordingly the question resolves itself into this, whether the pauper was born in the parish of St Nicholas or of Old Machar, and that question has to be determined in a case where the latter parish is not represented. But there is no doubt a preponderance of evidence in favour of the view that the pauper was born in the parish of St Nicholas, and I do not think there is any evidence whatever to the effect that she was born in Old Machar parish. There is no evidence that the mother of the pauper was ever in the parish of Old Machar in her life. If there had been anything to shew that she had been living there that fact might have given rise to some doubt. But all that we know is that the father of the pauper came to Aberdeen as a private in the Fifeshire Militia, which was quartered there, the probabilities are that M'Farlane lived either at or near the scene of his occupation. [Then followed a narrative of the two entries from the two registers narrated above.]

"It is true that an entry in a baptismal register proves nothing but the fact of the baptism; and if the entry bears that the child was born in another and distant parish, it has been rejected as proof of the place of birth, because the registrar must have got his information on that point at secondhand. This was so held in the case of Beattie v. Nish, which is referred to by the Sheriff-substitute (5 R. 775). But in that case the Lord President pointed out wherein the probative value of such an entry consists when the place of birth is the matter in issue. 'It will be presumed,' he said, 'in the general case, from the terms of the entry in such a register that the child baptised was born in the parish.' It is, however, a presumption only, or, as has been said in an English case, the register of baptism per se is not evidence of the place of birth. If the child were then very young, the register would be presumptive evidence that it was born in that parish where it was baptised; but if the child were not then young, the circumstance of its having been baptised in a particular parish would afford no presumption that it was born there (R. N. Petherton, 1826, 5 B. & C. 508). Applying these principles to the evidence adduced by the pursuer, I think it is reasonably certain, in the absence of any circumstances leading to a contrary inference, that the pauper was born in the parish of St Nicholas. . . ."

prior to the alleged date of the pauper's birth. The barracks in which the regiment apparently lodged were in the parish of St Nicholas. Again, as I have already said, neither the father nor the mother are shewn ever to have been in Old Machar at all. In these circumstances, there are two pieces of evidence adduced. One is the register or list of baptisms kept by the Rev. Mr Paull, then minister of the College Church, a quoad sacra chapel in the parish of St Nicholas, in which he enters the pauper as being baptised by him. That is a piece of evidence tending to shew that the parish of St Nicholas was the parish in which the pauper naturally fell to be baptised, and therefore that in all probability she was born there. But it is suggested on the other hand, and with some reason, that the two parishes were so nearly connected with one another that it was not an uncommon thing for the minister of St Nicholas Parish to baptise children born in Old Machar; and therefore that if the register is evidence it is very imperfect evidence, for it merely proves the fact that the pauper was baptised by a minister in St Nicholas parish.

But there is another register, which is perhaps of greater materiality as regards the matter in dispute, viz., the register of births and baptisms for the City Parish of Aberdeen. This book is now deposited in the Register Office. It has been produced, and we have examined it, and it bears to be a register of births as well as of baptisms. The words of the entry in the register are as follows:—"Aberdeen, 11th April 1811.—Andrew M'Farlane, soldier, Fifeshire Militia, and his spouse, Janet Mackie, had a daughter born named Isabella, baptised by the Rev. James Paull in presence of Janet Bogie and Mrs Smith." That is a distinct affirmation to the effect that the daughter, i.e., the present pauper, was both born and baptised in the parish of St Nicholas, which is the same as the City Parish of Aberdeen. It seemed to me to be doubtful whether this register was one both of births and baptisms, but on examination the opinion I have formed is that it cannot be treated as anything else than what it calls itself. It is to be observed that it is the defender's book, and it is very difficult for them to escape its effect. It is really very like the writ of the parish, and ought to be conclusive.

In this respect the present case differs essentially from that of Beattie v. Nish, in which the register appealed to was the register of another parish, which bore that the pauper in question was born not even in the parish, but in an adjoining one. Of course that statement could not be given effect to, because there were no means of ascertaining the sources of information of the person who kept the register. But when the person who keeps the register says that the child was born and baptised in the parish to which the register applies, it is a very different matter, and I think it is very difficult to escape from the conclusion that the proof of the facts sought to be established is complete.

I accordingly agree with the Sheriff's judgment, although for the reasons I have already stated I am not prepared to put my judgment upon the same ground in law as the Sheriff has done.

LORD MURE.—I cannot adopt the view which the Sheriff has laid down in his note, that in poor-law cases the facts may be held to be established by something less than legal evidence. For it appears to me that in all cases,—whether dealing with the poor-law or not,—the facts on which the judgment is based must be distinctly proved. But, while I differ from the Sheriff upon this, I concur in the result at which he has arrived, and in the opinion of your Lordship.

Lemon v. Wallace.

And I do not know that I should have thought it necessary to say more, had it not been for the reference which has been made to the case of Beattie v. Nish, as an authority adverse to the view which the Sheriff has here taken. I do not think that it is. The pauper in the present case was admittedly born in Aberdeen. The father, who was in the militia, came there with his regiment, which was quartered in the barracks at the time of the birth of the child. There is no evidence as to whether the father lived in or out of the barracks, which were in the city parish of St Nicholas. But there is an entry in the register of births and baptisms for that parish to the effect that the child, the present pauper, was baptised by Mr James Paull, who was then the minister of a chapel in the City Parish. And it is proved by Mr Paull, a son of Mr James Paull, that there is an entry in a private record of baptisms kept by his father to the same effect. These entries appear to me to lead strongly to the inference that the child was born of parents who were living in the parish, because the evidence of the entry in the City Parish register is the evidence of the defender's own books; and as there is no evidence to the contrary, and none to shew that the parents of the pauper ever lived in Old Machar, I concur with your Lordship in the opinion which you have expressed. It is in this matter of the entry in the defender's own register that this case differs essentially from that of Beattie. The reason why we rejected the entry in the parish register in that case was that it was contained, not in the register of Old Luce, which was the parish sought to be made liable, but in the register of Portpatrick, which was at a considerable distance. I was, on that ground, clearly of opinion in the case of Beattie that the proof had failed.

LORD ADAM.—The Sheriff-depute seems to think that poor-law cases relating to pauper settlements are to be decided upon a different footing from other cases. He says in his note,—"The time has gone by for evolving legal riddles out of the work of relieving the poor." That may be very good advice to parochial boards, but if parochial boards choose to evolve legal riddles, and bring them before the Court, the Court must solve them, and I know of no other way in which they can do this than by applying to them the ordinary principles and practice applicable to all cases. Does the Sheriff mean that we are to admit evidence in these cases which would not be admissible in other cases, or that we are entitled to betake ourselves to surmise and conjecture instead of confining ourselves to the legal and rational presumptions which arise from proved facts? If that is the Sheriff's meaning, I totally differ from him. We must, I think, adhere in these cases as in others to the well-known principles of the law of evidence. It is no doubt true that, looking to the somewhat remote dates to which we have to go back in these cases, and to the fact that the persons concerned belong for the most part to the poorest classes of the community, and that they leave few or no traces behind them in the shape of writing, the evidence to be had is sometimes very scanty. It may be also that in the absence of direct proof we may have to betake ourselves to presumptions more frequently than in other cases. But that is what would be done in any case where better evidence would not be looked for.

There does not seem to me to be any difficulty in dealing with this case. It raises the simple issue of fact whether it is proved that the pauper was born in the parish of St Nicholas? That issue falls to be decided by the ordinary rules of evidence. The evidence is narrow, but it appears to me to be sufficient. The pauper was undoubtedly born in the town of Aberdeen. The town consists of two parishes—the parish of St Nicholas and the parish of Old Machar. In which of these two was the pauper born? I think it is proved that the pauper's father was quartered in the barracks of Aberdeen, which are situated in the parish of St Nicholas, in the year 1811, but I do not think that that fact helps the pursuer much, because it is not proved that his wife resided with him. I think that it is more probable than otherwise that, whether the husband lived inside the barracks or not, his wife lived out of them—it is very likely she lived in the neighbourhood and in the parish. But that is conjecture. There is, however, an important item of written evidence which has been appealed to, viz., the register kept by Mr Paull of the College Church, now Greyfriars' Parish Church, but I do not think it helps the pursuer much. If it had been a parish register it would have been very important. The College Church, however, in those days was a mere chapel of ease, with no territory attached to it, and as Mr Paull was the chaplain of the Fifeshire Militia that sufficiently accounts for the child having been baptised by him altogether irrespective of the fact whether the child was born in St Nicholas or Old Machar. That register, therefore, goes a very little way towards proving the pursuer's case. But the other register, an extract of which has been produced, is very different. It is the City Parish Register of Births and Baptisms, the City Parish being the parish of St Nicholas. Perhaps it is not altogether free from criticism, for it is open to the observation that under date April 11, 1811, it bears to record the fact of the child's baptism by Mr Paull, which, however, did not take place till the 14th, three days afterwards. That excludes the notion that it was written up from day to day. But having looked at the register, and in view of the fact that the date is not material, I see no ground for doubting its authenticity. If it is to be taken to be, as it bears to be, and I do not see why it should not be, a register of births as well as of baptisms, I think it would have proved the birth of the child in the parish. But it is said by the defender to be only a register of baptisms, and taking it to be so, I think it is enough. I think that if it is proved by the appropriate register that an infant was baptised in a particular parish, that raises a legitimate presumption, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, that it was born there, and in this case there is not a particle of evidence that either the pauper or her mother ever was in the parish of Old Machar, which is the only other possible parish. In the absence of any competing testimony, I am quite prepared to give effect to the presumption in question.

The case of Beattie v. Nish, in which my interlocutor in the Outer-House was reversed, has been referred to. The present is a very different case. The register was referred to there for the purpose of proving an extrinsic fact, viz., that the child in question was born in a different parish some twenty years before. But the register of another parish is not the appropriate evidence of such a fact. Here we are appealing to the register for the purpose of proving a fact for which the register is the appropriate evidence.

ARCHIBALD MACAULAY, Pursuer (Respondent).—A. J. Young—Gunn.
THE SCHOOL BOARD OF NORTH UIST, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Murray—Boyd.

Reparation—Illegal imprisonment—School Board—Malice.—A father was convicted of failure to educate his children upon a complaint at the instance of the compulsory officer of a School Board, and in default of payment of a fine was sentenced to three days' imprisonment, and was imprisoned accordingly. The conviction was quashed by the Court of Justiciary on the ground that neither a certificate under the Act of 1872, nor a sufficient attendance order under the Act of 1883, had been produced to the Sheriff-substitute. The father then brought an action for damages against the School Board, but set forth no specific averments of malice. Held that the error having been committed by a public board in the performance of their duty it was necessary for the pursuer to set forth malice, and action dismissed as irrelevant.

Question (per Lord Rutherfurd Clark) whether malice can competently be averred of a public board.

2D DIVISION.
M.

Archibald Macaulay, crofter, North Uist, was, on 11th April 1887, charged in the Sheriff Court at Lochmaddy at the instance of Archibald Macdonald, compulsory officer of the School Board of North Uist, with a contravention of the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, in so far as he had for a period of at least one month immediately preceding the date of the complaint, without reasonable excuse, failed to provide elementary education for his children Flora and Jessie, and had failed to secure their regular attendance at school, after receiving due warning of said failure, "whereby the said Archibald Macaulay is liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s., with expenses, or to imprisonment, not exceeding fourteen days, or to have an attendance order pronounced, all in terms of said Acts."

The Sheriff-substitute (Webster) convicted Macaulay, and fined him 5s., with the alternative of three days' imprisonment.

Macaulay was imprisoned, and brought a suspension, but before a warrant of interim liberation could be obtained he had suffered the term of imprisonment imposed.

The High Court of Justiciary, on 3d June 1887 (14 R. (Just. Cases) 43), suspended the conviction on the ground that neither a certificate under the Act of 1872 nor a sufficient attendance order under that of 1883 had been produced to the Sheriff-substitute.

Macaulay then raised an action for damages against Macdonald, the compulsory officer, Donald Dott, the clerk to the School Board, and also against the School Board and the individual members thereof.

The pursuer, after setting forth the proceedings in the Sheriff Court and in the Court of Justiciary, made the following averments against the School Board, against whom alone the case ultimately came to be insisted,—(Cond. 6) "The foresaid proceedings were grossly unjust, illegal, and oppressive, and were entered upon recklessly and in utter disregard of criminal procedure and the provisions of the Education Acts, and were malicious and without probable cause. The pursuer's said child Flora had been unwell and could not attend school, and by section 11 of the Education Act of 1883 illness is recognised as a reasonable excuse for non-attendance. The other child, Jessie, had just attained five years of age, and could not safely be trusted to go to school alone, there being no road between the pursuer's house and the school, and the weather prevailing at the time being wild and boisterous, and during part of the time snow was lying on the ground. The compulsory powers of said Acts are only applicable to children between the ages of five and fourteen who have contumaciously or after repeated warnings refused or failed to attend school, and after an 'attendance order' has been issued and disregarded." (Cond. 8) "The proceedings which are complained of were authorised by the said School Board, and the illegal prosecution and imprisonment of the pursuer were due to, and the consequence of, the instructions which they incompetently issued. They did not give the pursuer due warning in terms of said section; they did not present a complaint to the Sheriff and obtain the 'attendance order' as a condition precedent to instituting the foresaid proceedings, nor did they inquire whether the pursuer had any reasonable excuse for the non-attendance of his children at school before instituting said proceedings."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been injured in his feelings, reputation, and character by the defenders' said illegal and unwarrantable proceedings, he is entitled to reparation and solatium as libelled. (2) The defenders having in the foresaid circumstances acted maliciously and without probable cause, and the pursuer having suffered injury thereby as set forth, is entitled to decree as libelled.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Averments of the pursuer are irrelevant.

On 16th November the Lord Ordinary (Lee) assoilzied the individual defenders from the conclusions of the action so far as directed against them personally, and approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether on or about the 22d day of April 1887 the defenders, the School Board of the parish of North Uist, wrongfully and illegally caused the pursuer to be tried and convicted before the Sheriff Court at Lochmaddy as a person who had contravened 'The Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883,' by having, without reasonable excuse, failed to discharge the duty of providing efficient elementary education for Flora and Jessie Macaulay, two of his children, and having failed to secure the regular attendance of said children at school after receiving due warning of said failure, and to be adjudged therefor to forfeit and pay the sum of 5s. of penalty, and, in default of immediate payment, to be imprisoned in the prison of Lochmaddy for the period of three days, and subsequently to be imprisoned, under said sentence, for the said period, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"*

* "OPINION.— . . . As to the issue against the School Board, it was maintained on the authority of Rae v. Linton (2 R. 669) that the pursuer must undertake in the issue to prove malice and want of probable cause. To sustain this contention would be to deny the pursuer all remedy for the wrong complained of, unless he can prove malice on the part of the corporation. My opinion is, that the law gives the pursuer a claim for reparation against the School Board, if he proves that the imprisonment which he suffered was wrongful and illegal, and was caused by a mistake for which the School Board is responsible. His case on record is that the sentence and imprisonment were caused by the board wrongfully praying for, in the complaint which they authorised to be instituted, and wrongfully taking from the Sheriff and enforcing, a sentence inflicting a penalty, and, in default of immediate payment, adjudging him to be imprisoned for three days. The mistake of the Board, according to the pursuer's allegations, was that they failed to take the preliminary steps necessary to justify a prosecution for penalties or imprisonment. They have not certified, and it did not appear that they were in a position to certify, in terms of sec. 70 of the Education Act, that the pursuer had been grossly, and without reasonable excuse, failing to discharge the duty of providing elementary education for his children. This may have arisen from inadvertence. If their statements are correct, they would have been entitled to grant such a certificate in respect of the pursuer's failure to appear when summoned before them, as they say he was, to give explanation. But it was essential to justice, in a case involving imprisonment, that the preliminary steps should be taken. They do

The defenders, the School Board, reclaimed, and also gave notice of motion that the Court would be moved to vary the issue adjusted by adding the words "and maliciously and without probable cause" after the words "wrongfully and illegally."

Argued for the defenders;—(1) The mistake here was not the mistake of the School Board but of the Sheriff, who had proceeded to pronounce sentence of imprisonment de plano instead of, as he might have done under the prayer of the complaint, pronouncing an attendance order only. (2) Even if the mistake was that of the School Board, it was a mere error of procedure by a public body acting in discharge of a public duty. It was not a fundamental error. The case was not ruled by Bell v. Black and Morrison, founded on by the Lord Ordinary, where the error was fundamental, and malice must therefore be put in issue;[1] but the averments here were not sufficiently specific to support such an issue.[2]

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The error was plainly that of the School Board, who, if they had not pronounced the sentence, had prayed for it, and had taken advantage of it. (2) The error, further, was more than a mere matter of procedure. The omission to take the preliminary steps affected the sentence fundamentally. Consequently malice need not be put in issue.

Lord Craighill.—This is a case of some interest and importance, both to the individuals concerned and to the public. The pursuer is Archibald Macaulay, against whom the School Board of North Uist thought it necessary to bring a complaint, through their compulsory officer, the ground of complaint being that he had failed to do his duty under the Education Acts in not sending two of his children to school for more than a month. The Act of 1872, section 70, authorises such proceedings, but upon one condition, namely, that a written certificate be granted by the School Board setting forth that the parent had failed in his duty of providing elementary education for his children, and this condition was not observed in the present instance. There is another course of proceeding, authorised by the Act of 1883, which provides that when a parent neglects this duty the School Board may ask the Sheriff to pronounce an attendance order requiring the parent to fulfil his duty. It seems that there is a form of complaint in use which prays alternatively, first, for the imposition of a penalty, then for a sentence of imprisonment, and lastly for an attendance order. That seems to me a very dangerous form of complaint, as it may be used, as it was here, as the means of getting a sentence of imprisonment pronounced without the preliminary condition of obtaining an attendance order being fulfilled. In the present case the accused was sentenced to a penalty of 5s., and failing payment to imprisonment for three days, and unfortunately, although the sentence was in the end quashed, it had already been carried into effect by imprisonment for the full period which had been imposed.

not appear to have been taken, and if, as alleged, they were not taken, the pursuer is entitled to an opportunity of shewing, whether there was malice or not, that his sentence was wrongful, and that the mistake did him an injury, for which he is entitled to reparation.

"I think that the decision in Rae v. Linton is not applicable to such a case; and that the case of Bell v. Black and Morrison (3 Macph. 1026) and the observations of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Pringle v. Bremner (5 Macph. (H. L.) p. 55) support the pursuer's contention that the words 'wrongfully and illegally' are sufficient."

Macaulay v. North Uist School Board.

Now, no doubt these proceedings were wrong, and what the pursuer says is, that as there was a wrong there must be a remedy, but I do not think that it necessarily follows that the pursuer on account of the wrong is entitled to have the particular remedy which he asks on the present occasion. I think the pursuer overlooks the fact that the School Board were fulfilling a duty which was imposed on them by the statutes, although they took a wrong course of procedure to carry out that duty. That being so, is it to be said that because an error of procedure has been committed, the School Board are on that account to be held liable in damages? I think not. It is not enough to say that the proceedings were illegal and irregular. It is not as if the School Board had no duty at all in the matter. They had a duty, though there was an irregularity in the way they carried it out. The mere allegation of irregularity therefore is not enough. I think the pursuer must allege malice and want of probable cause on the part of the School Board, and, with respect to malice, must set forth facts and circumstances sufficient to warrant the Court in coming to the conclusion that there was malice. There are no such averments on this record, and therefore I think that there is no issuable matter, and I propose, if your Lordships agree with me, that we should dismiss the action.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—This is a question of some nicety. The School Board of North Uist instituted certain proceedings under the Education Acts of 1872 and 1883, in which they obtained a conviction against the pursuer of the present action. These proceedings turned out to be irregular, and were quashed by the Court of Justiciary. The question is whether by reason of that irregularity the pursuer is entitled to recover damages from the School Board, when the only thing that is alleged against the Board is that in the exercise of what they believed to be their public duty they obtained this irregular conviction. If a statute puts a power into any man's hand, and that man uses the power, he must, in the general case, take care that his use of the power is in exact accordance with the manner provided by the statute; if it is not, he may be liable in damages for the misuse of the statutory power; and if there had been no other element in the case than this, the present action might probably have been held to be relevant. But I am disposed to think that a public body like this School Board, acting in the exercise of what they believe to be their statutory powers, are not to be held liable in damages merely because certain proceedings which they carried out—not in the least in their own interest, but entirely in the interest of the public—turn out to be irregular. I rather think that is the safer conclusion, and I am inclined to adopt it. I therefore think that the issue as it stands cannot be maintained.

But it is said that there is a case of malice on record against the defenders. I have doubts whether malice can be alleged against a public board of this kind. I doubt whether a school board can be malicious. But assuming that it can—and I rather think that I must so assume, looking to the way in which the case was presented at the bar—it seems to me that this record is irrelevant. I am not one of those who lay great stress on the necessity for having specific averments of malice in cases of this kind, but if it be the duty of the pursuer of an action such as this to set forth in detail the grounds on which he says the malice of the defender is to be inferred—and there is a considerable body of authority to that effect—I think it is out of the question to say that there is anything in this record to shew that the defenders acted maliciously. I therefore agree in thinking that the action should be dismissed.

School Board.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I entirely concur. I think the School Board were in this matter fulfilling a public function in the public interest. They committed a technical error and mixed up two remedies which are essentially distinct, but there is nothing in that to render them liable in damages, because what they did they did as public officials and in good faith. I therefore think they are privileged.

As regards the allegation of malice, I do not go into the question of how far malice may be alleged and proved against a corporation such as this School Board. That is an abstract question which I do not think it necessary to consider here, for I am very clearly of opinion that on this record there is nothing whatever alleged to shew that the defenders here did not act in perfect good faith. I agree in thinking that we should disallow the issue, and dismiss the action.

Succession—Words importing a bequest of heritage.—By antenuptial contract of marriage a husband conveyed to A, his intended wife, his whole household furniture and plenishing and the liferent use of a cottage, which belonged to him, along with the half of a plot of garden ground attached to it. He further took his heir bound to pay the wife an annuity of £15 out of certain other heritage belonging to him. He further gave his wife "full power and liberty, by mortis causa deed, to test upon and divide and apportion among my lawful children, whether by my first or this intended marriage, . . . my whole means and estate, . . . and to that end I hereby appoint the said A to be my executrix, with power to give up inventories of my estate, and all other powers competent to an executrix; and I hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to her as executrix foresaid." The husband died intestate shortly afterwards, leaving children by a former marriage only.

In an action of declarator brought by the widow against the testator's heir-at-law to have it found that the pursuer was entitled to make up a title in trust to the heritable property, and that the defender, who was in possession, was bound to remove therefrom, held that the terms of the will did not express or imply an intention on the part of the testator to convey the heritage to her.

Question whether the widow's power of apportionment covered heritage.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

Donald Campbell, baker, Callander, and his wife, Ann Fraser, entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 7th January 1882, which was in the following terms:—"In contemplation of which marriage the said Donald Campbell hereby gives, assigns, and dispones to the said Ann Fraser, if she shall survive him, the whole household furniture and plenishing . . . that shall belong to him at the time of his death, . . . and, further, the said Donald Campbell hereby assigns and dispones to the said Ann Fraser, in case she shall survive him, the liferent use and enjoyment of the cottage in which he at present resides, called Lorne Cottage, with full power to her to uplift and receive the rents payable from any portion thereof during all the days and years of her life, or to retain the same in her own possession; and it is hereby declared that as the cottage was built upon a piece of ground belonging to me, on which houses had already been erected, and no allocation of the ground has taken place, it is hereby declared that one-half of the garden ground at the back shall belong to and be liferented by the said Ann Fraser, along with Lorne

Cottage; and further, the said Donald Campbell hereby binds and obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to content and pay to the said Ann Fraser, in the event of her surviving him, for and towards her aliment, a free liferent annuity of £15 sterling, . . . and which annuity of £15 a-year, before provided to the said Ann Fraser, shall be payable and upliftable by her out of and from the rents of the shop and bakehouse situated in the property belonging to me in Main Street, Callander; and the said Donald Campbell hereby further gives to the said Ann Fraser full power and liberty, by mortis causa deed, to test upon and divide and apportion among my lawful children, whether by my first or this intended marriage, and my friends, in such shares as she may think proper, my whole means and estate, in the event of my death without having left any settlement regulating the disposal thereof, and to that end I hereby appoint the said Ann Fraser to be my executrix, with power to give up inventories of my estate, and all other powers competent to an executrix; and I hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to her as executrix foresaid; and which provisions above written, conceived in favour of the said Ann Fraser, she hereby accepts in full satisfaction of all terce of lands, legal share of moveables, and every other thing that she, jure relictæ or otherwise, could ask, claim, or demand from the said Donald Campbell or his heirs, executors, and representatives, by and through his death, if she shall survive him . . ."

Donald Campbell died on 1st April 1882, within three months after this marriage. There were no children of that marriage, but he left issue by a previous marriage, viz., a son, Donald Campbell, and two married daughters.

He left the following heritable properties, viz., (1) Lorne Cottage, Callander, and (2) the tenement in Main Street, Callander, which was burdened with the annuity of £15 to his widow. He left no personal estate beyond his household furniture. In 1875 his son had married, and at that date the father made over his business and trade utensils, and also the house and bakery in the Main Street house, to him. The son thereafter carried on the bakery, and, along with his father, up to the date of the second marriage, occupied the house.

On 10th March 1887 the widow brought an action against the children of the previous marriage, in which the conclusions were for declarator,—(1) that the above antenuptial contract of marriage "gave to the pursuer full power and liberty, by mortis causa deed, to test upon and divide and apportion among his lawful children, whether by his first marriage or by the marriage between him and the pursuer, and his friends, in such shares as the pursuer might think proper, his whole means and estate, in the event of his death without leaving any settlement regulating the disposal thereof; (2) that the said deceased Donald Campbell died on or about 1st day of April 1882 without leaving any such settlement, survived by the pursuer"; and (3) that on the death of her husband the pursuer was entitled to be infeft in trust in the heritable property left by the deceased, and that the defender, Donald Campbell, was bound to remove therefrom.

The defender, Donald Campbell, who alone defended the action, pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The defender being heir-at-law of the deceased Donald Campbell is entitled to the subjects described in the summons.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) found and declared in terms of the first two declaratory conclusions, and quoad ultra assoilzied the defender.*

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that, under the antenuptial contract founded on, the right claimed by the pursuer of this action does not arise. The clause founded on begins by giving the pursuer, the wife, full power and liberty to test upon and divide and apportion among the husband's lawful children, whether by his first or the intended marriage, and his friends, in such shares as she might

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The words "means and estate" did not necessarily include heritage. They required construction, just as think proper, his whole means and estate, in the event of his death without having left any settlement regulating the disposal thereof, and that power is applicable to heritable and moveable estate. In the same deed the wife is given a liferent of one of the two heritable properties in Callander which belonged to the husband, the disponer. Now, there is, in my apprehension, nothing to indicate that these words, purporting to give a power of appointment and division, import any larger interest or right given to the wife than in their strict meaning they convey. I think it is a power of appointment, and nothing more, that is given to Mrs Campbell under the clause. But I quite assent to the argument for the pursuer, that whatever is necessary to the due execution of that power by the donee is implied in the contract of marriage. I think that in the contract there is implied the necessary machinery for enabling the lady to make up a title as trustee, if such title were necessary to enable her to exercise the power; because, under the recent Conveyancing Statute, words in a deed purporting to deal with heritable property, which if used with reference to moveable property would entitle the donee to receive and apply it, are to have the same effect with reference to the heritable estate that is associated with the moveables in the conveyance. Accordingly, in the series of decisions that have followed upon these statutes, it has been held that conveyances in trust, although not expressed in the form of de presenti transfers, may be the ground of adjudication, or, for the execution of a notarial instrument, in virtue of the facilities given by the Conveyancing Act for the testamentary disposal of landed property. But the real question here is, whether the antenuptial contract contains any evidence of an intention on the part of the husband, or an expectation on the part of the wife, in consequence of the husband's words, that she should be the trustee of his heritable estate. If she is trustee, she may make up a title in the form contemplated by the conclusions of the action. If she is not a trustee, then the action falls. Now, nothing can be more clear than that the donee of a simple power of appointment may execute the appointment without being vested in the estate, and therefore it is not at all necessary to the fulfilment of the husband's obligation that his wife should be vested in his estate. I think she may have all the control that it was intended she should have over the estate, by executing the power in the terms in which it is given, And further, there is nothing, so far as I can see, in the other averments of the record, which appear to interfere with or militate against the capacity or power of the wife to execute a deed of division. As regards one of the subjects, she is the liferenter, as the fee is undisposed of, except through this power. As regards the other subjects, there was some arrangement made by the husband in his lifetime in favour of his eldest son, which apparently terminated at his death, and the eldest son is now possessing that property on the title of apparency. But if the pursuer should think fit to exercise the power of appointment, which I think is a testamentary power coming into effect upon her death, then the result is, that the obligation created by the marriage-contract will devolve upon the husband's heir. He is bound to fulfil his father's obligation, and therefore he must either make up his title, and convey to the persons in whose favour the deed is executed, or he must submit to their making up a title at their own hands, in one or other of the forms which are now provided by statutory enactment for that purpose. While, therefore, I do not doubt that the pursuer is well founded in the substance of the claim which she asserts, I think she is wrong in the mode she has taken to assert it.

"In what I have already said regarding the interpretation of this antenuptial contract, I have been assuming that, in so far as the deed gives the power, it is a power to divide and apportion heritable estate as well as moveable estate. But it is not a question under the Conveyancing Acts at all. I have considered these Acts with reference to the pursuer's contention, that she is entitled to expede a title to these lands in her own name. I have decided against her on the words "residue of my estate" did.[1] Looking to the terms of the deed, it seemed that the husband was under the idea that he had disposed of the heritage before he executed the marriage-contract. The pursuer's contention involved this, that the conveyance to her covered the house, out of which it was also provided that the heir was to pay her an annuity of £15. That result shewed how inconsistent the pursuer's construction of the deed was. Further, "dispone" was the word used in the deed when heritage was being dealt with. The pursuer was the mere donee of a power which did not imply a trust. The Lord Ordinary ought to have dismissed the action; that was the logical result to which his judgment led.

Argued for the respondent;—The word "executrix," as used in the marriage-contract, really meant trustee.[2] The words "means and estate," unless restricted by the context, included both heritage and moveables.[3] Here there was no difficulty, because before the words "means and estate" were used in the deed, both heritage and moveables had been dealt with. The words "to that end" were important, and connected the whole previous provisions of the deed with the direction to his "executrix," and the bequest to her of his "whole means and estate." The deed was really both a settlement and a marriage-contract.[4] The trust purposes were first declared, and then the trustee was nominated, as had happened in other cases.[5] Under the deed the pursuer might apply the rents to her own purposes, or they might accumulate in her hands and be tested on along with the moveables. Nothing vested in the heir-at-law until the pursuer's death,[6] and if she pleased she might cut him out altogether.[7]

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that if the Lord Ordinary is right in the opinion expressed in his note, his proper course was to dismiss the action. The first two declaratory conclusions of the summons import nothing more than that the marriage-contract contains certain words, and that the husband died on the 1st April 1882 without leaving any other settlement. The first conclusion cannot be made the subject of a decree of declarator, because it simply repeats the language of the deed, and the second conclusion merely narrates a matter of fact. The Lord Ordinary is against the pursuer upon the other conclusion, and the first two being as I have said unnecessary, and I think irrelevant, the plain result of his Lordship's opinion is that the action ought to be dismissed.

the ground that there is not such an indication of intention that she should be vested in the estate in her lifetime as would satisfy the requirements of the Conveyancing Acts.

"But, in the interpretation of powers of disposal, technical language is not necessary, nor was it ever necessary; and if I had been dealing with this language in a deed executed before the passing of the Acts 1868 and 1874 I should equally have held that in a marriage-contract where heritable as well as moveable estate is regulated a power to test upon the granter's whole means and estate is a power to test upon heritage.

"The result will be that the pursuer, according to my judgment, is entitled to decree in terms of the first and second declaratory conclusions, and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the third conclusion."

[7] Act 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 37.

As regards the subject of the Lord Ordinary's note, I entirely agree with the view he expresses, that there is no appearance in the deed of any intention on the husband's part to give his wife a title to the heritage. It must be kept in mind that the deed is drawn by a conveyancer. It is not like some wills which we have lately had before us where under the recent Conveyancing Acts the testator has been allowed very great latitude in conveying heritage in words which technically would not be understood to do so.

In the earlier part of the deed there is a conveyance to the lady of the household furniture, and there is a clause by which the husband assigns and dispones to his wife a liferent of a cottage called Lorne Cottage, and it is declared that as regards the garden ground at the back of the cottage one half of it is also to be liferented by her,—shewing plainly that the other half was not intended to belong to her. There is also given to the wife an annuity in the form of an obligation binding the husband, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever to content and pay his widow a free liferent annuity of £15 out of the rents derived from the Main Street property. So far as we have gone, there appears to be no room for doubt or dispute. The lady was to have the furniture, a liferent of the cottage in which she and her husband lived, and also of one half of the garden ground, but not of the other half, and an annuity of £15 a-year payable out of the other heritable estate, viz., a shop and bakehouse in the town of Callander.

We must now look at the rest of the deed, and if possible read it consistently with the first portion of it. Following the directions I have named, I do not think it is necessary to determine whether the power of apportionment and division applies to the heritable as well as to the moveable estate. That question is not raised in the present action. The next point of the deed, which does require construction, is this,—"And to that end I hereby appoint the said Ann Fraser to be my executrix, with powers to give up inventories of my estate, and all other powers competent to an executrix; and I hereby leave and bequeath my whole means and estate to her as executrix foresaid." In the first place, these words do not import an absolute bequest, but a bequest in order to enable her to exercise the power which was given to her as executrix foresaid, and in no other capacity whatever. It is further said that, because general words of conveyance are used, therefore under the recent Conveyancing Acts heritage is included, but that is not so if such a reading is quite inconsistent with the rest of the deed. Further, if the pursuer's contention be correct, does the general conveyance to her embrace the portion of the estate which is to be liferented by her in terms of the earlier provisions of the deed? The two things are utterly inconsistent, and I have come to the conclusion without the slightest hesitation that the conveyance to the pursuer is a conveyance of the moveable estate only.

How far that result may limit and restrict the power of apportionment above mentioned, we do not decide. It is enough for us to hold in this case that the bequest does not apply to heritage.

LORD MURE.—The construction and effect of the recent Conveyancing Act, as explained in the leading cases, do not appear to me now to admit of question, provided the clear intention of the granter, as disclosed in the deed under consideration, is to make a bequest of heritage as well as of moveables. My opinion in the case of Urquhart (6 R. 1026) has been referred to as in favour of the construction here concluded for by the pursuer. But, on looking over that opinion, I see that I guarded it by saying that if there was a clear intention to be gathered from the other parts of the deed to the effect that the general words of bequest were not intended to include heritage, then they could not be held to do so. I, no doubt, came to a different conclusion in that case from the rest of the Court; but that was in respect of the terms of the deed, which I thought sufficient to indicate an intention to convey heritage. In the present case, I do not think there are any such words to be found in the deed.

LORD ADAM.—I think the question which is at the bottom of this case is whether the husband when he leaves and bequeaths his "whole means and estate" to his wife intended that they should embrace heritable as well as moveable estate. The words are in themselves sufficiently large to embrace both, and perhaps if they stood by themselves the presumption would be that they did embrace both. But when we find that the words in question are used in connection with a gift to her as executrix,—perhaps a presumption arises the other way. But however that may be, we must construe the deed as a whole, and applying that test I think it is clear that the husband did not intend to bequeath to his wife heritage as well as moveables. His intention was to leave his heritable estate to his son and heir with a liferent of a portion of it to his widow. I do not think he intended to put it in the power of his widow to turn his son the defender, Donald Campbell, out of the premises in Main Street, Callander, which he had occupied for a long time as a bakehouse. It appears to me that to construe the words "means and estate" as including heritage would be wholly inconsistent with the provisions which are contained in the early part of the deed. For instance, if it had been meant that the widow should have the fee of Lorne Cottage, we should have expected that the fee would have been given to her in the same clause of the deed which gives her the liferent, more especially as the deed is prepared by a professional man. The next clause is still more important, and makes the matter absolutely clear. The defender is there placed under an obligation, as his father's heir, to pay the pursuer an annuity of £15 out of the Main Street property. If the pursuer's contention is correct, that would be an obligation upon the person who was not proprietor of the subjects to pay an annuity to the person who was proprietor of the subjects out of which it was to be paid. That reading leads to a reductio ad absurdum. But further, it appears to me to be clear from the whole provisions of the deed that the words "means and estate" were meant to extend to moveable estate only, and not to include heritage.

Right in security—Drainage improvements—Personal action against possessor of subjects—Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Act, 1856 (Act 19 and 20 Vict. cap. lxx).—Held that the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company's Act of 1856 imposes no personal liability upon a landowner to whom advances are made under that Act, and that a personal action against such landowner for payment of the annualrent charge is incompetent.

Scottish Drainage and Improvement Co. v. Campbell.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

In the years 1875 and 1877 the Reverend John Cameron, minister of the parish of Urquhart, Inverness-shire, applied to the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company, incorporated under their Acts of 1856 and 1860, for loans for the improvement by drainage, &c., of his glebe. The applications having been submitted in terms of the above Acts to the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, and the improvements executed, the Commissioners thereupon, on 8th November 1877, delivered to the Company two absolute orders charging the fee of the glebe with the annual payments of (1) £16, 8s. 8d., and (2) £8, 10s. 7d., each payable in half-yearly instalments for twenty-five years.

The first of these orders was in these terms:—"The Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, in pursuance of the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company's Acts, do, by this absolute order under their hands and seal, charge the fee of the lands mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto with the payment to the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company, their successors and assignees, of the yearly sum of £16, 8s. 8d., payable half-yearly, on the 15th day of May and the 11th day of November in every year, for the term of twenty-five years, and being a proportionate repayment, according to the table annexed, of the capital sum of £245, 5s., with interest at £4, 10s. per centum per annum, the first half-yearly payment to be made on the 15th day of May 1878."

Mr Cameron paid these half-yearly instalments till his death in 1880. He was succeeded as minister of the parish by the Rev. John P. Campbell, who entered into possession of the manse and glebe.

In 1887 the Drainage Company raised an action against Mr Campbell for payment of the instalments or rent charges due since Martinmas 1884, he having paid them from 1880 until then.

The defender stated that it was in ignorance of his rights he had paid the instalments from 1880 to 1884, and maintained that there was no personal obligation upon him under the Company's Acts to do so. He further stated that the expenditure in question had not increased the annual value of the glebe, which was only of the value of £10.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender, as minister of the parish of Urquhart, being in possession of the glebe thereof, is liable to make payment of the rent charges sued for. (2) The rent charges sued for being a preferable burden on the glebe, the same are payable by the minister for the time being of the parish, and the pursuers are entitled to decree against him therefor as sued for, with expenses.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) There having been no contract between the defender and the pursuers, he is not personally liable, and should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Act of Parliament founded on was the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company's Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. lxx).

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 15th June 1887, found that the pursuers had no personal claim or right of action against the defender, and assoilzied him.*

* "OPINION.—This is an action at the instance of a company constituted for the purpose of advancing money for the improvement of lands, against the incumbent of a rural parish, claiming payment of eight half-yearly instalments of a charge upon the glebe for improvement debt incurred during the tenancy of the previous incumbent.

"The defence (so far as relevant) is that the charge is not a debt personally affecting the defender, and that the pursuers can only recover their instalments by real diligence directed against the lands secured by the charge. The defence appears to me to be well founded, having regard to the terms of the deed

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The question was whether the pursuers had a personal claim against the defender for the rent charges. The terms of the absolute order provided only a real security, but the 61st libelled, and the private Acts of Parliament which regulate the powers and rights of the company.

"The deed libelled is called an absolute order, and is in the form of schedule (C) of the Company's principal Act. It declares that the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales (who under the Act have certain quasi-judicial functions), 'do, by this absolute order under their hands and seal, charge the fee of the lands mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto with the payment to the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company, their successors and assignees, of the yearly sum of £ , &c., for the term of , &c.'

"In this order the important words evidently are the words 'charge the fee of the lands.' The word 'charge' is not one of the customary technical terms which are used by the conveyancers of this part of the United Kingdom, and I am not aware that the word has been the subject of judicial interpretation in Scotland. But if the Judge is entitled to use his knowledge of the English language as a guide to the interpretation of such expressions, it is my opinion that a charge on the fee of lands means nothing more than a real security unconnected with personal obligation; in other words, a real burden on the lands. If, in the absence of any authorised interpretation of the term, I am at liberty to consider the probable intention of the Legislature, I may say that I think it is very unlikely that Parliament should authorise the minister of a parish to enter into obligations connected with the improvement of the glebe in such terms as would be personally binding on his successors. I will add that the Act authorises advances to be made on the security of entailed estates in Scotland, and that in my opinion it is unlikely that Parliament intended that such debts should be personally binding on succeeding heirs of entail.

"Apart from personal obligation, the pursuers have an excellent security for their advances; because I observe that by section 52 their advances are to have priority over all other incumbrances, existing or future, except charges of the like nature. Again, I observe, it is most improbable that the Legislature would have granted preferential rights to this company if the company was also to have the rights of a creditor in a bond and disposition in security against the person in possession.

"Section 49 of the principal Act authorises the execution of charges, in the form of the schedule, by the Drainage Commissioners, but it does not define the nature of the security to be constituted. The pursuers, as I understand, rest their case mainly on the provision of section 61, which provides that such charges may be recovered 'by the same means and in like manner as any feu-duties, or rent, or annualrent, or other payment out of the same lands, would be recoverable in Scotland.' Now, as I read this clause, the expression 'may be recovered,' at the beginning of the section is grammatically and logically connected with the words 'out of the same lands' near the end of the section; and this connection is in no way disturbed by the reference to feu-duties, rents, and annualrents in the intervening part of the sentence. The company are to have all the remedies against the heritable estate which are competent to superiors or creditors in obligations of annualrents; but it is not said that they are to have a remedy against the person. We know that the remedy against the person is very different in the two illustrative cases. The superior's remedy is against the entered vassal; the remedy of the creditor in a ground annualrent is against the debtor and his heirs. It can hardly be supposed that Parliament intended to give a concurrent right of relief against heirs of the debtor and also against successors in the estate. But it is quite possible that the company were intended to have every remedy against the estate which is known to the law; and in this view the enumeration of different kinds of real securities in this section becomes intelligible. There being no conclusions for real diligence, it follows that the defender is entitled to absolvitor."

section* made a personal action competent, for feu-duties and rents might be recovered in that manner, and by that section the company had the same remedies. The Lord Ordinary's construction of that section was erroneous; if the words "out of the lands" had occurred at the end of the clause it would have been different, but occurring where they did they were merely descriptive of the kind of payments introduced in the section by way of illustration. The 13th section of the Rutherfurd Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), by which an heir having obtained decree for expense of improvements might grant a bond of annualrent, provided a like remedy with the present. It was quite likely that the Legislature should have provided a personal remedy in a case where the annual value of the glebe was enhanced by the improvements. By the 38th section of the Act no one could be called upon to pay more than the enhanced value of the subjects, and only after a certificate by the Commissioners. The intention to make the landowner personally liable for the rent charge was also clear from the 68th section.†

The respondent's argument sufficiently appears from the Lord Ordinary's note and the opinions of the Judges.[1]

Lord President.—The pursuers in this action are a company which was constituted for the purpose of advancing money for the improvement of land by drainage and otherwise. The defender is the present minister of the parish of Urquhart, in Inverness-shire, and the object of the action is to recover the arrears of certain annual charges, being the amount of money advances expended upon the glebe of the parish following upon applications made therefor by his predecessor in 1875 and 1877. The document constituting the ground of action is what is called an absolute order, made by the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, under authority of the Act of Parliament constituting the Drainage Company, and the charge is precisely in terms of the schedule appended to the statute. It bears,—"The Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, in pursuance of the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company's Acts, do,

* The 61st section was,—"Every charge on land by virtue of this Act may be recovered by the Company, or the person for the time being entitled to the same, by the same means and in like manner, in all respects, as any feu-duties, or rent, or annualrent, or other payment out of the same lands, would be recoverable in Scotland."

† Sec. 68.—"Every landowner on whose land a charge shall have been made under this Act, and every heir of entail, or of destination, or liferenter, and other person having a limited interest in the land so charged, shall, as between such person and the persons next entitled to succeed, be bound to pay the yearly or other periodical payments of such charge which become payable during the continuance of his interest, and in case he be in the actual occupation of or entitled to an apportioned part of the rents and profits of such land up to the time of the termination of his interest, shall also be bound to pay an apportioned part of the yearly rent or other periodical payment of such charge which becomes due next after the termination of his interest proportioned to the time which elapsed between the day for the previous payment and the day of such termination: Provided that any such person entitled to succeed, and becoming entitled in possession, shall not be liable to pay any arrears of the charge remaining unpaid at the time of his succession or right to succeed, exceeding the amount of one year's payment of such charge: Provided also that the amount paid by such person in respect of such arrears, and any costs occasioned by non-payment thereof, shall be a debt from the person who, in the first instance, ought to have paid the same, or from his estate, heritable or moveable, to the person who paid the same, and shall be recoverable accordingly."

by this absolute order under their hands and seal, charge the fee of the lands mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto with the payment to the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company, their successors and assignees, of the yearly sum of £16, 8s. 8d., payable half-yearly on the 15th day of May and the 11th day of November in every year, for the term of twenty-five years, and being a proportionate repayment, according to the table annexed, of the capital sum of £245, 5s., with interest at £4, 10s. per centum per annum, the first half-yearly payment to be made on the 15th day of May 1878." That is the whole document, and it constitutes a valid charge or incumbrance upon the glebe of the parish.

The present action is brought for the purpose of recovering the amount of the annual charges from the present incumbent. It is a purely personal action, and is not in any way a proceeding for the purpose of enforcing a charge against the lands—the question being, whether such a personal action is competent.

In the first place, it appears very clear on the face of the document, which is termed an absolute order, that no personal obligation is laid upon anyone. It is nothing but a charge upon the land, and therefore, in so far as the document itself is concerned, there is no room for doubt. But it is said that notwithstanding the terms of the charge, which alone constitutes the debt against the glebe, there are clauses in the Act of Parliament which give the Company authority to sue the existing possessor of the land in a personal action for the amount of the annual charge as it accrues. The charge itself is provided for by the 49th section, and the nature and extent of the security are fixed by the 52d section, which provides that it is to "have priority over every other then existing and future charge and incumbrance whatsoever upon or affecting such lands, except feu-duties, ground-annuals, and other charges incident to tenure, teinds, and any charges created or to be created under any Act authorising advances of public money for drainage, and any charges previously created under the provisions of any Act of Parliament authorising the charging of lands with the expense of and incident to the improvement of lands by or under the sanction of the Inclosure Commissioners respectively, if any." There is thus provided for the Company a very good security, ranking very high among the securities which may affect an heritable subject. But, so far as these clauses are concerned, there is no mention of or reference to anything of the nature of a personal obligation.

But it is said that the 61st section creates a personal obligation of the nature contended for. Before adverting to the terms of that section I think it right to say that where a security is constituted by a form contained in an Act of Parliament which in itself creates no personal obligation against anyone, it would require very clear language in other portions of the statute to extend the nature of the obligation, so as to give a right to enforce it by personal action against the possessor of the lands. One would expect to find the personal obligation expressed in the document itself. Keeping that in view, the words of the 61st section are,—"Every charge on land by virtue of this Act may be recovered by the Company, or the person for the time being entitled to the same, by the same means and in like manner, in all respects, as any feu-duties, or rent, or annualrent, or other payment out of the same lands, would be recoverable in Scotland." Undoubtedly this section deals with the mode of recovery of charges upon land. But it is not concerned with anything else. It does not profess to create any new obligation or to extend the obligation created by the absolute order. The means and manner which are referred to are the means and manner by which certain other things, such as feu-duties, &c., are recoverable—but recoverable "out of the lands." These are the very words of the section. The latter part of the section enacts that the charge may be recovered by the same means and in the like manner as any feu-duties are recoverable out of the lands, or any rent or annualrent or any other payment are recoverable out of the lands. The means and manner are the means and manner by which, according to the law of Scotland, a charge can be recovered out of the land itself and nothing else. The construction I put upon the clause is that all real diligence shall be competent to the Company, but no other form of diligence, and certainly not action or diligence against the person.

I therefore think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

Lord Mure.—I have come to the same conclusion. As your Lordship has pointed out, the charge is here made upon the fee of the lands; and in these circumstances, unless some provision to the contrary is to be found in the other clauses of the Company's Act, such a charge does not warrant a personal action against the holder of the land over which the security has been granted; and I agree with your Lordship that it would require very distinct provisions to that effect to justify the pursuers' contention. There is no doubt some little difficulty created by the terms of the 61st section, from which it might, in one reading of it, be argued that it was intended that the Company should have all the remedies for recovering their advances which a superior has for recovery of his feu-duty. And it was argued that as the payment of feu-duty may be enforced by personal action against the vassal in possession, a personal action was also competent in the present case. On reading the clause carefully, however, it does not appear to me that it must necessarily be held to bear that construction, and I agree with your Lordship in the view you have taken of its meaning.

Lord Adam.—Your Lordship in the chair has exactly expressed the opinion I have formed, and I have nothing to add.

Thomas Stewart, Petitioner.—J. C. Thomson—W. G. Miller.

Husband and Wife—Aliment—Amount.—In an action of separation and aliment against a husband, he agreed by joint minute to pay to his wife £250 per annum as aliment for herself and the two children of the marriage, who resided with her. The agreement was given effect to in an interlocutor granting decree of separation. Three years later he presented a petition to have the aliment restricted. His income having been ascertained to amount to £430 per annum, and his wife having no means of her own, the Court restricted the aliment to £150 per annum, although the husband had failed to prove that his income was less than at the date of the agreement.

In an action of separation and aliment by Mrs Jane M'Cubbin or Stewart against her husband, Thomas Stewart, a hatter in Glasgow, the Lord Ordinary (Lee), on 28th February 1884, pronounced decree of separation:—"And in respect of the joint minute for the parties, decerns and ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £250 per annum as aliment for herself and for the maintenance of Mary and Jane, the two children of the marriage between the pursuer and defender, who reside with her, payable said aliment in advance during the joint lives of the pursuer and defender, at the terms, in the proportions, and with the interest specified in the conclusions for aliment."

The sum of £250 was fixed as aliment by joint minute between the parties entered into subsequent to proof being led, but before the interlocutor was pronounced,—the amount being adjusted on the understanding that it was to cover the maintenance of the two children, who resided with Mrs Stewart.

In May 1886, Stewart presented a petition to the First Division of the Court to have the amount of aliment restricted, alleging that when the joint minute was adjusted he was sanguine that his income would increase,—otherwise he would not have consented to give so much as £250; that owing to the depression of trade, and other circumstances, his business had been unsuccessful, and he had made heavy losses, in consequence of which he had not paid the aliment due at or since Whitsunday 1886. He suggested £52 as a fair and reasonable amount of aliment.

Mrs Stewart denied that the petitioner's income had suffered the alleged reduction, and submitted that the application should be refused.

The Court, on 3d July 1886, remitted to Mr Moore, C.A., Glasgow, to inquire into the circumstances of the parties, and report.

On 31st October 1887, Mr Moore reported that the pursuer carried on a cash sale business as a hatter and hosier in three shops in Glasgow, his income therefrom being approximately about £200 per annum; that his income apart from his business was about £230 per annum; and that Mrs Stewart appeared to have no means other than her allowance from the petitioner.[1]

Lord President.—The peculiarity of this case seems to me to be that the husband consented to aliment his wife at the rate of £250 per annum, and that this agreement was given judicial effect to. He has not succeeded in proving that his income is less now than it was then. At the same time we are bound to give effect to the report which is before us, and which establishes the fact that the petitioner's present income does not exceed £430. In these circumstances, the opinion of the Court is that the alimentary allowance should be reduced to £150 per annum.

Lord Mure and Lord Adam concurred.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—" Restrict the aliment to be paid by the petitioner to his said wife to £150 per annum as from and after Martinmas 1887."

Arbitration—Lease—Waygoing crop—Reference to man of skill—Power to take evidence.—In a reduction of a decreet-arbitral following upon a reference to two men of skill as arbiters under a lease as to the value of a waygoing crop, the pursuer averred that parties were not heard, that only one of the arbiters had seen the crop after it had been cut, and that no evidence had been led as to its value. Held that no relevant ground for reduction had been stated, and action dismissed.

Observed that it would have been incompetent to lead evidence.

1st Division.
Lord M'Laren.
M.

JOHN LOGAN was tenant of the farm of Legerwood, Berwickshire, under a lease which expired in 1886, when he was succeeded in the farm by Hugh M. Leadbetter. In Logan's lease there was the usual clause to the effect that at its expiry the waygoing crop should be delivered over "either to the proprietor or to the incoming tenant as the proprietor shall fix, upon valuation by two persons of skill to be mutually chosen, or by an oversman to be appointed by them in case of difference in opinion, and the arbiters shall fix the time for valuing the crop, and the price that shall be so fixed by them shall be payable to the outgoing tenant according to the custom of the county, or if any doubt shall arise then according to the judgment and decision of the said mutually chosen valuators or oversman."

By submission entered into in May 1886 between Logan on the one hand and Leadbetter and Mr John Lowson junior, the proprietor of the farm, on the other, various claims between the two parties were submitted to two arbiters mutually chosen. Inter alia, the sum to be paid to Logan by Leadbetter for the last year's crop was submitted.

In the course of the arbitration the arbiters issued various notes of award—that dealing with the waygoing crop being issued on 29th April 1887. Logan took exception to it on various points, and on 3d June following he lodged specific objections to it, asking to be allowed to prove that the deduction proposed to be made from the value of the crop for bad weather was too high, and that the prices allowed for the oat and barley crops did not represent a fair value, &c.

The arbiters met on 10th June, and the minute of their meeting bore,—"The arbiters, after consulting the oversman, who has been present at all their meetings, resolved to refuse Mr Logan's motion for proof on the ground that they already know from their own experience the whole facts that could be submitted, and that it is therefore unnecessary." On 17th June they issued a decreet-arbitral determining the questions at issue.

Logan thereafter brought this reduction of the decreet-arbitral, calling Leadbetter and the proprietor as defenders, and alleging, inter alia,—(Cond. 8) "During the whole proceedings of the reference no written claims for the parties were given in or ordered, and parties were not heard. No proof was led as to their respective claims. The inspection made by the arbiters was not such as could enable them to ascertain and fix fairly and accurately the value of the crops. Only one of the arbiters saw the crops after being cut, and the other was therefore wholly unable to judge of their value, or of the amount of deduction that should be made."

He pleaded;—(1) The proceedings in the said submission and reference having been irregular, and the arbiters having acted in a wrongful and unjust manner, the said decreet-arbitral ought to be reduced. (2) In respect that the matters referred to the arbiters required investigation, and that they wrongfully and unjustly decided thereon without evidence tendered by the pursuer, the said decreet-arbitral ought to be reduced, or at least ought to be reduced in so far as it relates to the value allowed for the said waygoing crop.

The defender Leadbetter, who alone lodged defences, pleaded;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are not relevant to sustain the conclusions of the summons. (2) The reference in question having been expressly to men of skill to make a valuation, they were not bound to allow the parties to lead evidence, and particularly to lead evidence on the points mentioned by the pursuer in his objections of 3d June 1887, nor were they bound to hear parties, and their procedure has therefore been competent and regular, and their award is valid.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 8th November 1887, before answer, allowed a proof.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—No relevant ground for a reduction was stated. Written claims were not necessary in a reference like the present to men of skill. Besides, written objections had been given in, heard, and considered. Such references for the purpose of valuation only were different from references to arbiters to determine questions in dispute between two parties.[1] Proof was not necessary.

The respondent argued;—The arbiters here had declined to ascertain matters of fact. The case of Wm. Dixon, Limited,[1] dealt with a wholly different class of contract from the present, and was not in point. In Nivison's case[1] all that was held was that formalities were not necessary in a reference. Proof of the averments in cond. 8 ought to be allowed. Clearly the important time to value a crop was when it was being reaped, or subsequently. It was not enough that one of the arbiters should then inspect it. Both ought to have done so.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very clear case indeed, especially as it is now reduced to the objections which are stated in the 8th article of the condescendence. A number of matters were submitted to the arbiters, but the objections now before us relate entirely to the value of the waygoing crop. That part of the submission is simply a valuation, and whenever two men of skill are appointed to value a subject which is to be handed from one person to another, not only is it unnecessary to take evidence, but it is incompetent. The matter which is submitted is the value of a certain subject, and it is so submitted to arbiters because they have the necessary experience and skill to enable them to form an opinion in regard to it. What they did in the present case was quite proper. They disposed of the other matters falling within the submission, and they valued the waygoing crop, estimating the number of bushels it contained, and making a certain deduction on account of bad weather, and then putting a price and value upon the whole, subject to that deduction. They then issued their award in the form of notes. The pursuer thereafter lodged his objections, and the arbiters, having reconsidered their determination, adhered to their former opinion as to the amount of the valuation.

The objections are now reduced to the averments which are made in the 8th article of the condescendence. As to the want of written claims, and the refusal of the arbiters to admit proof, it is needless to say that both were quite superfluous, if not incompetent, in a reference which related only to the value of a waygoing crop. So that the objections are thus reduced to the single averment that "only one of the arbiters saw the crops after being cut, and the other was therefore wholly unable to judge of their value or of the amount of deduc-tion which should be made." Now, assuming that this averment is true, what is the result of it? Of course it impliedly admits that both arbiters saw and inspected the crop while it was standing, and I know no point of time at which it was more necessary that they should inspect it than when it was standing. No doubt it is also very important to see how the crop fares when it has been harvested and lodged in the stackyard, but it seems to me that for this purpose the visit of one arbiter is amply sufficient. The objection appears to me to be of a most flimsy nature; none more so could be stated.

Lord Mure concurred.

Lord Adam.—I concur with your Lordship. This is not a case of a reference of questions in dispute between the parties, but it is simply a reference to men of skill to value a waygoing crop. I think it is incompetent to lead evidence before the arbiters in such circumstances. The duty of the arbiters is simply to go and see the waygoing crop they are to value, and to judge with their own eyes what price ought to be put upon it. I do not think the position of the arbiters could be better explained than in the words of their own minute of meeting when they disposed of the pursuer's objections and of his application to have a proof allowed. The arbiters say that they "resolved to refuse Mr Logan's motion for proof on the ground that they already know from their own experience the whole facts that could be submitted, and that it is therefore unnecessary."

The only objection now insisted on by the pursuer is that which is stated at the end of condescendence 8—that one of the arbiters did not see the crop after it was cut. I do not think we can set aside this award on any such ground as that. Further, there was no refusal to hear parties in the ordinary sense of hearing them upon the whole case. The only refusal was to delay the proceedings in order to hear the pursuer's agent on his motion to be allowed to lead proof, and I think that in so refusing the arbiters acted rightly.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; further, repelled the reasons of reduction as irrelevant; dismissed the action accordingly, and decerned, &c.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

In an action of damages at the instance of Arthur M'Arthur against James Boucher for wrongous sequestration, brought in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) on 17th November 1887 allowed a proof.

On 22d November the defender appealed to the Sheriff.

On 23d November the pursuer appealed under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, 1825, to the First Division of the Court of Session.

When the case was called in the Single Bills of the First Division the defender objected to the competency of the appeal, maintaining that there was no standing interlocutor allowing proof. The provisions of the 40th section of the Judicature Act could not be taken advantage of after a case had been appealed to the Sheriff.[1]

The pursuer replied that the defender could not suffer if the appeal to the Court of Session were allowed, because that Court could review any judgment which had been pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute before the appeal was taken.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The privilege given to either of the parties in an inferior Court process by the 40th section of the Judicature Act (6 George, IV., cap. 120), where the claim amounts to more than £40, is as soon as an interlocutor has been pronounced allowing a proof to remove the process into the Court of Session by bill of advocation, and now by appeal. The meaning of that provision certainly is not that there shall be any review of a judgment, but that the process shall be brought here for the purpose of becoming a Court of Session process, and being brought to an end here by a verdict and judgment. But the condition of that privilege is that an interlocutor has been pronounced allowing or appointing proof. The answer here made is that there is no final interlocutor in the Sheriff Court allowing proof, because the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute is under appeal, and may be altered when the Sheriff's judgment is pronounced. Accordingly, the very foundation of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor may be removed, and I am therefore of opinion that the present appeal cannot be brought at this stage.

LORD MURE.—The 40th section of the Judicature Act contemplates that there is to be an operative and effective interlocutor before the appeal is taken. The moment an interlocutor is appealed, it ceases to be operative. The appeal to the Sheriff preceded the appeal to this Court, and I am of opinion that we cannot entertain the latter.

LORD ADAM concurred.

Reparation—Wrongous use of Diligence—Lease.—A tenant of grazings agreed with his landlord in writing to have a certain amount of stock always on the ground while the rent remained unpaid. He also granted a bill for the rent. The bill having fallen due, and being unpaid, the landlord presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant to sell the stock to an amount sufficient to pay the rent and expenses. The Sheriff,—no appearance being made for the tenant,—granted warrant to sell so much of the stock as would meet the debt and expenses of process and sale, and the sale was carried out, and the proceedings reported to the Sheriff by the person appointed by him as judge of the roup. The tenant thereafter raised an action of damages against the landlord, on the grounds (1) that the warrant of sale was illegal, as being granted while he was still tenant of the grazing and in possession of the stock; (2) that in any view it was illegally carried out since the stock had been sold in an improper manner, and to an extent greatly exceeding the amount of the debt; (3) that the defender had verbally agreed, before the sale began, to accept a certain sum as in full of his debt and expenses, which sum was to be sent for from a neighbouring bank by a friend of the tenant who was present, and had only to send for the money, but that the defender had broken this agreement and instructed the sale to be proceeded with, without allowing time for the money to be brought, the result being, as the pursuer averred, that his stock was sacrificed at a low price, and his credit much injured.

The Court (aff. judgment of Lord Fraser) dismissed the action as irrelevant, Lord Rutherfurd Clark dissenting on the grounds (1) that the stock was, according to the pursuer's averment, in his possession as tenant of the grazing, and not in the defender's, when the warrant was granted; (2) that he had not by his non-appearance to oppose it assented to its being granted; and (3) that the warrant, assuming its legality, had, according to the pursuer's averment, been so carried out that the defender ought to be put to justify it.

2D DIVISION. Lord Fraser. M.

JOHN KENNEDY, farmer and cattle-dealer, Soillerie, near Kingussie, raised an action for reduction of a warrant, pronounced on 13th May 1887 by the Sheriff-substitute of Morayshire at Elgin, granting warrant to the defender, Alexander Creyk, to sell by public roup sheep stock belonging to the pursuer and a man named William Cameron, and which had been at that date upon the farm of Dalvey, of which the defender was tacksman, and further, whether the warrant should be reduced or not, for damages, which he laid at £1200.

The pursuer averred that the defender was tacksman of Dalvey and Tominoird Plantation adjoining it, and that he had sublet Tominoird Plantation to him and Cameron for the period from 13th April 1885 to Whitsunday 1886, and also the winter grazing on Dalvey from 1st November 1885 to Whitsunday 1886, the rent for the latter being £140, payable by three months' bill, to be granted at 1st January 1886; that he and Cameron had possessed these grazings and had sheep thereon belonging to other parties, for whom they were grazing the sheep under the care of their shepherds; that at 30th December 1885 the half year's rent of Tominoird was paid, and of the same date an agreement was entered into between the defender on one hand and the pursuer and Cameron on the other whereby the pursuer and Cameron agreed that so long as the rent of £140 remained unpaid they would leave upon it 300 head of sheep, at least, against the rent; that on same date, 30th December, the three months' bill for the £140 rent, dated 1st January, was granted.

The pursuer further averred, that in April 1886 the defender applied to the Sheriff at Elgin for and obtained an interdict against him and Cameron removing sheep from the grazing so as to reduce the number below 300 head until the £140 rent should be paid, and that on 5th May 1886 the defender presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant at the sight of a person to be appointed by the Sheriff to sell by public roup the sheep stock belonging to the pursuer and Cameron, and then upon the defender's land, and after deducting the expenses of process and sale, to apply the proceeds in payment of the £140 rent; that the petition was served on him, but not having legal advice, or having time to instruct an agent, he did not appear, and that on 13th May the Sheriff, on the defender's motion, and in respect of no appearance for the pursuer and Cameron, granted warrant to the Sheriff-clerk-depute at Grantown (Mr William Fleming), to sell by public roup "as many of the sheep mentioned in the petition as will satisfy and pay the rent claimed, and the expenses of process and sale," and appointed the sale to take place at Grantown on 31st May after advertisement; that the only grounds for the petition were that the pursuer and Cameron were the defender's subtenants, and had made the agreement to leave 300 sheep on the grazing so long as the rent was unpaid; and that the rent was past due, and was unpaid.

The pursuer then averred that the warrant of sale was wholly illegal and not according to any form of lawful diligence, but that the defender proceeded to carry it out by removing, on 31st May, the whole sheep on the grazing to Grantown for sale, which sheep included a large number, specified by the pursuer, which belonged to various persons, also specified, who had arranged with the pursuer and Cameron to have them grazed on the grazing let to them; that when the sheep were brought to Grantown for sale on 31st May, the true owners of certain of them claimed them as theirs from the defender and Fleming, but without avail; that the pursuer, in order to prevent the sale, offered the defender instantly to pay the £140, together with the balance due on another bill between the parties, and with a sum in full of expenses and all sums due by him and Cameron; that he had arranged with a Mr M'Dougall, merchant, Grantown, who was present at the sale, to make payment for him of £205, and that the defender agreed to this, and that M'Dougall was ready at once to send to the bank in Grantown for the money; that he was, as the defender well knew, quite good for the amount, and ready to pay it at once; that after instructing Mr Fleming to accept the £205, the defender, either in consequence of Fleming's advice or at the instigation of someone else who had come to bid, and wished the sale to proceed, changed his mind, "and in breach of the said arrangement, and in disregard of the offer made by and on behalf of the pursuer of full payment of his claims, the defender wrongfully and illegally caused the sale to be proceeded with, and although he was entitled under the said warrant only to sell for the said sum of £140 and expenses, he wrongfully and illegally caused the whole of the said sheep to be exposed in one lot."

The pursuer then averred that in order to prevent the sheep from being sold to a third party and passing beyond his control, M'Dougall took part on his behalf in the bidding for the sheep, that after the price reached £234, M'Dougall ceased bidding, and he himself continued the bidding till the price reached £245, when Mr Fleming objected to his bidding and caused it to be put back to £234, at which price the sheep, including those belonging to other persons than the pursuer, were knocked down to a man M'Donald; that notwithstanding that the defender had by his illegal, wrongous, and injurious proceedings caused serious loss to him and realised by the sale a sum greatly in excess of the amount referred to in the warrant of sale, the defender had proceeded to do diligence on another bill for £75, granted for the rents of the Tominoird plantation and certain damage to turnips, and caused a poinding to be executed of the pursuer's cattle and furniture at his farm of Soillerie, to stop the further execution of which the pursuer paid that bill with the expenses. He then averred that in consequence of the proceedings of the defender his credit had been seriously injured and much loss caused to him, that prior to the proceedings complained of he had been an extensive cattle-dealer in good credit, but since the granting of the warrant of sale, and since the poinding, his business and reputation had been irretrievably hurt.

He averred that the sheep illegally and wrongfully sold were worth £350, that he was liable to their owners for such of them as were not his own, that after deducting £140 from the £350, there remained £210 of loss to him on the sale of sheep alone.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said warrant of sale, and whole grounds and warrants thereof, being illegal, the pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction as craved. (3) Separatim, The defender having in breach of his agreement with the pursuer, as narrated in condescendence 10, caused the said sheep to be sold, and the pursuer having thereby suffered loss and damage, the pursuer is entitled to recover compensation therefor from the defender.

The defender pleaded that the pursuer's statements were irrelevant; that the proceedings at his instance had been lawful and regular, and that the pursuer was barred by acquiescence and by his own actings from maintaining that they were irregular.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and further that he is barred by his own actings from insisting on the irregularity of the proceedings complained of: therefore dismisses the action."*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The warrant of sale was irregular; it was an attempt to enforce something of the nature of a conventional hypothec of a kind unknown to the law. The defender might have done diligence on his £140 bill, but he preferred to take a course for which he had no right to obtain judicial authority, and the Sheriff no right to authorise. The Lord Ordinary said the sheep were on the defender's farm of Dalvey as a pledge for the payment of the rent. But there could be no pledge without possession, and possession the defender could not have if the pursuer were right in the averment, which he asked leave to prove, that he was tenant till the Whitsunday following the date 5th May, when the defender presented his petition to the Sheriff.

(2) It was said that the pursuer should have appeared and objected to the defender obtaining the warrant from the Sheriff. His reason for not doing so was that he was in temporary difficulties, from which he was now free, and also, as he stated on record, that he did not know his legal right to have the warrant refused. But in any view it was no defence for obtaining an illegal warrant wrongfully that the other party had been cited to appear.

* "NOTE.— . . . The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the objection to the proceedings is not well founded, and that decree of reduction of the warrant of the Sheriff-substitute cannot be granted. The sheep were upon the farm as a pledge for the payment of the rent. The debt was constituted by the bill which was overdue at the time when the sale took place. The pursuer's right of possession of the grazings had terminated, and the sheep were in the defender's possession at that time. As the sheep required at once to be attended to, it was a very proper course to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant to sell them.

"The pursuer is, moreover, barred from stating any objection to the course which was adopted. He lay by, and entered no appearance, and stated no objection to the granting of the warrant. After advertisements were sent out intimating that the sale would take place, no step was adopted by him in the way of preventing it, either by getting the warrant recalled or otherwise. Nay, further, he attended at the roup, and was himself a bidder, without any protest against the carrying out of the warrant, except stating that some of the sheep that were offered for sale did not belong to him, but to other persons named. If this were the case, the owners of these sheep may have their remedy against the defender. It is therefore in vain in these circumstances to insist in an action of reduction at the instance of a party who has so conducted himself.

"The averment of the pursuer in article 10 of an agreement between him and the defender to postpone the sale is not relevant, in respect that there is no averment of a tender of the money. It is probable enough that there may have been some conversation as to delaying the sale, but without an offer of the money the averment is not relevant. The people had assembled, and everything was ready for the roup. Unless the pursuer is able to aver, which he has not done, that he then and there produced the money due, there is nothing stated which requires proof."

He was not bound to appear, but might properly let the applicant take the risk of his own proceedings.

(3) Even if the warrant had been legal, it was harshly and oppressively carried out. That might be the case with the enforcement of a judicial warrant.[1] The pursuer had relevantly averred an agreement by the defender to wait till M'Dougall could go to the bank a short distance off for the money to meet the claim, and that the defender had then broken that agreement, and pressed on the sale. It would also be proved that M'Dougall had plenty of money lying in the bank to meet the claim. It would be said that the pursuer by bidding acquiesced in the sale, but he was only doing his best to avoid a ruinous sacrifice of the sheep threatened notwithstanding his remonstrances, and his bids were indeed declined by the judge of the roup. Again, the warrant was, in any view of it, only to sell "as many of the sheep mentioned in the petition as will satisfy and pay the rent claimed, and the expenses of process and sale," and the defender had sold the whole of them, and that in one lot, at a price of £234, while the debt was only £140. This margin for expenses was far beyond what was reasonable, and the defender was in any view of it bound to act with reasonable regard to the interest of his debtor, as Le Conte's case[1] shewed.

On the first point the defender was not called on. On the question of the regularity of the execution of the warrant he maintained that the judge of the roup having decided that the sale should go on, and that the sale of the sheep in one lot was expedient, and would not produce too great a sum for the debt and expenses, the Court would not interfere with his discretion. The pursuer should in any view have appeared and objected before the Sheriff when the report of the sale was approved of. The averment as to the alleged agreement to stop the sale was not relevant.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only point on which I have felt any difficulty is as to the quantity of sheep sold,—whether there was any oppressive use of the interlocutor ordering the sale in the sale of more sheep than was necessary to pay the debt and the expenses. But I am satisfied that there was nothing unusual or irregular in what was done, and, beyond that, there was a person appointed as judge of the roup who had a part to perform, and who was the person at whose discretion that was done.

There is a matter which is not cleared up as to the averment that a number of the sheep sold belonged to others than the pursuer. Whether that was so or not we do not know, but the presumption is that all the sheep belonged to the pursuer, and so far as that matter goes no sufficient objection has been stated. As to the sale having produced more money than was necessary, and as to the sheep being all sold in one lot, I may remark that it may quite well be that the sheep brought more money, and not less, because they were sold in that way, and were not sold by head. But that was a matter for the judge of the roup, and I am not disposed with regard to it to interfere with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Again, I am clear that the averment of an agreement at the sale to stop the proceedings on payment of a certain sum is not relevant. I think the pursuer brought this alleged misfortune of which he now complains upon himself by not appearing before the Sheriff (or indeed up till the very time of the sale) to make his voice heard against the proceedings upon which he now brings this action.

Kennedy v. Creyk.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is according to the truth and justice of the case, and it has not been impeached on any ground which is, to my mind, satisfactory.

The facts are in a very narrow compass. The defender was tenant of a farm, the winter grazing on which he let to the pursuer for £140, which was payable on 1st April. A bill was agreed to be granted for that rent on 1st January, payable on 1st April. In security also for payment of that rent the pursuer undertook by a written obligation, which is, to my mind, quite sufficient for the purpose, to leave at least 300 sheep on the farm. The bill was dishonoured when it became due, and the rent continued unpaid on 5th May, and the pursuer then proceeded to realise his security. The debt was past due, and the sheep were a security on the defender's farm under the written obligation of the owner not to remove them. I am of opinion that the defender took a proper course (though it is not necessary to decide that) in treating the sheep as a pledge left by their owner on the farm, and in applying to the Sheriff as he did; it was at least not a lawless proceeding. The defender applied to a Court of justice to do justice, and applied in a manner for which there is sufficient analogy, and he called the present pursuer as a party to state any objection he might have to a warrant being granted. The pursuer did not appear, and the Sheriff then held his non-appearance, as is customary in legal proceedings, as confession that he had no objection to state, and was consenting to the order being granted. The remedy craved was then granted in the usual way and with the usual precautions, for the Sheriff appointed the sale to proceed to the extent which should satisfy and pay the rent due and the expenses at the sight of the Sheriff-clerk-depute at Grantown after certain advertisement, and appointed a report to be made of the proceedings. The Sheriff-clerk-depute proceeded to execute the order to sell, and to do so, I must assume in the absence of any specific statement to the contrary, regularly and properly. He sold as many as he thought proper. No doubt he sold what would have appeared to me at first sight an extra number; but on that matter I am not so good a judge as he is, and to him the Sheriff had committed it. He reported the sale and then this pursuer entered appearance in that process for the purpose of discussing the expenses of the proceedings and for no other purpose. Now, if he had had any complaint against the Sheriff-clerk-depute's manner of conducting the sale he ought to have complained to the Sheriff in that process. But he did nothing of the sort. He raised a question as to the expenses of the sale which the Sheriff determined, and ordered the debt and the expenses to be paid, and this in presence of the pursuer. After that he comes here with this action asking us to set aside the proceedings at the sale as lawless, and saying that it was an illegal thing to go to the Sheriff as the defender did. I think he cannot be heard to say that now. He should have stated his objection before the Sheriff.

If therefore it had been necessary to decide whether the application to the Sheriff was legal I should have held that it was, but it is not necessary to decide that. So far as the pursuer's case depends on the objection to the legality of the Sheriff's warrant I am against it, and I cannot entertain his objection to the conduct of the proceedings by the Sheriff-clerk-depute, either as a ground of reduction or as a ground of damages. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer's demand for an issue should be refused.

Lord Craighill.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordships.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I daresay the judgment which is to be pronounced by your Lordships will be best for the parties, as it will save them both the expense of a jury trial. But I confess I am not satisfied with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, or with the reasons which have just been stated for affirming it.

The first question is as to the legality of the warrant to sell the sheep. It is said that the sheep were intended to be a security for the rent. So they were. But up to the 15th of May—I take, as I am bound to do, the statements of the pursuer—he, the pursuer, was in possession of the grazing on the defender's farm, and therefore the sheep were in his, the pursuer's, possession. They were not in the defender's possession so long as the pursuer was tenant of the grazing. I therefore think it impossible to hold that these sheep were, as the Lord Ordinary says they were, a "pledge" with the defender upon the farm "for the payment of the rent," because it is clear that in order to constitute a pledge there must be possession, and possession the defender had none. If the sheep had been pledged to the defender he might have applied to the Sheriff for a warrant to sell them, but on that footing only, and I think there was no justification for his application to the Sheriff for warrant to sell the property of another person which was not in his possession. It is a new idea to me that such a course was legal. What other course was open to the defender I do not require to discuss. All I have to decide is whether the course actually taken was legal, and I confess I cannot hold that it was. I think the warrant was illegal.

Again, I do not think this illegal proceeding is made unobjectionable by the fact that the defender in it, the pursuer here, did not think it necessary to appear. That being so, the pursuer is, I think, entitled to redress.

But if I am wrong in holding the warrant to be illegal, I think that the pursuer is entitled to an issue, because, according to the allegation of the pursuer, it was executed in an oppressive way. It was a warrant to sell by public roup "as many of the sheep mentioned in the petition as will satisfy and pay the rent claimed, and the expenses of process and, sale." It was a warrant for nothing else. And yet the sheep were sold to the extent of £67 more than was necessary for that purpose. It may be possible to justify what was done, but prima facie it was unjustifiable. I think the defender ought to be put to justify what he did. In the absence of justification I cannot hold that the warrant was fairly or reasonably executed.

It is suggested that the pursuer has lost his remedy by not having stated his objection in time. This is grounded on the fact that he did not, when the sale was reported to the Sheriff, make any complaint of the manner in which it was conducted. But I fail to see what he could have said effectually at that stage. The wrong was done. It was impossible to undo it. He could not have brought it before the Sheriff to any other effect than to get a censure passed upon the Sheriff-clerk-depute, who had been appointed judge of the roup. But he is not seeking that. He is seeking damages, and the Sheriff would not, on the report of the sale being made to him, have listened to the objection which it is suggested the pursuer should have made.

Therefore, while sorry to differ from your Lordships, the opinion which I have formed is, that the pursuer is entitled to an issue. In a contract of sale of a refrigerating machine, the seller agreed not to sell a second within the same district for some years. Having broken this bargain and sold another, he was sued by the buyer of the first machine for damages for breach of contract, and paid a sum in name of damages. Held that he could not be sued in a second action for further damages arising out of the same breach subsequently to the first action.

M.

IN February 1884 Mr Duncan Stevenson, ice-merchant in Glasgow, contracted with Messrs Pontifex & Wood, engineers in London, to supply him with a Pontifex refrigerating machine. Pontifex & Wood undertook by the contract that they would not, without the pursuer's consent, supply any machine which to their knowledge was to be erected within ten miles of the Cross of Glasgow, and which was intended to be used for making ice for sale, for five years from the date of the contract.

In contravention of that undertaking a machine was in the beginning of 1885 supplied to Messrs F. W. Verel & Company, Cathcart, near Glasgow, who thereafter manufactured ice for sale in competition with Stevenson.

On 16th July 1886 Stevenson brought an action of damages in the Court of Session against Pontifex & Wood for that breach of contract, in which he estimated the loss thereby occasioned to him at £3000.* In that action the defenders tendered to the pursuer £250 in full of his claims under the conclusions of the summons, and agreed to the pursuer's being assoilzied from the conclusions of a summons in an action against him at their instance for a sum of £290, being the balance of the price of the machinery supplied to him. The tender and agreement were accepted by the pursuer, and the case taken out of Court.

On 26th March 1887 Stevenson raised another action against Pontifex & Wood, concluding for £650 of damages, the averments in which were as follows:—(Cond. 7) "Since said 16th July 1886, and down to the present date, the said F. W. Verel & Company have continued to manufacture ice with the machinery supplied to them by the defenders, in competition with the pursuer, have undersold the pursuer in the market, and have thus by the defenders' said breach of contract injured the pursuer's trade to a very great extent, and have reduced his profits. The loss sustained by the pursuer between the two dates last mentioned amounts to a sum of not less than £650, being the sum sued for." (Cond. 8) " . . . The sum tendered and accepted in the action above mentioned included, and was intended by both parties to include, only the damages therein sued for, viz., damage suffered prior to the date of the action. . . ."

* The pursuer's averment in that action was,—"Notwithstanding the obligations undertaken by them in the above-mentioned article of the contract, the defenders, in or about the beginning of the year 1885, supplied to Messrs F. W. Verel & Company, Cathcart, near Glasgow, ice-making machinery similar to that supplied to the pursuer. Messrs Verel & Company have thus been enabled to manufacture ice in competition with the pursuer, have undersold the pursuer in the market, and have thus to a very great extent injured his trade and reduced his profits. Cathcart is within the prescribed limit of ten miles from Glasgow. The defenders have thus violated the terms of the said contract. The loss occasioned to the pursuer by this breach of contract he estimates at not less than £3000."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having through the defenders' breach of contract condescended on suffered loss and damage to the extent sued for, he is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) In respect of the proceedings in the former action and the settlement thereof, the defenders should be assoilzied. (2) It is incompetent to sue, as the pursuer claims right to do, for partial damages for one alleged breach of contract.

The Lord Ordinary (M'Laren), on 15th June 1877, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's claims under the cause of action libelled are satisfied and discharged by the payment founded on in defence: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—The defenders are makers of 'refrigerating machines,' or machines for making ice in commercial quantities, one of which they sold to the pursuer on 2d February 1884, giving at the same time an obligation not to sell any other machine which to their knowledge was to be erected within ten miles of the Cross of Glasgow, and which was intended to be used for the purpose of making ice for sale. In the year 1885 the defenders (apparently through inadvertence) supplied to Messrs F. W. Verel & Co., Cathcart, near Glasgow, an ice-making machine in breach of this obligation.

"On 16th July 1886 the pursuer raised in the Court of Session an action of damages against the defenders, concluding for payment to him of £4983, 18s. 3d., whereof £3000 is stated to be damages for breach of contract, consisting in the supplying an ice machine to Messrs Verel. This action was compromised by the defenders paying £250, and also discharging a claim of £290, 12s. 4d., being the balance of the contract price of the machine supplied to the pursuer.

"The pursuer now sues the defenders for £650, being damages accrued from the date of the institution of the former action, 16th July 1886, to the date of the institution of the present action, 26th March 1887; and the question is, whether such a claim can be successfully maintained after the compromise of the first action, or whether that compromise does not amount to a discharge of all claims arising out of the sale of an ice-making machine to Messrs Verel.

"The compromise was in general terms for a payment of a sum of money in full of the conclusions of the action, and the question whether this compromise covers emerging damages will depend, apparently, on the terms of the first summons, the amount of the claim made in that summons, and the probabilities of the case.

"In the first summons, the averments are consistent with the supposition that the conclusions were intended to embrace the whole claims arising out of this breach of contract, except that in claiming damages this expression is used: 'The loss occasioned to the pursuer by this breach of contract he estimates at not less than £3000.' It is said on the one side that where a claim is made for damages past and future, it is usual to state the claim as being for damage 'sustained and to be sustained.' It is observed, on the other side, that there is here no reservation of a right to sue for further damages.

Stevenson v. Pontifex & Wood.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The question was whether the transaction by minute of tender and acceptance in the former action discharged the whole claim of damages arising out of the breach of contract. The averments and the terms of the tender and acceptance supported the view that the discharge only covered the period up to the date of bringing the action. There was no averment or plea as to future loss in that action. It was expressly limited to the past, and covered only the eighteen months prior to its being brought. No inference adverse to the pursuer was to be drawn from the amount of the claim in the former action, as he could not then know the extent of the injury done to him by the sale to Verel & Co.[1] The only other case of the kind which had occurred was that of Bruce v. Duncan, 1793, Hume's Decns. 596, where it was held that the same slander could not be made the ground of successive actions, but that did not apply here. If the damage sued for was not a necessary result of the original breach—which was the case here, for the pursuer could not foresee the extent to which it had been carried,—then a second action was competent.[2] Where a statute limited the time within which an action might be brought, and the damage did not appear till later, then the period of limitation fell to be computed from the time when the injury was sustained.[3]

If the above contention were given effect to, the reclaimer further asked leave to amend his record, or to be allowed to raise a supplementary action with the view of embracing in his claim all future damages.

The respondents argued;—The same breach of contract as was founded

"There is nothing in the first summons that would suggest to the defenders that the pursuer had not brought forward all his claims against them, unless this is to be implied from the use of the expression 'loss occasioned.' I think that the defenders were entitled to insist that the pursuer should bring forward his whole claim, and that if it had been explained that the summons was not meant to cover future damage, the Judge would most probably have amended the record, or would have sisted process in order that a supplementary action might be brought. But I am not convinced that the pursuer by the use of the words 'loss occasioned,' meant anything different from damage sustained and to be sustained. I cannot be sure that 'occasioned' is a limitation of the claim to past damages, because the expression is not grammatical. It is a case of a substantive used as a verb, without, as I think, any definite relation to tense or time; and the meaning is: The loss to the pursuer on this occasion, or on the occasions of this breach of contract, is £3000.

"I am confirmed in this opinion by the consideration that the sum claimed, £3000, is much larger than anyone could reasonably claim for the actual loss of profit consequent on the competition of another firm during the period of a few months. I am also of opinion that it is very improbable that the defenders would have agreed to a compromise if it had been understood that the pursuer was entitled to bring forward fresh claims of damage in respect of the same breach of contract. This is, indeed, so clear that the compromise cannot possibly stand if the present action is to proceed. But it is, in my opinion, more accordant with the meaning of the parties, and with the justice of the case, that the compromise should be sustained as a compromise of all claims of damage arising out of the sale of the ice-making machine to Messrs Verel. . . .

"The judgment will be that the damages sued for are discharged, and that the defenders are assoilzied from the action, with expenses."

on in the former case was the ground of the present action. Jackson's case,[1] founded on by the pursuer, was a very special one,—as the obligation there undertaken by the seller was to supply a certain amount of coal daily, and there was a continuing loss. The principle of the cases of Bruce (Hume's Decns. 596) and Hambleton (2 Saunders' Reps. 169), and Hodsoll (11 A. & E. 301) applied,—that principle was that in order to the competency of a second action there must be a new wrong. Damage per se, apart from the wrongful act, would not be a foundation for an action.[2] In all actions of damage for injury the claim included all damage present and future. According to the argument of the reclaimer, future damage was not so included, but the rule to this effect was beyond doubt.[3]

At advising,—

Lord President.—The defenders, who are manufacturers of refrigerating machines, sold one such machine to the pursuer in February 1884 under a written contract, which provided as one of its conditions that for five years from the date of the contract the defenders should not supply any of their machines to be erected within a ten miles radius of Glasgow for the purpose of making ice for sale. This condition was violated in the beginning of 1885 by the defenders supplying one such machine to be used at Cathcart, within the prescribed limit, to a firm named Verel & Company, by whom the machine was used for manufacturing ice for sale in competition with the pursuer.

On 16th July 1886 the pursuer raised an action of damages against the defenders in which the cause of action and claim of damages is thus stated on record:—"Notwithstanding the obligations undertaken by them in the above-mentioned article of the contract, the defenders, in or about the beginning of the year 1885, supplied to Messrs F. W. Verel & Company, Cathcart, near Glasgow, ice-making machinery similar to that supplied to the pursuer. Messrs Verel & Company have thus been enabled to manufacture ice in competition with the pursuer, have undersold the pursuer in the market, and have thus to a very great extent injured his trade and reduced his profits. Cathcart is within the prescribed limit of ten miles from Glasgow. The defenders have thus violated the terms of the said contract. The loss occasioned to the pursuer by this breach of contract he estimates at not less than £3000." In that action the defenders tendered to the pursuer £250 in full of his claims under the conclusions of the summons, and a discharge of their counter claim for the balance of the price of the machine furnished to the pursuer, amounting to £290, 12s. 4d., being in all a sum of £540, 12s. 4d. The tender was accepted, and judgment pronounced accordingly on 6th January 1887.

The pursuer raised the present action on the 26th March 1887. His claim is thus stated in the 7th article of the condescendence,—"Since said 16th July 1886" (the date of the former action) "and down to the present date, the said F. W. Verel & Company have continued to manufacture ice with the machinery supplied to them by the defenders, in competition with the pursuer, have undersold the pursuer in the market, and have thus by the defenders' said breach of contract injured the pursuer's trade to a very great extent, and have reduced his profits. The loss sustained by the pursuer between the two dates last mentioned amounts to a sum of not less than £650, being the sum sued for."

Stevenson v. Pontifex & Wood.

The defence is in substance that the claim now made is satisfied and discharged by the interlocutor of Lord Lee in the former action giving effect to the tender and acceptance. I am of opinion that this defence must be sustained.

The cause of action in the previous summons was breach of contract and consequent damage. The breach consisted of the single act of supplying one machine to Verel & Company, and I am of opinion that a single act amounting either to a delict or a breach of contract cannot be made the ground of two or more actions, for the purpose of recovering damages arising within different periods but caused by the same act. On the contrary, I hold the true rule of practice based on sound principle to be, that though the delict or breach of contract be of such a nature that it will necessarily be followed by injurious consequences in the future, and though it may for this reason be impossible to ascertain with precise accuracy at the date of the action or of the verdict the amount of loss which will result, yet the whole damage must be recovered in one action, because there is but one cause of action. The most familiar illustration of this rule is to be found in actions for injury to the person, in which the practice is invariable.

Where the breach of contract or delict complained of consists not of one but of a series of acts the rule is different. Thus, if one contracts to deliver a certain quantity of goods during each month in the ensuing year, and fails to perform in the first or second month, that is in itself a distinct breach of contract, and if the purchaser sues for damages for that breach he cannot in the same action claim for an apprehended breach in subsequent months, for the obligant may perform his contract for the future, and if he fails in any subsequent month, that is a fresh breach of contract, for which a separate action will lie.

So also an operation in suo which creates a nuisance to one's neighbour may be followed by long continued loss and damage to that neighbour, and yet it may not be necessary to recover the whole damage in one action; because he who commits the nuisance is under a constant legal obligation to abate it, and so long as he fails in performing that legal obligation he is every day committing a fresh nuisance.

I should hardly have thought it necessary to state these rules and principles, which are somewhat elementary, were it not that the present is the first example so far as I know of any attempt, at least in modern times, to recover by instalments in successive actions the continuing damage resulting from one delict or one breach of contract.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defenders, and to that interlocutor I think we ought to adhere.

LORD MURE.—As your Lordship has pointed out, the peculiarity in this case is that the breach of contract founded on is the same as that which was founded on in the previous action, which was settled, and that without any reservation. The breach was the sale by the defenders to a person near Glasgow of a refrigerating machine, in violation of an undertaking by them to the pursuer that they would not within five years, without the consent of the pursuer, supply any such machine to be worked within ten miles of the Cross of Glasgow. Now, the breach of contract was complete the moment the sale took place. It was the only breach committed by the defenders, and upon it the previous action was founded. In that action the pursuer asked in general terms for £3000 of damages, as the loss occasioned to him by the conduct of the defenders; and it would, as I conceive, have been quite competent for the pursuer to have maintained under his action as laid that the damage he would sustain from the breach of contract would be spread over a considerable time, and to have had this damage estimated upon that footing. But the case was compromised for a much smaller sum than that claimed. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that it is incompetent for the pursuer now to bring a second action founded upon the same breach.

Lord Adam.—In this case it appears that in a contract between the pursuer and defenders the latter undertook not to supply without the pursuer's consent any refrigerating machine which to their knowledge was to be erected within ten miles of the Cross of Glasgow, and which was intended to be used for the purpose of making ice for sale, for a period of five years from the date of the contract. Notwithstanding this stipulation, in the beginning of 1885 they supplied to Messrs F. W. Verel & Company a machine similar to that supplied to the pursuer, and it was no doubt within the knowledge of the defenders that it was to be used within ten miles of Glasgow. This was a breach of contract, and the pursuer raised an action of damages for the loss occasioned to him by that breach of contract, which he estimated at £3000. Thereupon a tender was made by the defenders and accepted by the pursuer of the sum of £250, and absolvitor from a claim in a counter action, in full of his claims under the conclusions of the summons.

The question here is whether that compromise included all damages past and future occasioned by that breach of contract. There was only one wrongous act on the part of the defenders, and in my opinion, as soon as the act was committed, the right of action to recover all damages arising from it arose. I agree with your Lordships that the pursuer is bound to recover all the damages to which he can lay claim in the one action. The pursuer says that he is entitled to have successive actions of damages for his alleged losses, as they may arise from time to time over an indefinite period. It may be true that where a person is obliged to have recourse to one action and to one only the amount of damages may vary under different circumstances, but of that we have daily experience and cognisance, for instance, in actions of damages for personal injuries arising from fault. It is always impossible to ascertain accurately what sum of damage will cover the injury or loss, but, although the amount of damages awarded may be to some extent speculative, yet the evil thus resulting is far less than would be the evil of allowing successive actions of damages from time to time arising from the same originating cause. How many actions are there to be—and are they to be brought at the rate of one every six months, or every year? That would lead to an intolerable state of matters. In this case we have had one action, which covered the period down to July 1886. We now have a second, which is founded upon the same wrongous act, brought nine months later. A proceeding such as this is quite unknown to our law, and ought to receive no encouragement.

Dunnett v. Mitchell.

MATTHEW DUNNETT, Complainer (Respondent).—Jameson—Younger.
ALEXANDER MITCHELL, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Gloag—J. A. Reid.

Reparation—Fraud—Title to sue—Company—Shareholder—Restitutio in integrum.—In 1877 a joint stock company was formed to buy an estate in Norway, believed to be valuable for its timber and minerals, at the price of £3800, three-fourths of the price to be paid in cash, the remainder in shares. The vendor guaranteed that the sum so paid in cash should be repaid from sales of timber within four years from the company's entering into possession. The company entered into possession of the estate in 1877, and carried on the sale of timber for two years. The business proved unprofitable, and in 1879 the company entered into an agreement with the vendor by which the parties declared the original contract to be no longer binding on either, and discharged all claims by the one party against the other under it, and the company agreed to pay to the vendor (for salary as manager and advances) a sum of money, and to grant him a mortgage over the estate for a further sum. The company carried on the business till January 1884, when they resolved to sell the estate and to wind up the company. In November 1883 one of the partners raised an action of damages against the vendor for the loss the pursuer had sustained by becoming an original shareholder of the company, on the ground that he had been induced to do so by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the vendor.

After a proof, held that fraudulent misrepresentation had not been proved, and that the vendor was not liable, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill further holding that having regard to the proceedings of the company the pursuer had no title to sue, Lord Rutherfurd Clark reserving his opinion.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

(SEQUEL of case reported January 6, 1883, 12 R. 400.)

On 8th November 1883 Alexander Mitchell, timber-merchant, Glasgow, in his own right and as assignee of certain other persons, raised an action of damages against Matthew Dunnett. No appearance having been entered, decree in absence was obtained on 8th December 1883. On 11th February 1884, Dunnett brought a suspension of the decree in absence, and a record was made up in the suspension.

The ground of the original action was that Dunnett had by false and fraudulent representations induced Mitchell and his cedents to form a limited company to work the estate of Vaagsoeter in Norway, with the result that they suffered great loss and damage.

Dunnett, as previously reported, maintained that Mitchell had no title to sue the original action. Mitchell maintained that he had, both as a holder of a debenture bond of the company and as a shareholder, a title to sue.

The Court held that the holder of a debenture-bond had a title to sue for damages the complainer, by whose alleged false and fraudulent representations he had been induced to advance money to the company, and, recalling the interlocutor of Lord Adam, Ordinary, who had held that the respondent had no title to sue, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof of their averments.

The proof was led partly before the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), and partly in Norway on commission, the respondent leading in the proof.

The Lord Ordinary held that the respondent was not a debenture-holder, and therefore not entitled to sue as such, and this part of his Lordship's judgment was not challenged in the Inner-House.

The other facts established by the proof were as follows:—The complainer, Dunnett, who had been for some time in Norway, came to Glasgow in 1877, with the view of forming a company to purchase the estate of Vaagsoeter in Norway, and entered into negotiations with the respondent and several other persons for that purpose. The representations which Dunnett made were contained in a prospectus, dated 9th August 1877, and relative documents. The prospectus set forth that the complainer had acquired the estate, and was willing to transfer it to the proposed company; that it consisted of forest land about four English miles long, and one-third to one-half a mile wide, thus containing from 800 to 1000 English acres;* further, that it contained 34,000 trees of certain specified dimensions, and trees of smaller dimensions too numerous to count, but estimated at 80,000; that the estate also contained valuable minerals, consisting of iron ore, containing from 36$\frac{4}{5}$ to 57$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of metallic iron, which could be worked cheaply and easily, and conveyed to this country without much expense; and that large profits could be made from the estate. The complainer guaranteed the number and dimensions of the trees and the yield up to 57$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of iron. The prospectus further bore,—"The vendor agrees to transfer the property, with its forests, minerals, and all rights to the company, on the following terms:—1st. That a clear and indisputable title be given to the company. 2d, The price agreed upon is £3800, of which three-fourths, or £2850, is to be paid in cash to the vendor, and the remaining one-fourth in shares amounting to £950, which shares, along with their accumulating profits undrawn by the vendor, are to be held by the general managers for the company until the company's three-fourths, or £2850, has been repaid out of the net proceeds of timber shipped from the estate. 3d, The vendor guarantees this £2850 to be thus repaid within four years from the company's entering on possession," &c.

Before the company was formed, a deputation consisting of two of the persons interested, viz., Messrs Broom and Robinson, proceeded to Norway, where they met the complainer and a Mr Olsen, a Norwegian (who had arranged to sell the estate to the complainer), and inspected the estate. They reported that they had spent five days in the neighbourhood, four of which were occupied in perambulating the boundaries and inspecting the timber, minerals, and water power; that they thought the complainer's estimate of the size of the estate at 1000 acres, and of the number of trees, was understated, and further, that they had examined the minerals and taken samples.

Thereafter, in November 1877, the proposed company was formed, under the name of the Vaagsoeter Estate Company, Limited, the complainer being appointed manager, and having a number of shares allotted to him, and Messrs Robinson and Broom being included among the directors.

The business carried on by the company did not prove successful, and the complainer having failed to give satisfaction to the directors, was dismissed from the office of manager on 14th October 1878, and Mr Olsen, already mentioned, was appointed to fill his place.

Disputes then arose between the complainer and the company, he making claims against them for advances made by him on their behalf, and for salary down to the date of his dismissal, and the company bringing counter claims against him.

These claims were eventually arranged and discharged by a minute of agreement between the complainer and the company, in terms of which he was to receive a money payment from the company and a mortgage over the estate for a further sum, and the parties cancelled and declared to be no longer in force or binding on either of them the contract heretofore subsisting between them, as embodied in the prospectus of 9th August 1877, and they mutually abandoned and discharged "all claims at the instance of the one against the other for implement of the obligations specified in said memorandum or prospectus."

* The information as to the extent of the estate was represented to be the result of reports supplied to the complainer, not the result of actual survey.

The company continued business till 11th January 1884, when it was resolved to sell the estate by auction, and to wind up the business voluntarily, and a further resolution, that the company could not by reason of its liabilities continue its business, was passed on 30th January 1884, and a liquidator was appointed. Shortly thereafter the property was sold for £300. On 8th November 1883 the respondent, for himself and as assignee of Mr Robinson already mentioned (who had ceased to be a shareholder in 1879), John Donald, and J. L. Mitchell, also both shareholders, had raised the action against the complainer for damages which resulted in the decree in absence now sought to be suspended.

With regard to the honesty of the complainer's representations, as to which the parties were in controversy, it was proved, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and the Court, that while the actual measurement of the estate, as shewn by survey, was only 3½ or 4 miles long, and varied in breadth from half a mile to a few hundred yards, the measurements which had been given by the complainer were the result of information given by two competent persons whom he had employed, and that he made use of their information in the belief that it was true. The information which he had given regarding the timber was derived from the same persons, and was communicated to the persons forming the company as he got it, and in the belief that it was true; and he concealed no material part of his information. As to the ore on the estate, it appeared that it did contain a certain amount of iron, which proved, however, as a whole, to be of no market value; but the complainer, who believed it to be valuable, had communicated truthfully the results of the analyses which he had obtained.

The result of the evidence on these points, which has thus been summarised, is fully narrated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The respondent being entitled to damages as concluded for in said action against the complainer, in respect that he and his cedents were induced to take and pay for shares in, and take up debenture-bonds of said company, by the false and fraudulent representations and concealment of the complainer, the suspension should be refused. (2) The complainer having knowingly made the foresaid false and fraudulent representations, and having wrongfully and fraudulently concealed essential facts within his knowledge, and having thereby induced the respondent and his cedents to become shareholders and debenture-holders of said company, the decree under suspension was well founded, and the suspension should be refused.

The complainer pleaded;—(3) The averments of the respondent in the action in which said decree was pronounced and in the present suspension being irrelevant the complainer is entitled to suspension as craved. (4) The respondent had no title to sue the said action. (5) The shareholders and creditors of the company were not entitled to make any claim arising out of the transactions referred to on record as individuals and apart from the company, not having alleged or sustained any loss apart or distinct from the company. (6) The respondent's claim in the said action was bad, in respect that the alleged damage was not the natural, necessary, or actual consequence of the respondent and his cedents having become shareholders or creditors of the company, but arose out of the purchase by the said company as its proxima causa, and the right to claim damage in respect of said purchase belongs to the company alone. (7) All claims on the part of the said company, or separatim, the shareholders thereof, against the complainer were extinguished by the agreement of November 1879. (8) The company, and, separatim, the respondent, is barred from insisting in the claim made in the said action by mora and acquiescence, and the retention and sale, in March 1884, of said estate after knowledge, actual or imputable to them, of the matters complained of. (9) The averments of the respondent in the said action being, so far as material, unfounded in fact, and in particular the complainer not having made false and fraudulent representations, as alleged in the said summons, he is entitled to suspension as craved. (10) The purchase of the said estate having been made, and the respondent and his cedents having taken shares in the said company, and lent the company on debenture, not on the faith of any representations by the complainer, but of the report of the said deputation, the respondent has no claim against the complainer. (11) The said company having before the purchase of the said estate, and at least before payment of the price and conveyance of the subjects, had equally good opportunities with the complainer of investigating the extent and value of the said estate, the respondent's claims cannot be maintained.

The Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 17th June 1887, suspended the decree in absence, and the threatened charge thereon, and whole grounds and warrants thereof.*

* "OPINION.—In this case the complainer seeks to have suspended a decree in absence obtained against him at the instance of the respondent for £3000 and expenses of process. The averments in the original summons on which the decree proceeded were to all intents the same as those now made in the answers for the respondent; and they amount to this, that the respondent and others (whose interests are now vested in the respondent by assignation) were induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the complainer, as well as the fraudulent concealment by him of essential facts within his knowledge, to form a company and buy an estate, whereby they have suffered damage to the extent sued for.

"The first plea urged by the complainer was that the respondent had no title to sue the original action, on the ground that the purchase of the property was made by a company of which the respondent and his cedents were only some of the partners, and that if damage had been sustained by or through the purchase, the company alone had the right to sue for it. Lord Adam (before whom this case originally depended) sustained this plea, and suspended the decree as craved; but on a reclaiming note, the Second Division of the Court recalled Lord Adam's interlocutor, and remitted to his Lordship to allow the parties a proof of their respective averments. The Court, however, expressed no opinion on the plea which Lord Adam had sustained, holding that the objection stated to the respondent's title as a shareholder did not exclude action at his instance as a debenture-holder of the company, which he alleged himself to be, and which at that stage of the case was assumed to be the fact. Lord Young observed,—'The question of loss is only a question of greater or less loss; and as the case is clear on the question of the debenture debt, I would suggest to your Lordships that without indicating any opinion on the question raised as to the shares, we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remit the case for probation. Everything will then remain open. The respondent will have to prove his case, and the question will then arise on the evidence, whether he is entitled to damages in respect of his debentures and of his shares, or of his debentures only, or of neither?'

"The proof so allowed has been led partly before me and partly on commission, and I have now to consider, 1st, whether the respondent had any title to sue the action of damages; and 2d, whether he has made good in law his claim to the damages he seeks. (1) I am of opinion that, as a debenture-holder of the company, the respondent has no title to sue, because he is not, in point of fact, a debenture-holder in any reasonable sense of that term—[His Lordship then explained the nature of the alleged debenture debt, and expressed his opinion that the sums in question could not be regarded as debenture debts, and proceeded]—The so-called debenture debt (for which debentures were never issued) consists, therefore, of sums paid (1) to meet an overdraft which the shareholders had authorised, and (2) to enable the company to effect a settlement of certain claims made upon it by the complainer. At the time when the first of these sums was paid there was no stipulation or arrangement that the estate of the company was to be burdened with their amount as a debt. The sums so paid were voluntarily advanced by the shareholders to carry on the company and to aid in the completion of the necessary works. The second payment above mentioned was, in like manner, advanced voluntarily to enable the company to meet a claim which had at the time to be settled. If the company had been successful, these sums would no doubt have been repaid to the shareholders who made the advances. But it is at least very doubtful whether such advances could have been ranked on the company's estate as in competition with regular creditors or ordinary debenture-holders. At all events, these debenture debts (so-called) are, in my opinion, not debts which the complainer can be called on to pay either under the name of debt or of damages. They were not advanced on the faith of representations made by him or representations made by the directors in reliance upon representations made by him (Peek v. Gurney, L. R., 6 E. and I. App. 411, per Lord Cairns). They were not advanced on the security of the estate, but were advanced to meet obligations which the shareholders had undertaken. They were not, in the strict sense, loans to the company; they were rather payments of debt for which the shareholders had assumed liability.

"On the other hand, I am of opinion (differing from Lord Adam) that, as shareholders of the company, the respondent and his cedents had a good title to sue the original action. It is averred that the respondent and his cedents were induced to form the company and buy the estate through the fraud or deceit practised by the complainer. If they had formed no company, but had gone into the purchase of the estate as a joint adventure, each joint adventurer would have had his claim against the complainer for the damage resulting to him individually through the complainer's fraud. I cannot see that the formation of a company makes any material difference, especially when it is averred that the formation of the company was itself induced by the same fraud as that which led the respondent and his cedents to embark their capital in it. In point of fact the greater part of the purchase price of the estate was paid up by the respondent and his cedents, as well as others who joined them in the transaction before the company was formed, and therefore their damage (if any) was sustained before the company came into existence. I think, moreover, that the title of persons injured, as the respondent and his cedents say they have been, to recover damages directly from the person who has done them the wrong, has already been recognised by authority. In the case of Leslies v. Lumsden (14 D. 213) the representatives of a shareholder in a bank sued certain of the directors for the loss occasioned by their alleged fraudulent proceedings. The defenders maintained that the pursuers had no title to sue, on the ground that if, as the pursuers alleged, the directors had caused loss to the company, they were answerable therefor to the company, but that they could not be called to account by an individual shareholder for his share of the loss. That plea was repelled, and the title to sue sustained. In that case, no doubt, the alleged fraud was said to have been concealed until the company had been dissolved; but I do not regard that as a material distinction between that case and the present. A company continues to exist after dissolution to the effect of enforcing its rights or being made responsible for its obligations, and if the company could, on principle alone, sue for a wrong done to it, and through it to each shareholder, then the dissolution of the company would not have conferred a title on the shareholder which he would not have had prior to the dissolution. The case of Tul- loch v. Davidson (20 D. 1045) is another authority in the respondent's favour on this question of title.

"If the respondent had sued the complainer in respect of a contract entered into between the complainer and the company, I think the plea to title now maintained would have been sound. But the respondent's action is based on the complainer's delict or quasi delict, and in such a case I think the rule of law to be, that the person wronged has always his remedy directly against the wrongdoer. Of course, it may be said in reply to this that the company was the only person wronged, and that the company's title to sue is not disputed. But the company could only suffer wrong, at least to its pecuniary loss, through the pockets of its shareholders—the real wrong was done to them. The complainer in support of his plea of 'no title' relied upon the rule laid down in Foss v. Harbottle (2 Hare, 461), and approved in subsequent cases, as ex. gr., M'Dougall v. Gardiner, L. R., 1 Ch. Div. 13. I do not think that rule applicable to the present case; and, besides, there is nothing in that rule (as explained by Lord Justice James in M'Dougall's case) which conflicts with the views I have already expressed. Assuming therefore, that the respondent had a good title to sue the original actions, there remains the question,—(2) Whether the respondent has made good his right to recover the damages for which he concludes in that action?

"When the complainer first approached the respondent on the subject of his buying the Vaagsoeter estate, there can be no doubt he represented the transaction as one which would be highly advantageous to the buyer on the terms then submitted. The estate and all its advantages were no doubt spoken of in language which was very laudatory. What the complainer's representations actually were admits of no question, as these representations were made in writings now produced, which are contained in the print of 2d December 1884. These writings, however, were not all shewn to the persons who formed the company; some of the original shareholders (and some of these the respondent's cedents) only saw the prospectus dated 9th August 1877 (No. 20 of process). But there is no material difference between the documents in so far as concerns the representations made relative to the estate, and with which in this action it is necessary to deal. These representations related (1) to the extent of the estate, (2) the amount and character of the timber thereon, and (3) the value of the iron ore therein. I shall deal separately with these representations; but I may here say with regard to each and all of them, that it is established by the proof to my satisfaction that they are inconsistent with fact. The estate was not so large, the trees thereon not so numerous, and the ore not so valuable as was undoubtedly represented by the complainer. This discrepancy between the representation and the fact will not, however, per se, entitle the respondent to damages. It must be shewn, in order to make the complainer liable, that he made the representations in the knowledge that they were false, or without believing them to be true, or that he made them without reasonable grounds for believing that they were true. The respondent recognises this, and accordingly in his record he avers that the complainer's representations were 'false and fraudulent'; to have said merely that they were untrue would not have been a relevant ground of action.

"I proceed now to consider each of the representations in order; and (1) the representations concerning the extent of the estate. In the complainer's letter to the respondent's firm, dated 26th January 1877, the estate is described as 'forest land, about 4 English miles long, and ⅓ to ½ a mile wide, thus containing from 800 to 1000 English acres,' and in the prospectus it is said 'the estate contains about 1000 imperial English acres . . . . having forests nearly 4 miles in length.' The statements thus made proceeded upon information furnished to the complainer by Olsen, with whom the complainer was corresponding about the estate. His connection with the estate was that of middle-man; he had bought it, or arranged to buy it; he was to sell it to the complainer, who and the man who asserted what he did not know to be true was as much responsible as the man who asserted what he knew to be untrue, and it in turn was to sell it to the company. Of this Mr Olsen, I may here observe that he appears to be a trustworthy man; and besides, being the manager of the Vaagsoeter Company after the complainer's dismissal, in which capacity he gained the approval of the company, he is adduced by the respondent as his witness. Mr Olsen's letters are not produced (not having been preserved after November 1879, for the reason given by the complainer), but in a letter written to him by the complainer on 1st March 1875 the Vaagsoeter estate is spoken of as 'about 4½ by ¾ English miles roughly estimated.' This refers, I do not doubt, to a previous statement to that effect by Olsen; and that the length and breadth of the estate were not guesses merely or inventions on the part of the complainer may be gathered from the fact that they were not very far from being correct. No survey of the estate had then been made, nor was such survey made till long after the sale to the Vaagsoeter Company, and of this the company were aware before they made the purchase. The extent of the estate was, therefore, not exactly ascertained at the time of the purchase, and the dimensions given by the complainer were always qualified with the word 'about.' The actual survey, however, since made shews that the estate may fairly be said to be about 3½ or 4 miles long, and at some places ⅓ to ½ mile broad. The great discrepancy between the extent of the estate as ascertained by survey and as represented by the complainer arises from the fact that the estate, which is oblong, is very much narrower at some parts than at others. With regard, however, to the dimensions of the estate it is important to notice that Messrs Broom and Robertson, who visited the estate on behalf of the purchasers before the company was formed or the purchase made, with instructions to ascertain, among other things, 'the extent' of the property, reported as the result of their personal examination as follows:—'The extent of the estate given in the prospectus by Mr Dunnett is 1000 acres, which we believe to be understated, as we made the quantity, by taking the least of the different distances we got, considerably more.' (How they got these distances is explained in the previous paragraph of the report, where they say 'as no survey exists of the estate, we spent considerable time in getting the best idea of its extent by following the boundary. . . . and pacing distances.') The report goes on—'Our guide was a man called Knud, who is the subtenant on the estate, and who knew the boundaries. Only actual survey, however, will give the correct area. The shape of the estate is an oblong, extending from the bay over five miles inland, the narrowest breadth being 600 yards.' With regard to this last statement there is some conflict in the evidence. Messrs Broom and Robinson say they were distinctly told by Dunnett or Olsen that the road traversing the estate, which they paced and found to be 600 yards, was the narrowest part of the estate. Olsen says he did not say so, and Mr Dunnet says the same thing. I think probably the reason of this conflict may be found in the fact that Broom and Robinson misunderstood what was said to them about the road, and I am bound to add, that while I regard Messrs Broom and Robinson as perfectly honest witnesses, I am satisfied, from their appearance in the witness-box, that it would not be safe to rely very much upon their memory. The result, therefore, of the examination made by Broom and Robinson justifies the complainer in the representations which he made. They had opportunities of estimating the extent of the estate fully as good as were at the command of the complainer, and they reported that the representations of the complainer, in their opinion, rather understated than overstated the extent of the estate. In these circumstances I cannot hold the complainer's representations to have been false or fraudulent. The information he proceeded upon in making his representations was, so far he could judge (and as, on the evidence, it appears to me), quite reliable and trustworthy. I have no doubt the complainer believed what was told him, and made his representations on the information he had in perfect good faith. I may add that in my opinion the extent of the land, per se, was not a material consideration in the view either of the complainer or the was no answer to say that the truth might have been discovered if sufficient inquiry had been made.[1] The mere fact that inquiry had been company. The timber upon it was much more material. No doubt a very large extent of land would naturally carry a larger quantity of timber than a small extent; and if a small extent of land had been given with a very large quantity of timber, it might have suggested doubt whether such a quantity of timber could possibly exist, and have led to inquiry. Such inquiry was, as will be seen, actually made. But, provided the timber was there, it was not material, in the view of the purchaser of the estate, whether it grew on 500 acres or on 800. After the timber had been felled and the ore worked, the land, situated as it was, was of no value to the company.

"2. As regards the timber growing on the estate, the complainer represented that there were 34,000 trees of certain specified dimensions, and of dimensions less than those specified, trees 'too numerous to be counted,' but estimated at 80,000.

"It appears from Mr Olsen's evidence that Mr Dunnett wished a statement 'from independent men of how much timber there existed on Vaagsoeter property,' for the purpose of being submitted to persons who might be asked to buy the property, and had written requesting Olsen to procure this. The whole of the letters written by Mr Dunnett to Mr Olsen on this subject are not produced, but the letters of 2d May, 15th August, and 3d October 1876 sufficiently corroborate Mr Olsen's statement. Mr Olsen accordingly employed Holm and Aarseth to make the inquiries and examination of the Vaagsoeter forest necessary to supply the complainer with the information he desired to have, and on getting their report Mr Olsen forwarded it to the complainer. That report, as regards the 34,000 trees of specified dimensions, is practically reproduced in the prospectus which the complainer issued to the respondent and his cedents, the difference in the dimensions between the report and the prospectus being the difference between Norwegian and English measurement. There is abundant evidence that Holm and Aarseth were men quite qualified to report upon the Vaagsoeter forest, as well as men whose statements were quite trustworthy (ex gr., see print for respondent, 56 G and 62 B C). The report by Holm and Aarseth was forwarded by Olsen to the complainer in a letter of 2d November 1876, but that letter is not now extant. The complainer, however, says that he took a copy of it at the time to shew to intending buyers of the estate, and that copy he gives at length in his evidence. There is also produced by Olsen a copy of this letter which the complainer sent to him to certify as correct soon after the present question of misrepresentation was raised. The two copies, although both proceeding from the complainer, are not identical in terms. The difference may perhaps be accounted for by supposing that the copy taken by the complainer to shew to others to whom he might endeavour to sell the property was not a complete copy. This should, of course, have been cleared up in the proof. But I am not disposed to put any disadvantage arising out of this neglect on the complainer. The onus lies on the respondent of shewing that the representations made by the complainer were false and fraudulent, and the complainer may be regarded as justified in destroying any letters or documents he had bearing upon this question after a settlement took place between him and the company in November 1879, which he considered final. The importance of Olsen's letter of 2d November 1876 consists in this, that it was upon a statement in that letter that the representation was made regarding the number of trees on the property of less dimensions than those specified by Holm and Aarseth. Mr Olsen writes (at least Olsen, who produces the copy No. 294, does not deny that he wrote) that in the number of trees specified by Holm and made did not bar the action unless it appeared that entire reliance was placed on the inquiry and not on the complainer's statements. Aarseth 'is not included any of the trees which at 20 feet in height are only 5 inch diameter or less, and which it was impossible to count, but of which there are no doubt more than 100,000.' It is worthy of remark, as proving that some such information was forwarded by Olsen, that the complainer, in his letter to the respondent's firm of date 26th June 1877 (No. 25 of process), mentions that the 100,000 trees was an estimate by Olsen as contra-distinguished from the specification of the 34,000 trees made by Holm and Aarseth. Assuming that a letter in the terms above quoted was sent by Olsen to the complainer along with Holm and Aarseth's report, I think the representation in the prospectus was quite justified. The complainer had no reason to doubt that, as he had asked for information as to facts he had got what he asked, and not a falsehood (if it was a falsehood) invented by Olsen. In my opinion, however, there is no room for imputing falsehood to Olsen. But what opinion did Messrs Broom and Robinson form on this subject? I turn, again, to their report, and find that they say, 'We counted in some places the number of trees to the acre, and consider the average number given in the prospectus, 34,000, at from 5½″ to 15¾″ diameter, to be understated.' They take no notice of the 100,000 trees under 5½″ diameter, I suppose because they thought them of no great moment. If there had been (as they thought there were) the 34,000 trees of specified dimensions, that was sufficient, from their value, to make the proposed purchase a very good bargain for the purchasers. On this part of the case I am of opinion that the complainer took means to ascertain with fairness and approximate accuracy the state of the timber on the Vaagsoeter estate; that he believed, and had reason to believe, in the truthfulness of the information on that subject afforded to him; that he communicated to the respondent and his cedents the information as he himself received it; that he made no false or fraudulent representations thereanent; and made no concealment of any material fact concerning the timber within his knowledge which was calculated to influence the proposing purchasers of the estate. In the prospectus, as well as in the letter No. 25 of process addressed to the respondent's firm, the complainer expressly guarantees the number and dimension of the whole trees. What might have been the effect of such a guarantee, and what the extent of the obligation thereby imposed upon the complainer had the company sought to enforce it, I do not need to consider. The respondent's action is not laid upon guarantee, and probably an action upon the guarantee, being an action upon contract, the company only could have pursued. But that guarantee may very well be taken into view in considering the complainer's good faith in the matter. It is scarcely credible that he would have bound himself by any such obligation if at the time he granted it he knew, or had reason to suspect, that what he was guaranteeing to be a fact was untrue, with the certainty that sooner or later the truth would be discovered, and that such discovery would be followed by such proceedings as would make the sale of the property, so far as he was concerned, not a profit, but a loss. I am convinced that the complainer was not so foolish, and that he gave the guarantee because he believed that what he was guaranteeing was within rather than beyond the truth.

"3. The estate in question no doubt contained iron ore. The only question is whether the complainer's representations as to the percentage of metallic iron obtainable from that ore were false and fraudulent. It is said that he took samples which he knew did not fairly, if at all, represent the veins of ore running through the estate, and submitted analyses of such samples as indicating what was the general character of the ore to be found on the estate. I do not intend to go over the evidence bearing on this part of the case in any detail, but I remark (1), that it is not disputed that the samples of iron ore which the complainer got analysed were obtained by him on the Vaagsoeter estate, that they were handed as found to a chemist for analysis, and that the analyses obtained from the chemists were truthfully communicated; (2) the analyses obtained from the chemists were such as warranted the representations charge by which the complainer and the company had mutually discharged their claims did not affect the action. The discharge was a which the complainer made; (3) the complainer was himself so satisfied with the analyses that he guaranteed a certain percentage of metallic iron, and this guarantee (for the reasons I have already given) I regard as a proof of the complainer's good faith in making the representations which he guaranteed.

"On this part of the case also I think the respondent has failed to prove that the complainer's representations were false and fraudulent. If the views which I have expressed are sound, the complainer is entitled to judgment in his favour.

"But apart from the questions which I have been considering, the complainer maintains that he is entitled to have the decree complained of suspended on other grounds, which I shall briefly notice.

"1. The complainer avers that the respondent and others who joined him in the purchase of Vaagsoeter estate were not induced to purchase, and did not purchase in reliance on the representations of the complainer, but, on the contrary, purchased in reliance on the information which, independently of the complainer's representations, they procured for themselves.

"A meeting was held on 5th September 1877 'of gentlemen proposing to form a joint stock company . . . for acquiring the Vaagsoeter estate,' at which the respondent and his cedent Mr Robinson were present, the minutes of which bear that a statement in writing (i.e., the prospectus), had been circulated among the gentlemen present, prepared by the complainer, containing a general description of the property proposed to be purchased, and also heads of the agreement for the sale of the property to the company. The minutes further bear,—'The meeting having heard further explanations from Mr Dunnett, it was agreed unanimously, before proceeding with the formation of the company, that a deputation be sent out on behalf of the meeting to inspect the lands, timber, and others proposed to be purchased and vested in the company with the view of ascertaining the extent, value, and other particulars of the property, and reporting to a future meeting of the parties generally as to the advisability of proceeding with the formation of the proposed company, and purchasing the property on the terms mentioned in Mr Dunnett's statement.' Messrs Broom and Robinson were thereupon appointed as a deputation to proceed to Norway, 'and with the assistance of Mr Dunnett to make the necessary inquiries, and to report to a future meeting.' It was further minuted that in the view, that is, in the expectation, of the report by the deputation being favourable, and the title to the estate being found satisfactory, the gentlemen present agreed to become shareholders in the proposed company; and that 'in the event of its being considered inexpedient to proceed to form the company after considering the report of the deputation,' they would each bear a certain proportion of the expenses incurred by the deputation 'in prosecuting their mission.' In pursuance of the instructions thus given to them, Messrs Robinson and Broom went to Norway along with the complainer, having with them a copy of the complainer's prospectus, and on their return they submitted to another meeting their report, No. 52 of process, in which they stated that they had spent four days 'in perambulating the boundaries, examining the forest and minerals and the water power'; that, in their opinion, the extent of the land as represented by Mr Dunnett was understated, although the exact extent could only be got by actual survey, and that no such survey existed; that the trees of specified dimensions, as stated in the prospectus, were understated; that they had made a careful examination of the iron ore, with the results which they gave; and in other respects they reported upon the condition of the estate. That report was submitted to a meeting of 10th October, at which the deputation explained verbally, that 'while unable to test accurately every statement in Mr Dunnett's prospectus . . . they were on the whole satisfied, as regards the extent of land and number of growing trees, that Mr Dunnett's estimate was, if anything, understated.' The meeting thanked the deputation for their report and services, and 'expressed their cordial approval of the manner in which these gentlemen matter between the complainer and the company, while the action was one at the instance of the individual respondent and his cedents for the loss the complainer had caused them. Besides, the claims of which the discharge relieved the parties to it were their mutual claims "for implehad executed their mission.' The meeting, however, considered, 'before proceeding to form the company,' that the title to the estate should be examined by a Norwegian lawyer. The opinion and advice of a Norwegian lawyer on the title was applied for and obtained; and on considering his letter at a meeting of 9th November, it was 'unanimously resolved to proceed with the formation of the company.' The company was immediately thereafter formed and registered, and the property bought.

"In view of these facts, I think it is out of the question to say that the company was formed or the company purchased in reliance on the statements and representations of the complainer. So far from that being the case, the gentlemen proposing to form the company sent persons of their own choosing to ascertain for them everything about the estate—its extent, value of its timber, shipping facilities, water power, &c.—which could influence them in reference to the purchase, declining to form the company or buy the property until these persons had reported. Upon that report they proceeded, and if they have by it been led into a bad bargain, the complainer is not to be responsible for that. So far as I can see, the respondent and the gentlemen who were acting along with him risked nothing on the representations of the complainer beyond the expense of sending out their deputation. In this view it is not material to consider whether the representations of the complainer were true or false. If Mr Dunnett did or said anything which put the deputation off their inquiry in Norway and misled them, that would be a different matter. But of this I find no proof; for as I have said, I place no reliance on the evidence of Messrs Broom and Robinson when they speak only from memory. The claim against Mr Dunnett, and the grounds on which that claim might be made good, have doubtless often been discussed by them and in their hearing; and it is probably difficult, if not impossible, for them now to distinguish between what actually was said in Norway and what has been said since.

"2. There remains only the question, whether the respondent, or the company of which he was a shareholder, discharged the complainer of all claims arising out of the purchase of the Vaagsoeter estate. I have considered all the evidence bearing upon this question, although I do not now propose to go into it in detail. The result I have arrived at is favourable to the complainer's contention. I think the settlement under which the complainer surrendered certain claims was a compromise between the parties, intended and believed to be a complete discharge of all claims hinc inde arising out of the Vaagsoeter estate transaction. It is said now by the respondent (or rather his agent Mr Bryson) that the settlement only affected claims and questions known to the company at the time of settlement. By that time I think the company had come to know that they had made a bad bargain, and that the estate was not, in fact, what it had been represented to be both by the complainer and Messrs Broom and Robinson. The extent and quality of the timber on the estate, which was its chief feature so far as mercantile value was concerned, had by the date of the settlement been ascertained, and the report and opinion of Mr Donald (one of the shareholders, and a cedent of the respondent's) on that subject was before the company. In these circumstances the parties entered into an agreement by which they 'mutually abandon and discharge all claims at the instance of the one against the other for implement of the obligations specified in said memorandum or prospectus.' It is quite true that the present claim is not one specified in the prospectus. But reading the agreement or discharge as a whole, I cannot resist the conclusion that it was, as I have said, a final and complete settlement of the whole claims arising or competent hinc inde in respect of the sale of the estate by the complainer to the company.

"On the whole matter my judgment is in favour of the complainer, and I shall accordingly suspend the decree complained of."

ment of the obligation specified in the said memorandum or prospectus." These obviously did not include the claim made in this action. (3) The respondent had a good title to sue, though it was admitted that he was not strictly a debenture-holder. No doubt the company might itself have sued, but individual shareholders deceived by the representations complained of had also a right to sue for their individual loss.[1]

Argued for the complainer (respondent);—(1) There was no fraud on the complainer's part. One who in bona fide made a statement as to an investment would not be made liable as for a fraud if he turned out to be wrong. There should be a rescinding of the contract which the fraud had induced if an action for damages were brought for fraud.[2] But the company was formed and carried on its business in reliance really on the report of Robinson and Broom, who went to Norway to make inquiries for themselves and their constituents, and on whose report of what they had seen for themselves the company was formed. In any view, mere non-disclosure was no ground for damages. Such an action required active deceit.[3] (2) Though it was not disputed that in some cases shareholders might sue in respect of obligations incurred to the company, the rule was otherwise. If shareholders and the company could both pursue, then the defender would be liable to be twice pursued, contrary to the brocard nemo debet bis versari. It was the company in this case, not the respondent, that made the contract, and the company that granted the discharge. Only the company therefore had a title to sue.[4] (3) Even if there had been no written discharge, the actings of the company were an implied and virtual discharge of all claims against the complainer. The company after becoming dissatisfied with the estate had sold it.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an important case to the parties, and in some aspects of it also to the law. The proceedings have been protracted, and the documents are very voluminous, and even yet, owing to the circumstances under which the question arises, the facts on which the case turns are involved in some obscurity. We have had a long and very able argument from the bar, and we have also the benefit of an elaborate opinion from the Lord Ordinary explanatory of the grounds on which he has arrived at the result under review.

The case itself is of this nature. The pursuer of the action is a Mr Mitchell, and he says he was a member of a copartnery formed by him and several other persons in Glasgow for the purpose of purchasing a piece of ground in Norway, called the Vaagsoeter Estate, on which a forest of timber was understood to grow. The defender Dunnett had proposed this purchase to the pursuer and his colleagues, and had made certain statements founded on his alleged knowledge to induce them—so it is said—to take the step of forming a company. The main object of this company was to cut down and deal in the timber which it was said was to be found growing plentifully on the estate, and to be a valuable article of commerce. According to the pursuer, it was also held out that iron ore existed in the lands, and although the defender was not in a position to speak with certainty as to the prospect of working the ore to profit, yet he held out great encouragement in the hope that it might be worked to profit. The statement of the pursuer, therefore, is that the company was formed on the inducements thus held out by the defender, and that the partners of the company contributed a considerable amount of capital. His contention now is that they were induced to join the concern, and to pay their money, on the representations held out by the defender, which have turned out to be false and fraudulent. He now sues Dunnett, who became the manager of the company for some time in Norway, for damages in respect of those misrepresentations, and in respect of the money which they have lost in consequence, the action being brought by Mitchell in his own name, and as assignee of three of his copartners.

A very voluminous proof has been led, and in the conclusion the Lord Ordinary found that the allegations of fraud and misrepresentation had not been established. He accordingly has suspended the decree in absence which the pursuer had obtained, explaining his views, as I have said, in a very able and elaborate note.

As I have come, after full consideration, but with little hesitation, to concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, and that upon the main ground on which the action is based—the alleged misrepresentations of the defender—it may not be necessary for me to go at any length either into the question of the actings of the defender, or the other questions of considerable weight and difficulty which have arisen upon the title of the pursuers. At a former stage of this action, Lord Adam, who was the Lord Ordinary when it came into Court, suspended the decree in absence. On a reclaiming note it was in this Division thought that the facts ought to be investigated. I was not present at that judgment, but I see no reason to differ from it. And indeed it would have been difficult to have arrived at the conclusion which Lord Trayner has reached without these facts having been ascertained. At the same time, in regard to the question of title, I am inclined, if it were necessary to decide that question, to concur with the original judgment of Lord Adam, and that to a large extent in consequence of the actings of the parties under the arrangement which is said to have been induced by the fraud of the defender. I am also inclined to be of opinion with the Lord Ordinary, that the discharge which was granted by the company to the defender in the course of the operations of the company is sufficient of itself to bar this action, and still more is that the case when the proceedings of the company are taken into consideration.

As the whole case is fully discussed in the note of the Lord Ordinary, I shall simply, upon this matter of title, content myself with enumerating the topics that have weighed with me in coming to the result I have indicated.

1. The pursuer and his cedents were partners in this company. The company was formed for the object I have already explained, and Dunnett was appointed manager of the company when it started in 1877. The company became dissatisfied with Dunnett's management, and appointed Mr Olsen, who had been Dunnett's adviser in the purchase, to succeed him; and Olsen took the opportunity of directing a survey of the whole estate, from which it appeared that the representations which had been made by Dunnett in regard to the extent of the estate, the amount of timber, and the prospects of the mineral workings, had been entirely misrepresented. That was in 1879-80, but notwithstanding this the company went on for three years afterwards. It was ultimately wound up at the end of 1883. This action was raised in 1884.

Now, I should have doubted, independently of the discharge, whether under these circumstances any recourse could be had upon the alleged misrepresentations of Dunnett. Even if it could be said—which probably could be said—that when the discharge between Dunnett and the company was granted, the company were not aware of the extent of the misrepresentations of which the pursuer complains, I cannot think that the company or its shareholders were entitled to go on for three years and deal with the subject of their purchase, and to exhaust, as in fact they seem to have done, the whole available timber on the estate, and then to go back and demand from Dunnett recompense for the sums which they had thus unprofitably expended. I think, if they meant to make any such demand, it should have been made at once,—that is to say, whenever they found that these representations had been made. I am, therefore, of opinion that the company itself could not, after the discharge in question, and their proceedings after the date of the discharge, have brought the demand which is before us in this action. I think that on well-known principles they were not entitled to take that course. Therefore, although I think the discharge itself in 1879, according to its fair interpretation, would have been conclusive against such a proceeding, I think their retention of the subject-matter of the contract between them and Dunnett, and their taking the chance of its turning out to profit for three years, would have been quite sufficient to exclude it.

If this be so, can the partners of the company have a higher right than the company itself? I think not; and that all the more that in this instance at all events restitutio in integrum is entirely impossible. Nor do I think it makes any difference on this head that the company is now dissolved, and that the claim which is made in the summons takes the shape of an individual action on delict. If any such claim arose, it was vested in the company, who could unquestionably have discharged it in terms, and could have bound the shareholders by that discharge. Therefore I should be inclined to hold that neither on the ground of a debenture debt, nor in respect of the shares which were taken in the company, had the individual shareholders any right to insist for reparation.

II. But, in the second place, I think the allegations of fraudulent misrepresentation have not been established. That Mr Dunnett acted on very sanguine and ill-founded impressions as to the value of this property, and as to its chances of being worked to profit, no one can doubt. The question is how far he was entitled to say to others what were his views about the property as a field for investment. I do not question that although a man may be perfectly honest in his belief on matters of that kind, if he states to others as matters he has ascertained things which he had no reasonable ground for believing, such unreasonable statements may amount to fraud. But it seems to me that this is not a case of that nature. I think that Dunnett did reasonably believe the statements which he made. I have no doubt upon that matter. That he had some grounds for that belief seems also certain.

Apart from the details, into which I do not mean to go, the general outlines of the case on this head are the following: Mr Dunnett made representations beyond doubt, Firstly, of the extent of the property; secondly, of the extent of the timber grown upon it; and thirdly, of the expectations of possible profit from the minerals, which have not turned out to be accurate. And it is true—and the fact has a bearing in both directions—that he offered his own personal guarantee in regard to the accuracy of some of them. But he never intended that these statements should be taken as the basis of a concluded arrangement without further action by the persons with whom he was corresponding. On the contrary, he urged them to make their own inquiries, and to send out one or more of their number to do so—that is, to make on the spot the investigations which were necessary, and thus test the representations which he had made. The negotiators did so. They sent out two gentlemen of the name of Robinson and Broom, who did see the property, and took what steps they thought right to test the accuracy of Mr Dunnett's statements. After spending several days in that task, they returned and reported not only that Mr Dunnett's statement was accurate, but that it fell short of the truth. And I attach great importance in this inquiry as to the good faith of Dunnett to this singular fact. If it had turned out on the inquiry of those gentlemen that Dunnett had other means of knowledge which he did not communicate to them, and that he had concealed from them information which he had possessed, there can be no doubt that that would have been a very material element in the case. But not only does he not appear to have done so, but, as far as I can judge from the testimony, those two gentlemen who were sent out on the part of the speculators had access to all the information, and to all the sources of information, from which Dunnett's representations were made. And, having that access, and obtaining that information, they came to the same conclusion which Dunnett himself had arrived at. That those gentlemen were acting in perfect good faith is certain. Therefore I think it speaks strongly in favour of the good faith of Dunnett, who from the same accounts came to the same conclusion. In particular, Mr Dunnett's main adviser was Mr Olsen, of whom the parties appear to have a high opinion. Mr Olsen's knowledge of the property was much greater and much longer than that of Dunnett. The deputation were in communication with Mr Olsen during the whole time of their stay in Norway, and it is quite certain that Mr Olsen said nothing to them that could induce them to think that Dunnett was playing them false, because, if he had played them false, it is certain that they never would have reported in the terms which they ultimately used. And this applies to all the three grounds on which the allegation of misstatement and fraud rests. (1) It is said that the extent of the property was entirely overstated, but Mr Dunnett informed them from the first that no survey had ever been made. His information was mainly derived from two reports by men of skill and position in the district, which had been obtained by Olsen himself on Dunnett's requisition; and the calculation of the area of the ground was made from general facts which had been reported to Dunnett through Olsen. It is plain also that Olsen's impression at that time in regard to the area of the ground was the same as Dunnett's, and, had he been of any different opinion, he certainly would have informed Robinson and Broom of the fact. (2) It is said that the number of trees was misrepresented and overstated. Now, Dunnett had taken the amount of timber from the reports of those two Norwegian experts whom Olsen himself had employed for that purpose; and he had no reason to suppose that their estimate, such as it was, was not accurate. I think that he was entitled to rely upon their testimony. At all events, I think their statements were enough to prevent Dunnett's representations from being considered as fraudulent. It is to my mind entirely inexplicable that in so large a transaction as this, where a very considerable sum was to be put in hazard, those delegates did not at once direct a regular survey to be made. Indeed, if Dunnett himself had proceeded as most men of care would have done, he would not have made his proposal without having these matters made so distinct that there could be no misapprehension on the subject. But it was open to Robinson and Broom to ascertain the fact with certainty, and as they did not think it necessary, proceeding substantially on the same grounds and the same information as Dunnett, I do not see how it can be charged as a fraud against Dunnett that he did not take those very obvious precautions which were as open to his correspondents as to himself. (3) As to the ore, I think there was no fraud there either. That there were specimens of iron ore lying about the property, that there were the remains of old workings, and an apparent possibility of still farther work, was quite true; and beyond that, I do not think that Dunnett had made any representation of fact for which he had no warrant, and he left it to his correspondents to satisfy themselves upon that head.

Such, as shortly stated as those voluminous prints will allow, is my view of the result of this proof as far as Dunnett is concerned. His statements were certainly imperfect in the last degree, but I see no reason to think that he did not honestly believe them, and I cannot affirm that he had no reason for that belief. I observe that Olsen in the latter part of the proceedings throws some discredit on the Norwegian reporters, on whose authority substantially Dunnett acted, but I see no evidence that he made such statements to Robinson and Broom, which it certainly was his duty to do, if at that time he entertained that opinion. On the contrary, from the correspondence it is plain that he did not entertain, or at all events did not express, that opinion until a very late stage.

These are the views I take of the more prominent aspects of the case. I think the Lord Ordinary's view upon the evidence is sound. It is quite certain that all the parties concerned acted with almost incredible credulity and rashness, but I think the same may be said of all of them, and I do not see any ground on which in justice Mr Dunnett can be made liable under the conclusions of this action.

Lord Young.—I come to the same conclusion. We are here in a suspension of a decree, but we must deal with the case in every way as if we were in an original action in which decree in absence is pronounced, regarding the respondents as the pursuers, and the complainer as the defender.

There is to begin with a melancholy amount of litigation. I much wish that it could have been avoided, for I think in the end the case comes to a very simple issue indeed. I am disposed to concur in acquitting Dunnett of any actionable fraud, but it does require some charity to cover his transgressions. I cannot sympathise with the favourable account which he gave of this property. I think it does require a deal of charity to cover the extravagance of his statement. But then we have a good deal of charity, and, even if the pursuer had a title here, and there was no impediment in the way of his action, he would have failed. But I am of opinion that he—(I should say "they," because he represents others)—I am of opinion that they are not in a position to sue the action at all. They were the partners of a joint stock company, and the ground of action is that they were induced to become constituent members of the joint stock company by the defender holding out the prospect of this estate in Norway being so successful as a timber-growing estate. It is said that the prospect which he thus held out was delusive, in short fraudulent, and that he must therefore give them compensation. I know of no precedent for such a case as that. I know of no case approaching that. The company was formed, and they purchased the estate upon the representations held out to them, including the alleged falsehood on which the present action is founded. I have laid out of view the measures which they took to satisfy themselves regarding the value of the estate, and the expediency of making the purchase before actually making it, for they themselves never sought to repudiate the purchase which they had made upon those representations. Whether the representations were true or untrue, honest or fraudulent, they made the purchase, and retained the property for years, selling it as their own, and never making any attempt to get rid of it or of the contract. They made the purchase in 1877. They seem to have made something out of it until 1884. In that year it was thought better to sell it. A short time before it was thus sold by the company, some of the constituent members of the company bring an action, not to set aside the contract as induced by fraudulent representations, but for damages, because these same fraudulent representations on which the contract was made had induced the partners to associate themselves together as a company. I cannot commend that as very ingenious. One sees the view, but it cannot in my opinion be sustained. I put the question to Mr Gloag in the course of the argument, whether any distinction could be made between the case of a joint stock company and an ordinary partnership at common law? Mr Gloag, with that candour and loyalty to the law which one always finds in him, said he could see no distinction. I should not found on that for a moment of course to the prejudice of Mr Gloag's argument, if I could see any distinction myself. If I could see that any such distinction existed, and was well founded, I should act upon it. But, I repeat, I can see no such distinction in the matter with which we are dealing, as between a joint stock company under the Companies Acts, and a private partnership at common law. Just put the case, therefore, of A and B being induced by a magnificent prospectus, setting forth the glories of an estate in Norway, and the profit to be made by a purchaser, saying to himself and two or three others, "Let us associate together as a partnership and buy it." They accordingly communicate with the proprietor who has given this account of it, and who says to them, "Will you buy the estate, for it is all that I represent it to be?" Well, the long and the short of it is that they do buy it, and they hold on to it for a period of seven years, and then sell it as their own, in the meantime discharging all claims against the partners and against the parties who had sold it to them. Then A and B and the other individuals say, "Oh, this leaves us at liberty to bring an action of damages against you the parties who sold this estate to us for having induced us to join together for the purpose of buying this estate." I think that extravagant. I think that is a correct representation of the present case, if there is no distinction between the case of a joint stock company and a partnership at common law, and the very learned counsel for the respondent agrees with me in thinking that there is none.

But I go further. I think there is no distinction between the company and the case of an individual adventurer. If an individual adventurer, induced by those representations, had bought the estate from Mr Dunnett, engaged him as manager, taking his guarantee and all the rest of it, in terms of the prospectus of 9th August 1877, and after two years of his management had found the estate not to be what had been represented, and that it was quite unprofitable, and that the manager was running up claims upon them, and felt that it was better to quit grips with Dunnett and come to terms with him, could anyone say that it had been in the contemplation of that party to bring an action afterwards for damages for having been induced to form the company? Just look at the arrangement to which the parties came. The agreement says,—"In respect of the settlement of the second party's claim in manner foresaid,"—that is to say, that he should take £600, £300, £200, and so on, and should have a mortgage over the property for payment,—"both parties hereby cancel and declare to be no longer in force or binding upon either of them the contract heretofore subsisting between them as embodied in the said memorandum or prospectus of 9th August 1877, and the parties mutually abandon and discharge all claims at the instance of the one party against the other for implement of the obligations specified in the said memorandum or prospectus." Was it in the contemplation of the purchaser to bring such an action as we have here? Can it be said to have been in the contemplation of this party to bring an action for damages for having been by fraudulent misrepresentation induced to purchase the very estate over which he is thus giving him a mortgage in satisfaction of the payment of his claim? The guarantees which were exchanged are somewhat numerous. To begin with, the vendor, Mr Dunnett, guarantees that £2850 is to be repaid to the buyers within four years from the company's entering on possession. He is, in short, under a series of obligations as to the truth of the representations in the prospectus. After two years and a-half of experience they discharge him, he agreeing to limit his demand against them to a certain sum. In such circumstances would an individual, or an ordinary partnership at common law, be allowed to bring such an action? I do not mean that there might not be an ascertainment of some horrid conspiracy and fraud of which parties have been made the victims, and of which they had no knowledge at the time. Under rare or exceptional circumstances the Court will be astute, or even ingenious, to find a remedy to do justice. But the claim in the present action, or any such action as I am mentioning at the instance of an individual adventurer, or common law partnership, for having extravagantly represented the value of an estate—the quantity of timber upon it, the iron ore in it, and all the rest of its advantages, which were found to be deceitful at the time that they were made—I mean deceitful not in the sense of any fraud having been perpetrated, but misleading—I say such an action would never be permitted after settlement of this kind. That is a settlement which would have been conclusive in the case of an ordinary partnership, and individual adventurer, and which for the same reason is conclusive in the case of a joint stock company. I have said so much with reference to the discharge. But I think the right to determine whether the contract of discharge is to be set aside, and damages claimed in respect of fraudulent inducements held out to form the company, lay with the company itself. It was for the company to determine, after their experience of the property, whether they would stand by the contract they had made, or set it aside, if they had ground for doing so. It was for them to judge whether they had grounds for setting it aside on the head of fraud, and also to judge whether it was for their interest to do so, even if they had grounds. Well, they determined that it was not for their interest to do so. They stood aside for seven years without ever challenging the contract on which they held the property. And ultimately they sold the property as their own, having no title to it except what Dunnett gave them. Well, could the constituent members of the company take it up, and say, We shall bring an action? Is such a thing possible? I can conceive circumstances—it does not require much ingenuity to do so, although the circumstances would be very different from what we have here—in which if a company came to an end, leaving the individual members of it great sufferers by some fraud which had been practised upon them, there would be resources in the Court to do justice to the injured parties, the disjecta membra of the dissolved company. There are resources in law, as well as in civilisation: legal resources are a part of the resources of civilisation. But there is no case of that kind here. This is a case of a company, having a legal contract, taking over a certain property, retaining it for a length of time, and then dissolving the company, and those who had been members of the company coming and complaining of the fraudulent representations in consequence of which the company, as they say, was formed. It is a mere pretence to say that it was damage done by their becoming members of the company, with a view to buying. I am therefore against the respondent here, not merely upon the merits, but also upon the title and the discharge, although it requires a little charity to cover the complainer's representations, and to acquit him of all guile.

Your Lordship directs my attention to the minute of the company, dated 19th July 1880, three years before this action was raised, which states,—"The secretary read letter from Mr Dunnet of 19th ultimo, with legal opinion enclosed, as to the discrepancy between his estimate and Mr Olsen's survey of the contents of Vaagsoeter, when it was resolved to take no further action in the matter." That confirms the conclusion to which one is irresistibly led by the whole of the patent facts of the case, that the company took a title to the property in 1877, and had pretty well discovered what quantity of timber and iron ore was on it before 1879. But they dismissed their manager, Mr Dunnett, who was also the seller, and went on with the concern under different management. That shews that they did not judge it to be expedient to challenge the transaction on the head of fraud, but resolved that it was expedient to stand by the contract, and to deal with the property as their own accordingly. Now that in my opinion is absolutely conclusive, and it excludes the individual members of the company from any remedy in the matter.

Upon these grounds, I confess without any considerable doubt, I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed which suspends this decree as one unfounded in point of fact. I should only like to add that while the Lord Ordinary finds expenses due subject to modification, I myself see no ground for modification, and I should therefore give the successful party full expenses.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—There are three questions put forward in the present litigation. The first is whether the pursuer, who is the reclaimer, is entitled to sue; the second is whether, if he is entitled to sue, he has proved the fraud which is the ground of imputed liability; and the third is whether the defender's liability was not discharged by the minute of agreement and discharge entered into between the company which took over the estate in question and the defender, and which was signed in 1879, or, at all events, whether it was not discharged by the conduct of the company in keeping, working, and ultimately selling the estate, without intimating a claim for loss said to have been sustained.

On all these questions, except the first, the Lord Ordinary has given judgment for the defender, and I am so well satisfied, not merely with the result, but with the reasons which the Lord Ordinary has given, that I refer to them as the expression of my views of the case. I could add nothing likely to render the judgment clearer or more satisfactory. But I differ from the Lord Ordinary on the plea against title. He has repelled that plea. I think it ought to be sustained. The matter is, in the circumstances, one of small moment to the parties, since judgment is to be given on other grounds, but the plea is one of general importance, and therefore it appears to me to be right that I should in a general way communicate my views on the subject.

In the autumn of 1877 the defender circulated among his friends in Glasgow a prospectus of the Vaagsoeter Company, Limited, the purpose of which, should it be formed, was to purchase from him the Vaagsoeter estate in the kingdom of Norway. The shareholders who saw the prospectus were favourably impressed with the venture, but it was only after two of them had gone as a deputation to inspect the estate that the company was formed. The company thus formed was registered on 6th November 1877 under the name of the Vaagsoeter Estate Company, Limited, with a capital of £5000 divided into 500 shares of £10 each. The pursuer and his cedents were original shareholders. The price to be paid for the property was £3800, of which three-fourths, or £2850, was paid in cash, the other fourth being paid in ninety-five paid-up shares of the company. Possession of the estate was at once taken by the company, and the defender, in terms of a relative provision of the prospectus, proceeded to Vaagsoeter as their resident manager. That was in fulfilment of a clause by which it had been agreed that the vendor should become the company's local resident manager in Norway, subject to the board of directors, at the annual salary of £250, and undertake to erect a loading pier, with twenty feet draught of water, and also put up suitable saw-mill machinery, with pay-office and manager's house, at a cost not to exceed £800. The defender further agreed to advance cash sufficient to put forth the first two cargoes of timber, thus saving the company from creating more capital for working expenses.

The results of this arrangement were not satisfactory either to the company or to Mr Dunnett. Misunderstanding and controversy followed. On the one hand, the company complained that he was not providing the machinery, for which money was to be advanced by him. On the other hand, he put forward claims for salary and certain other charges, payment of which he alleged to be in arrear. The end of it was that Mr Dunnett was superseded as the manager in October 1878, and Mr Olsen, who had been his adviser in the purchase of the property, was appointed his successor. In 1879 a compromise was arranged, and in December of the same year a formal minute of agreement and discharge was arranged and signed by the parties. It is necessary to look at what this document sets forth. It says,—"Whereas disputes have arisen between the parties as to the intent and meaning of the second party's contract with the company constituted by a certain memorandum or prospectus, dated 9th August 1877, under the hands of the second party, and afterwards adopted as the basis of his agreement with the company, for the sale to the company of the Vaagsoeter estate in Norway, and appointment of the second party as the manager of the company in Norway; and whereas the second party ceased to be manager of the company as at 31st October 1878, at which date he claimed, inter alia, from the company the sum of £306 as advances by him on behalf of the company, and salary to that said date, with interest thereon since said date at 5 per cent per annum; and whereas parties have now arranged for the settlement of said claim, and all the other claims arising the one party against the other in respect of their said contract, and the cancelment of the said second party's appointment as manager, on the following terms:—Therefore," the company undertake to make the payments specified in the first and second heads of the agreement; and under the fourth head it is said,—"in respect of the settlement of the second party's claims in manner foresaid, both parties hereby cancel and declare to be no longer in force or binding on either of them the contract heretofore subsisting between them as embodied in the said memorandum or prospectus of 9th August 1877, and the parties mutually abandon and discharge all claims at the instance the one against the other for implement of the obligations specified in said memorandum and prospectus."

The company continued to carry on the works at Vaagsoeter under the management of Mr Olsen until 1883, when the property was sold by the company to him in 1884. Soon after that a resolution was passed to wind up voluntarily the Vaagsoeter Estate Company, Limited.

Now, these are the circumstances in which this plea of want of title arises for decision. The pursuer says that he is not at all affected by the discharge or by the subsequent transactions of the company in connection with the estate, because the ground of action is fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment, leading to the formation of the company and the agreement of the pursuer to become a shareholder. This appears to me to be an erroneous view of the matter. The formation of the company, and the taking of shares by the pursuer, were things with which the defenders had no concern. At anyrate they were things which did not in the least cause the loss from which the pursuer is said to have suffered. The pursuer's case is, in short, neither more nor less than an attempt to recoup his and his cedent's share of the loss sustained by the company through the purchase of the Vaagsoeter estate. The company purchased the property, they paid the price, and they carried on the management of the estate. They discharged the defender in the course of this management. In the end they sold the property; and the pursuer, in my view, cannot be more successful in a demand for damages on such a head than the company itself would have been. But both the company and the defender are barred by their own conduct, in keeping the property as their own and in disposing of it also as their own. They may not now repudiate the contract between them and Dunnett, and if they cannot do that it is plain they cannot insist in an action for damages founded on the assumption that the contract was one induced by fraudulent means, and one from the consequences of which they are entitled to be relieved. Neither the case of Lumsden nor the case of Leslie appears to me to be in conflict with the views which I have expressed, and indeed there is not, so far as I know, any case by which a title to sue in circumstances like those which here occurred has been put forward, or at all events sustained by the Court.

On the whole matter my opinion is that this reclaiming note ought to be refused, and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary sustained.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Your Lordships are of opinion that fraud has not been established against the defender, and I am not disposed to differ from that conclusion; but that is to my mind quite enough for the decision of the case, and I would rather avoid giving any opinion on the somewhat intricate questions which have been raised by the parties.

THE COURT adhered, and gave the complainer full expenses.

Ship—Foreign—Bill of lading—Proof.—In an action brought by the owners of a Danish ship against the indorsees of the bill of lading for freight on the cargo delivered to them at the port of discharge in Scotland, the defenders averred that they had not received the full cargo specified in the bill of lading granted by the master at Riga, the port of shipment, and pleaded that they were entitled to retain from freight the value of the deficiency, alleging that by Danish law (the law of the flag) the bill of lading was conclusive against the owners. After a proof, which shewed that the indorsees of the bill of lading had only agreed to pay for so much of the cargo as was delivered to them, held that the defenders had only become indorsees of the bill of lading to the extent of the cargo actually on board the vessel, and were not entitled to retain any part of the freight.

Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Craighill) that the owners were only liable for the cargo actually put on board, and that by the law of Scotland, which, as the law of the forum, must regulate the proof, the bill of lading was not conclusive evidence as to the amount of cargo shipped.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
I.

THIS action was brought by Caroline Halmoe and Albert Hansen Petersen, Marstal, Denmark, the owners of the Danish vessel "Immanuel," in the Sheriff Court of Linlithgowshire, against John Denholm & Company, shipbrokers, Bo'ness, to recover £42, 14s. 6d. as the balance of freight alleged to be due under a charter-party entered into at Riga on 11th September 1886 between A. H. Petersen, master and part owner, acting on behalf of the pursuers, and Gustav Schmidt & Company, merchants there. In defence Denholm & Company stated that the full cargo mentioned in the bill of lading had not been delivered, and maintained that they were entitled to retain the value of the deficiency from the freight. They averred that the master had failed, contrary to the recognised custom, to see that the proper cargo in number and dimensions had been shipped, and was thus guilty of gross negligence, for which the owners were responsible; further, that the bill was a clean bill of lading, and that "the pursuers are Danes, and the vessel 'Immanuel' belongs to a Danish port, but the charter-party and bill of lading was entered into at a Russian port with a Russian subject. The Danish law (being the law of the flag), or alternatively, the Russian law (being the lex loci contractus), are the laws which regulate the authority of the master to bind his owners and the responsibility of the pursuers under said bill of lading. By said laws a clean bill of lading signed by the master is conclusive evidence that the amount therein mentioned was actually shipped as in a question between the owners and an onerous indorsee. According to said laws the shipowner is responsible to such indorsee for the value of the difference between the cargo as specified in said bill of lading. whether signed by himself or his servant the shipmaster, and the cargo actually delivered. Under said law it is within the scope of the master's authority to bind his owners for the quantities mentioned in the bill of lading, where the same could have been ascertained by him during the course of shipment, and the owners are estopped as against an onerous indorsee of the bill of lading, who has taken it for a valuable consideration on the faith of the acknowledgment which it contains, from denying the truth of the statements to which the master has given credit by his signature, so far as these statements relate to matters which are or ought to be within his knowledge. The pursuers have therefore no right to recover freight, except subject to payment of the sum due to the defenders in respect of the foresaid short delivery." *

They pleaded;—(1) The defenders having contracted with the master as acting for and on behalf of the owners of said vessel to take delivery of a small remnant of the cargo and pay freight on correct delivery of the cargo as per bill of lading, and correct delivery not having been made, they ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) The pursuers' liability under said bill of lading falls to be regulated by the laws of Denmark and Russia, and the pursuers being by said laws bound to make good to the defenders the value of the difference between the cargo as therein specified and the cargo actually delivered, the defenders' counter claim should be sustained. (3) Separatim, The defenders, as onerous indorsees and holders of the bill of lading signed by the master and owner, are entitled to delivery of the full quantities therein specified, or to retain from the freight the value of the short delivery.

A proof was led. The following facts were admitted or proved:—On 11th September 1886, A. H. Petersen, master and part owner of the Danish ship "Immanuel," entered into a charter-party (which was in the English language) at Riga, on behalf of the owners, with Gustav Schmidt & Company, merchants there, whereby it was agreed that the "Immanuel," then at Riga, should proceed to Poderaa Bight and there load a full cargo of pit-props, and proceed to any good and safe port in the Firth of Forth which the charterers might direct on her arrival in Leith Roads, freight to be at the rate of £1, 4s. for "each St Petersburg standard of 165 English cubic feet taken on board in frames measured longside of the ship." The "Immanuel" took in her cargo at Poderaa Bight and returned to Riga. Bills of lading were signed by the master at Riga on 20th September, setting forth that there were shipped in good order and well conditioned by the charterers "8481, say eight thousand four hundred and eighty-one pieces white wood props per specification on the other side hereof on deck, 1921 pieces being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned" at a port in the Firth of Forth, "unto order or their assignees, he or they paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 24s. per delivered standard of 165 cubic feet English piled on land, and measured in frames by the official custom-house measurers." The "Immanuel" sailed from Riga with her cargo, and she arrived in Leith Roads and was ordered to Bo'ness, where she arrived on 23d October, and where she was ready to discharge on Monday 25th October.

Prior to the arrival of the vessel at Bo'ness, J. F. Napier & Company, timber-merchants, Sunderland, who had become proprietors of the cargo, had been in communication with John Denholm & Company, shipbrokers,

* In the course of the process the pursuers lodged a minute, in which they "admit the defenders' statement as being the law of Denmark; but the pursuers, while admitting that, deny the statement that the Danish law (being the law of the flag), or alternatively, the Russian law (being the lex loci contractus), have any bearing on the case, and is not applicable to decide the matter in dispute, seeing the performance of the contract under the charter-party and B/L is expressly declared therein to be in Scotland. Further, the pursuers are willing to admit that Albert Hansen Petersen, designed by them in article 1 of the condescendence as master, and which is still adhered to as being correct, yet notwithstanding that, and to save delay and obviate commission to take evidence in Denmark being granted, hereby admit, so as to meet the defenders' contention, that the said Albert Hansen Petersen is a part owner; but on the assumption that the law of the flag cannot apply, deny that the B/L, signed by the master as such, binds the ownership in any respect."

Bo'ness, with the view of selling it to them. According to the evidence of Welsh, the cashier for Denholm & Company (which was concurred in by Mr Denholm), Denholm & Company, having had some shortage on a previous cargo shipped by the same shippers, were not willing to take the risk of shortage in delivery, and were desirous that the master should undertake it. He refused to do so, however, and ultimately, on 30th October 1886, Denholm & Company arranged to take the cargo and pay for it as delivered from the ship, and the bill of lading was indorsed to them. On the same day Denholm & Company wrote to the master intimating that they were now the "receivers of your present cargo pit-props and holders of the bill of lading, and we hereby agree to pay whatever freight and demurrage may be legally found due on correct discharge in terms of the bill of lading and charter-party." The discharge of the cargo was completed on the following Monday, 1st November. The quantity of pit-props delivered was less by 117 pieces than were specified on the back of the bill of lading, and therefore less by a number of feet than the bill of lading set forth. Measured according to standard, there were 54 standards, and not 59, and the difference in value between the cargo as per the bill of lading and that delivered was £28, 16s. 9d.

The master deponed that he had delivered at Bo'ness all the cargo he received from the shippers at Riga, and no evidence to the contrary was led; and the defenders led evidence to the effect that the custom was where a master was signing a bill of lading for a cargo which he did not know to be exactly of the amount there stated, to insert a clause stating that the numbers or measurement were not known.

The Sheriff-substitute (Melville) decerned against the defenders.

The Sheriff (Crichton) on appeal found, inter alia, in point of fact,—"(12) That on Saturday the 30th of October 1886 the said Albert Hansen Petersen received from the defenders the letter No. 11 of process, intimating that they were 'now the receivers of the cargo pit-props and holders of the bill of lading,' and agreeing to pay whatever freight or demurrage might be legally found due: (13) That on Monday the 1st of November 1886 the unloading of the cargo was resumed, and was finished the same day: (14) That the quantity of pit-props delivered amounted to nearly 54 standards, and that this was the whole quantity put on board at Poderaa Bight: (15) That the difference in value between the quantity of pit-props stated in the bill of lading to have been put on board and the quantity actually put on board and delivered amounts to £28, 16s. 9d.: (16) That the defenders claim to deduct this amount from the amount of freight sued for: (17) That the freight due for the cargo delivered amounts to £64, 14s. 6d., which, with £2 as a gratuity to the master, amounts to £66, 14s. 6d., but from which there falls to be deducted the sum of £1, 7s., leaving a balance of £65, 7s. 6d.: (18) That to account of this sum the pursuers have received £35, 5s. 1d.: Finds in law that the defenders are not entitled to deduct from the freight payable in respect of the goods delivered the said sum of £28, 16s. 9d.: Further, that the defenders are liable to the pursuers in the sum of £6 for demurrage: Therefore finds the defenders liable to the pursuers in the sum of £36, 2s. 5d., and decerns therefor accordingly."

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The bill of lading was a "clean" one, containing no reservation, and the master, by the law of the place to which his owners, from whom he got his authority, belonged, could bind his owners by his statement that the cargo mentioned in it was actually on board. It was of no avail to say the law of Scotland or England gave him no such authority. It was different in that respect from the law of most of northern Europe, and the law to which to appeal on such a question was the law of the flag. The question was—What authority had this master? That question must be answered by the law of the place of domicile of the ship, which was Denmark.[1] There was Scottish authority on the same point in an unreported portion of the case of Meier v. Küchenmeister (Lord Rutherfurd Clark, Ordinary).[2] By the Bills of Lading Act (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 111), the property of the cargo was entirely transferred to the defenders as onerous indorsees with all rights of suit against the captain. Even in Great Britain the statement of the quantity shipped was conclusive against the person signing the bill of lading.[*] Even if it were true that the defenders had only paid for fifty-four standards and not fifty-nine, the defenders would still be liable to Napier & Company for the whole.[3] But it had never been maintained on the other side in the inferior Court that the defenders were not onerous indorsees for the whole cargo which the bill of lading mentioned, and in point of fact Napier & Company had held them liable for the whole. Even if the loss had arisen only through the negligence of the captain the defenders were entitled to retain the sum in dispute against freight.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was the law of Scotland and England that the master did not make the shipowner responsible for the statements he made in the bill of lading so as to make it conclusive that the goods therein mentioned were actually put on board, and that law ought to be applied.[4] The owner could only be held liable if there were fraud to which he was a party. But in any view the evidence of the defenders themselves shewed that they purchased the bill of lading when suspicious of a short shipment.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an action raised by the owners of the schooner "Immanuel," of a port in Denmark, against John Denholm & Company, shipbrokers, Bo'ness. The claim of the pursuers is for the balance of an amount of freight due by the defenders in respect of a cargo of propwood, which it is admitted was received by the defenders under a bill of lading of which they were the indorsees. The defence in substance is, that the defenders are entitled to withhold the sum in question against an alleged short delivery of the propwood as specified in the bill of lading. It is admitted that the quantity specified in the bill of lading was erroneous, but it is replied that all that was received by the master of the schooner was delivered to the defenders, and that although a larger amount was specified in the bill of lading, yet, in point of fact, no greater amount was delivered on board than that received by the defenders. The Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute have both decided in favour of the claim of the pursuers, and we are now to consider the view of the learned Sheriffs on the merits of the question.

It is not denied on the part of the defenders that if the case were to be considered in the light of the law of this country the pursuers could not have been made liable for short delivery, if they carried and delivered the whole cargo received by them. But it has been maintained on the record, and is now admitted by the pursuers, that by the law of the place of the contract, which was Riga, a Russian port, and also by the law of the domicile of the owners, who are Danes, the bill of lading is conclusive evidence of the amount of cargo shipped. The pursuer says that consequently it was incompetent to receive any evidence to the contrary effect. I may remark in passing, that it seems doubtful whether this allegation of foreign law is relevantly stated, for the alternatives alleged on the record are mutually destructive of each other, and the defenders nowhere specify which of these two alternatives they hold to rule the present case. I think they were bound to specify by what foreign law the case was in their view to be decided. The alternative presented two inconsistent allegations not susceptible of being remitted to proof. Indeed, when the case came up for argument before us, we were still left in doubt whether the defenders maintained the law of Russia, being the lex loci contractus, or that of Denmark, the law of the domicile of the owners, to be applicable to the case. They are no doubt said to be identical, and both are admitted, and I do not need to press this view of the subject further. I therefore proceed to another aspect of it.

The Sheriff in his interlocutor has very accurately stated the facts as he has found them proved by the evidence before him, and it is therefore unnecessary that I should go over these facts in detail. But there are two facts established, as I think, by the testimony, and substantially found by the Sheriff, which are probably sufficient of themselves to enable us to dispose of this case. I think it clearly proved that the master delivered at Bo'ness the whole of the cargo which he received at Riga. On this subject, the defenders have not ventured to make any specific allegation, but the master and the crew sufficiently establish the fact. The second matter of fact which appears to me to be material is, that the defenders are not truly onerous indorsees of the bill of lading beyond the amount carried, delivered, and received.

In regard therefore to the first of those grounds on which the pursuers rest, if the allegation of foreign law is thrown out of view, there can be no question at all on the principles by which this case should be determined. Ever since the case of Grant v. Norway, in England, 10 C. B. 665, and the case of Munck v. Maclean & Hope, June 14, 1867, 5 Macph. 893, affd. March 27, 1871, 9 Macph. H. L. 38, in this country, it has been settled law that the owners of a trading vessel under a contract of affreightment cannot be made liable for a greater amount of cargo than they actually received on board. The case of Munck v. Maclean & Hope is specially valuable on this subject, and I refer in particular to the opinion of Lord Neaves in that case as giving effect to the elementary principles of the law of the contract of affreightment.

The general rule is thus stated by Storey in the Conflict of Laws (280)—"Where contracts are made in one country to be executed in another, where the contract is either expressly or tacitly to be performed in any other place, the general rule is in conformity to the presumed intention of the parties that the contract as to its validity, nature, obligation, and interpretation, is to be governed by the law of the place of performance." And the contract before us is eminently an illustration of the general principle, for from its nature it generally, at least, implies that the place where the contract is made is not to be the place of performance. The case of Munck v. Maclean & Hope was simply an application of this rule. In that case a foreign vessel had been chartered in Genoa in Italy to carry a cargo of bones to Leith. Therefore the place of the contract was foreign. Munck, who was the master, and represented the owners, was a Swede, and the vessel was Swedish, while the vessel was chartered to Leith, where the contract was to be performed. When the cargo came to be delivered it was found not to be in terms of the bill of lading, which represented a larger amount than the vessel brought. Therefore, the question which arose in that case was precisely the question which we have to deal with here. Hope & Maclean, the indorsees of the bill of lading, raised their action for the deficiency of cargo against Munck. But the Court held that, as the goods had never been put on board, the contract of affreightment never attached to them at all. In his opinion in that case Lord Neaves goes back to the foundation of this principle of international law, and demonstrates very clearly that the contract of affreightment proceeds on principles entirely exclusive of any such claim. He says,—"The indorsement substitutes the indorsee for the shipper, and constitutes him the owner, so as to give him the right to bring a rei vindicatio, but the idea of a man being the proprietor of goods which never existed is nonsense. There cannot be a contract of affreightment without a cargo," and he ends by saying,—"On these solid principles of general law I have arrived at the same result with your Lordships. There is no basis for this action as an action on a contract of affreightment, and no relevancy in it as an action of damages." It is true that neither in this case, nor in any of the preceding cases, was it pleaded that the law by which they were to be judged was that of the home of the carrier-ship. Nor, as far as I know, was any such plea ever maintained. Even if it had been, I should have thought it unfounded without the aid of those previous decisions. I am not aware of any case in which the effect of a bill of lading has been judged of by our Courts otherwise than by the law of this country, and that upon the general principle which I have already enounced.

It is said that a bill of lading is substantially equivalent to a bill of exchange, and cannot be redargued or contradicted by evidence. But that is not in the least the nature of the document, and so Lord Neaves in the opinion already quoted from, says,—"A bill of lading is not a literarum obligatio like a bill of exchange. It is a shorthand charter-party, by which in a simple form the liability of the shipowner is expressed, and the owner of the goods is enabled to transfer the property."

The same law was laid down in the case of Grieve v. König, Jan. 23, 1880, 7 R. 521, and in that case also the ship was foreign.

No authority was quoted to us for the contention maintained in regard to the operation of foreign law in so far as a contract of affreightment is concerned.

No. 34.

Dec. 7, 1887.
Owners of the "Immanuel" v. Denholm & Co.

The case quoted from the Probate Court in England of "The Gaetano and Maria" related to a matter entirely different,—namely, by what law the powers of the master of a trading vessel to take up money on bond and hypothecate the vessel of which he was master for necessary furnishings was to be judged,—and the Court of Appeal found that his powers were to be regulated by the law of the home of the ship, which is substantially the law of the domicile of the owners, who were the debtors in the bond. This question was in fact an old controversy as regards maritime law, and it is one dealt with by Mr Storey in his work on the Conflict of Laws. He states the view which the Courts in England had been in use to maintain, and not altogether with entire favour, for, he says—"In England it would be held—at least such seems the course of the adjudications—that a master's authority to bind the ship or the owner in a foreign port would be governed by the law of the domicile of the owner, and that, consequently, the master of an English ship could not bind the owner for advances or supplies in a foreign port which were not justifiable by the English law. But it is far from certain that foreign Courts, and especially the Courts of the country where advances or supplies were furnished, would adopt the same rules if the lender or supplier had acted with good faith, and in ignorance of the want of authority in the master." But it is quite unnecessary that we should enter into or decide that question. A bottomry-bond is simply a bond for borrowed money secured upon the property of the owners, namely, the ship itself. That is plainly a contract to be adjusted on different principles from those which regulate a contract of affreightment, which is to be performed in a country presumably different both from the country of the contract and the country of the home of the ship. It does not appear to me to have any bearing whatever on the controversy we have before us. I am the more satisfied that the Court of Appeal in the case of Gaetano and Maria meant to confine their judgment to the master's power to bind his owners for advances borrowed on the security of the ship, that I find that a similar question came before the same tribunal in the course of the next year, 1883, but with a different result. The case is that of The Chartered Bank of India v. Netherlands Steam Navigation Company, 10 Q. B. Div. 521. That was a case of collision, and the vessel said to be in fault belonged to Dutch owners, and to a Dutch port. It was pleaded that the law of Holland must govern the obligations contained in the bill of lading, but the Court disregarded the plea, and applied the law of England. Lord Justice Brett thought that the vessel might have been considered to be English, although registered in Holland, on grounds which he states, but that "even if this is to be regarded as a Dutch ship, it seems to me that the contract is nevertheless English."

I hold therefore that the tender of the allegation of foreign law did not, and could not, exclude the ascertainment of the fact, and the competency of admitting the evidence was for the forum to decide. The plea founded on it was properly disregarded.

But, in the second place, it is perhaps not necessary that we should even come to that result, although for myself I do not think that the question presents any real difficulty. This bill of lading is tendered on the part of the indorsee as an onerous holder. He alleges that he holds it for value, or at least he sues upon that assumption. But in point of fact it has, I think, been clearly shewn upon the proof that this is not so. He acquired the bill of lading from Messrs Napier, of Sunderland, who were the consignees of the cargo. It seems that the master of the vessel had commenced to deliver the cargo without any security for payment of the freight, and that after he had delivered a certain portion of it he stopped delivery until he should get security for payment. At this time, according to the statement of the defenders, Denholm & Company were in negotiation with Messrs Napier, the consignees, for the acquisition of the bill of lading; and they paid to the master a certain proportion of the freight, and thereupon the remainder of the cargo was delivered. The master was quite within his right in the course which he followed, as he was under no obligation to deliver until his freight was secure. But we have it in the evidence both of the defender himself, Mr Denholm, and of Mr Welsh, who was acting for him in this negotiation, that this bill of lading was acquired from the consignee on the express condition that the indorsee should only be responsible for the cargo delivered, and should pay for that only. The evidence of Mr Welsh is quite precise on that subject. Mr Napier went to Bo'ness to see Mr Denholm, and he says by that time a portion of the cargo had been delivered. "On Saturday, the following morning," he says, "Mr Napier himself came to Bo'ness, and we arranged with him that we would take the cargo and pay for it as delivered from the ship." Mr Denholm says he is the sole partner of Denholm & Company, and that he heard the evidence given by Mr Welsh. He adds,—"I concur in all that he has said." He also makes the remark that the mistake arose from the captain not having taken precautions to ascertain what cargo he took at Riga. That this was an oversight on the part of the master there can be no question, but as regards the present defenders, they have suffered nothing by it, seeing that they are only asked to pay freight on the cargo which they actually received. And, as far as I see, they have never become responsible in any way for any further sum. The result of the defence would be to liberate them from payment of freight for the cargo they actually received—a result which I cannot sanction.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The case presented by the pursuer is simple and conclusive on the admitted facts of the case, for he seeks payment of the freight of certain goods carried from Riga to Borrowstounness, and admittedly safely carried and delivered in good order to the defender, and received by him. The charges are admitted. Therefore on the admitted facts the pursuer's case is clear at the outset.

But the defender sets up a counter claim, and on that counter claim, which is for £28, we have had this litigation. I think it important at the outset that the pursuer's case is in itself unanswered. The facts on which the counter claim is pleaded as a set-off in this Scottish Court, before which the pursuer brings his case, are these: It is said that the bill of lading specified more goods to the value of £28 than were delivered to the defender, and that he is entitled by the law of Denmark to be paid the sum of £28; and this is the counter claim which the Scottish Court should, it is said, entertain as a set-off. Now, here we have, I think, a question of Scottish law. Will the Scottish law entertain this plea of set-off, founded upon the circumstances I have stated, in answer to the pursuer's liquid demand for the debt to him—for I think it is a specimen case of a liquid demand, being as it is a demand for the freight of certain goods carried on a certain voyage and delivered to the defender. I treat the question as one of the law of Scotland. I do not know whether the law of Denmark allows a set-off when such a counter claim is made. I am not sure that on the facts here I should have, as the Sheriff has done, entertained the set-off for consideration, or should not rather have given decree for the freight of these goods, which have been safely carried and delivered in good order according to the charges stated in the contract, and have left it to the defender to bring in an appropriate action any claim of damages for short delivery which he might have decided on bringing. But I do not need to enter upon that question, for the Sheriff allowed a proof to establish, if that could be done, the counter claim, and he has found that the bill of lading specified more goods to the extent of £28 than were delivered. There was an error in the bill of lading to that amount, and therefore if we are of opinion that the counter claim ought to be sustained, it will be so, to the extent of £28.

The case was argued as if it depended on whether the law of Scotland or that of Denmark applied. The first proposition maintained for the defenders was, that by the law of Denmark a bill of lading is conclusive evidence of the quantity of goods put on board the ship. I am prepared to say that though the law of Denmark be so, and I shall take it to be the law of Denmark that the Danish Courts will proceed as matter of fact upon the statement of the amount of goods in the bill of lading whenever a bill of lading is presented to them, I should not think that on that account this action is to be decided in the defenders' favour. But here is a ship, Danish, no doubt, but sent out by its Danish owner into the world to trade, not necessarily from Danish ports, but, as in this instance, from Riga in Russia, to a British port, and it was said at the bar, I think accurately, that the question would have been the same had the voyage been one from London to Leith, or from Aberdeen to the Firth of Forth—the contract of carriage must be read according to Danish law, because it was a Danish ship. Now, if the contract were produced in a Danish Court, that Court would, in the first place, require to get it translated. The ship sent forth into the world by its Danish owner makes this contract in the English language and in the English form to carry goods to a British port. The Courts of Denmark would be surprised, I think, if we were to ask them how to decide upon such a contract. I have no idea that because the ship sailed under the Danish flag the contract of carriage is to be construed according to the Danish law, or that any of the incidents of it are to be judged by that law. I think we must interpret this contract, written in our language and expressed in our form, for ourselves. We understand it, and it contains no technical matter of Danish law on which we require any assistance.

But what is pleaded is that it is a question of the master's power. But all that can here be said as to the master's power is that he has power to make contracts for the carriage of goods. And when he makes that contract the relation between the master and the owner is just a specimen case of general agency. No doubt when you come to such a matter as a power to borrow, it may well be that you have to refer to the law of the country under whose laws he was appointed the owner's agent. He may carry such an authority in his pocket, or it may be implied from his mere position as master, and to see if the latter is the case we might have to refer to Danish or other foreign law. But I should assume without inquiry—and I understand it to be the case—that if a Danish owner has sent his ship to trade between Russia and Britain, the master has his authority to enter into a contract of carriage. But there the question of authority in this case ends. How he exercises it depends on the particular contract he makes. I have that contract here before me in English, and need no help to construe it from the law of Denmark. Now, I think that there appears from the evidence in the case some suspicion that an attempt was made abroad to impose upon the master who was a Dane, not able to speak English—he was examined through an interpreter in this action—and who was contracting by a contract in English form, and written in English. He says he protected himself by getting it entered in the bill of lading that the cargo was to be measured by the custom-house measurers in this country, so that the bill of lading ran that the cargo was to be delivered unto order or their assigns, "he or they paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 24s., say twenty-four shillings Br. stg. per delivered standard of 165 feet Engl., piled on land and measured in frames by the official custom-house measurers, ship paying sixpence per frm. of 165 feet." I put the question to the defenders' counsel, "You claim the price of this shortcoming? Do you admit that you would have been liable to pay freight for it if it had come?" "Certainly," it was replied. Then if so, this bill of lading is not meant to be conclusive. If conclusive on the one side, it must be so on the other, and the defenders' counsel so argued the case,—"I am," he said, "to have the quantity specified in the bill of lading, and to pay freight for it." But the goods were to be measured on arrival, and the master tells us he insisted on that in order to regulate the payment of the freight. It is on that very contract that the goods are landed and measured on their arrival, and if I were told that the law of Denmark would lead to another result, and that I must give effect to it, I would not entertain a plea of set-off on a Danish law to that effect. I have great doubt if there is any. There is no suggestion here, even in the defenders' averments, that the law of Denmark is to any particular effect, but only that the bill of lading is conclusive evidence of the quantity put on board. But not surely on a contract which, as in this case, contains language to the contrary. It is the effect of that we have to consider. I have no doubt the law of Scotland determines that effect. It is really a question of evidence in any view, and laying aside the specialty which the captain says was introduced on his urgent request, and the specialty also which caused a good deal of difficulty at Bo'ness, according to the defenders' cashier, I repeat it is a question of evidence which belongs to the law of the remedy, and it was so treated, and quite properly, by the parties. For the captain when examined is asked,—"Did you deliver at Bo'ness exactly the same quantity of cargo that you received from the shippers at Riga?" and the question is objected to, and the objection being repelled, is answered in the affirmative. Now, was that a question of evidence for the Sheriff to determine, or was it incompetent to inquire into it? because by the law of Denmark the bill of lading is conclusive evidence that the captain received all which is contained in it. I think it clear it is a question of evidence, and that it is a misuse of language to call it a question of the power of the captain. It is not a question of power, but of liability on conclusive evidence of a fact—and a fact to be established by evidence competent according to the law of the place of remedy. It might conceivably have been, for example, that by the Danish law a bill of lading signed by the master was not any evidence at all of the quantity put on board, but a Scottish Court applied to for a remedy on the contract would say that the bill of lading was prima facie evidence of what was put on board—for that is our law. So, again, the law of the foreign country might not admit parole evidence, but ours, where the remedy is applied for, would admit it. I think, then, that the question is one of evidence, and upon the views I have stated my opinion is entirely against the defenders, and I would be prepared to decide against them.

My opinion is also against them on the remaining point. The ship arrived on 23d October. They became indorsees of the bill of lading on the 30th, and they became so after their suspicions were aroused that the quantity specified was not on board. They say so. On record they say,—(Stat. 1) "In or about the month of October Messrs J. F. Napier & Company, timber-merchants, Sunderland, entered into negotiations with the defenders for the sale and delivery to the defenders of the cargo per the 'Immanuel' as per bill of lading, but the said negotiations were not completed when the vessel arrived at Bo'ness, and Messrs Napier & Company, or their agent, Johann Anderson, shipbroker, Bo'ness, demanded and received delivery of nearly the entire cargo, and the remainder would have been duly discharged by them within the stipulated lay-days had not the master, on the afternoon of Friday, 29th October 1886, without any previous warning or intimation, stopped delivery and refused to proceed further therewith until he received cash or a bank guarantee for the full freight. The defenders thereafter purchased and agreed to accept from the said Messrs J. F. Napier & Company that portion of the cargo delivered to and received by them, and to discharge the remainder thereof, and on the 30th October they intimated this to the master by letter delivered to him on that date, and stated that they agreed to pay whatever freight and demurrage might be legally found due to him on correct discharge in terms of bill of lading and charter-party, and they also stated what steps they proposed to expedite the delivery of the remainder of the cargo. To this letter the master made no reply, but on the forenoon of Monday, the 1st November, he called at the defenders' office and intimated his willingness to give them delivery of the remainder of the cargo on the terms specified in their said letter. The discharge of the vessel was thereupon resumed, and was completed in seven hours." (Stat. 2) "The defenders became, on or about the said 30th October 1886, the onerous indorsees of the bill of lading." Had it not been then suggested to Denholm's mind that the full quantity was not on board? His cashier, Welsh, with whom he concurs, says,—"Previous to that,"—that is, that purchase of cargo—"we had had some difficulty owing to a shortage in the delivery of the cargo of the 'Clara,' which had been shipped by the same shippers, Messrs Schmidt & Company of Riga, and we had some doubts as to the receiving of this cargo, fearing some shortage thereof. Ultimately Messrs Denholm bought the cargo, and became onerous indorsees of the bill of lading. When the ship came to Bo'ness these negotiations were continuing, and we refused to take delivery of the cargo unless the captain undertook the responsibility of any shortage. He did not undertake any responsibility, or say anything on the subject. . . . On Saturday," 30th October, "Mr Napier came to Bo'ness, and we arranged with him that we would take the cargo and pay for it as delivered from the ship. Mr Anderson was to continue and complete the discharging, and then hand over the cargo to us. I saw the captain of the 'Immanuel' that evening, and told him the arrangements we had come to. He made no objections to the arrangements. I had several conversations with the captain as to my fear of a shortage of the delivery of the cargo owing to our former experience of the same shippers."

Thus it turns out that whereas the counter claim on which the set-off depends is made on the allegation that they were deceived by the bill of lading, indorsation of which they accepted in reliance on the fact that every pound mentioned in it was on board the ship, the facts are quite the contrary of that allegation, and they knew everything when they became indorsees of it which they know now.

On the whole matter, dealing, I confess, with the case as one to which the law of Scotland applies, I think the Sheriff did right in refusing to sustain the counter claim. I think I could not myself have entertained it at all, but I think that having entertained it he did right in rejecting it, and giving decree against the defender. That disposes of the whole case, except a question of £6 as demurrage, but we need not consider that, as Mr Salvesen for the defenders said he would not speak to that point.

I think the appeal should be dismissed, and that the judgment should be affirmed, with expenses.

Lord Craighill.—(After stating the facts and the nature of the counter claim maintained by the defenders)—The question between the parties really is, whether or not judgment ought to be given in favour of this counter claim? The Sheriff has found in the negative, and I concur in his judgment.

Several questions of greater or less importance were raised during the discussion affecting the law of the case, and upon one of those questions in particular the defenders have ably insisted—the question, namely, whether the bill of lading must not be held to be conclusive of the quantity of cargo put on board the "Immanuel"? That is said to be the law of Denmark, which is the home of the ship in question, but it is not the law of Scotland or of England, nor is it the ordinary maritime law of Europe. But however that may be, the question thus raised does not call for decision on the present occasion. For it seems to me the defenders have no case except upon the assumption that they are the onerous holders of the bill of lading for the full quantity specified in that document, which they are not. They have received all that was put on board. They bought and they paid for only what they received. That is according to my reading of the evidence, and particularly the evidence of the defenders' cashier, Mr Welsh, and of the defender Denholm himself, who concurs with his cashier. There is certainly no evidence to the contrary. The defenders got the bill of lading only to cover the cargo actually shipped. This was their contract with the Napiers, by whom the bill of lading was indorsed to them. They have received all to which they acquired right, and they have no claim to anything beyond. The consequence is that they have suffered no loss on account of short delivery. This seems to me to be conclusive of the case. There being no damage, there is no ground for withholding payment of the balance of the freight, and for that balance, therefore, the decree given by the Sheriff must be sustained.

Though it is unnecessary as a ground of judgment, I think it right to add that the contention maintained by the defenders as to the effect of the bill of lading on the obligation of the owners and the master appears to me to be unsound. The question is one of evidence, and therefore is one of procedure. Even on the assumption that the bill of lading would be conclusive as to the quantity taken on board in a Court subject to the law and practice of Denmark—taking these to be as alleged by the defenders—there is no rule of the kind to which the defenders can appeal in Scotland. Procedure is governed by the rules of the tribunal appealed to, and a bill of lading, even when held for value, not being conclusive on the question whether the quantity acknowledged to have been received was actually put on board, this Court may receive such evidence as is offered or may be thought necessary for the determination of this controversy. Tota re perspecta, the true conclusion is that the quantity delivered at Bo'ness was the full quantity shipped, and indeed this was not really disputed at the debate.

On the whole matter my opinion is that the appeal ought to be dismissed and the judgment of the Sheriff sustained.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—Your Lordships are of opinion that the defenders acquired right to the cargo which was actually put on board the ship, and that they were indorsees on the bill of lading to that extent, and to that extent only. I am willing to decide the case on that footing. On the questions of international law which were argued before us, I desire to reserve my opinion.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact that the goods delivered by the pursuers to the defenders at Bo'ness comprised the entire cargo shipped on board the 'Immanuel' at Poderaa Bight by the charterers: Find in law that the defenders, as holders of the bill of lading, are not entitled to claim more; therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against."

Thomson v. Dundee Police Commissioners.

THOMAS THOMSON, Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Robertson—Kennedy.
DUNDEE POLICE COMMISSIONERS, Respondents.—Balfour—Macfarlane.

Delegation—Police Commissioners—Power of committees to delegate to subcommittee—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 101), sec. 63—Dundee Police and Improvement Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. clxxxv).—Under the powers conferred by sec. 63 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, incorporated with the Dundee Police Act, 1882, the Dundee Police Commissioners appointed a works committee to superintend the building of houses, &c. This committee had no express power under the general or local Act to delegate its powers. The committee remitted certain plans to a "subcommittee" of their number. The subcommittee issued a deliverance in name of "the Commissioners" disapproving the plans. On appeal, held that the works committee had no power to delegate its powers, and that therefore the deliverance fell to be quashed.

M.

On 8th November 1886, at a meeting of the Magistrates and Town-Council of Dundee, as Commissioners of Police under the Dundee Police Act, 1882, the Commissioners appointed standing committees "for superintending and carrying into effect all matters falling under or in use to be discharged by the departments to which the said committees respectively relate, and which matters were and are hereby remitted to the said committees respectively accordingly, viz., . . . works committee, including paving and flagging of streets, and drainage; . . . and it was resolved that any two members of each of these committees shall form a quorum." The works committee consisted of twenty-four members.

On 24th October 1887 the works committee remitted the plans and sections of dwelling-houses proposed to be set up in Magdalen Yard Road by Mr Thomas Thomson, New Scone, "to the following subcommittee, with powers, viz.," (then followed the names of eight gentlemen, who were all members of the works committee)—"the convener convener, and two a quorum."

On 31st October a resolution was come to by the subcommittee, which bore that "the Commissioners disapproved of the said plans and sections" in certain respects.

The minute was headed,—"Minute of meeting of the subcommittee of the works committee of the Commissioners of Police for the burgh of Dundee."

This deliverance was served on Mr Thomson, who, on 14th November, appealed to the Court of Session under section 329 of the Dundee Police Act, 1882.

On the same day—14th November—the works committee met. The following is the minute of the meeting:—"The minute of meeting of this committee, of date 24th October last, and the minutes of meetings of the subcommittee of this committee, anent plans and sections of shop and dwelling-houses in Magdalen Yard Road, of dates 29th and 31st October last, were all held as read and approved of. . . . ."

Mr Thomson, in his appeal, craved the Court to quash the deliverance. The above facts were admitted. The appellant argued, as a preliminary point;—Under the Dundee Police Act the subcommittee had no power to issue a deliverance such as that complained of. The works committee had no power, either under the general or the local Act, to delegate its powers. The works committee was legally appointed under section 63 of the Police and Improvement Act, 1862, which was incorporated into the Dundee Police Act of 1882.* He did not deny that that committee could have issued the deliverance, but they might not delegate their power to a subcommittee. A delegate could not delegate his powers and duties.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—Under section 63 of the General Police Act there was a power to appoint committees. The subcommittee here appointed was only a subcommittee in name, it was really part of the works committee. If the word sub had been omitted there would have been nothing to shew that there was any distinction between the works committee and the subcommittee. The quorum was the same, and all the members of the subcommittee were members of the works committee. It was not, therefore, a case of delegation, but simply an arrangement for the convenience of the Police Commissioners in a burgh where so much work had to be done that committees were a necessity. [LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two cases which require attention here, Gillespie v. Young, July 20, 1861, 23 D. 1357, 33 Scot. Jur. 686, Lord Advocate v. Sinclair, Nov. 26, 1872, 11 Macph. 137, 45 Scot. Jur. 86.] The distinction between this case and those was that in the cases mentioned there was delegation of definite powers to a stranger, whereas here the subcommittee were all members of the committee. A certain number of the general committee were asked to carry out a particular class of business.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that here we have anything to do with public interest, or any general consideration of expediency. The sole question is whether the deliverance complained of is good under the Act. It bears ex facie that it is a deliverance of the Police Commissioners, and therefore, ex facie, it is a good statutory deliverance. But it is not disputed that in reality it was made not by the Commissioners nor by the committee appointed by them, but by a subcommittee of that committee. The simple question then is, had the committee power to delegate? If they had not then the deliverance is bad, if they had then it is good. What then are the powers of delegation in naming committees given to the Commissioners? That is to be found in section 63 of the General Police Act, which is incorporated into the Dundee Police Act. That section gives the Commissioners a very clear power to appoint committees, but it does not import that each committee so appointed can subcommit to a certain number of their own body to do anything in the name of the Commissioners or of the committee. So to decide would be to disregard the rule of the common law, which is perfectly fixed—delegatus non potest delegare. That is the ground on which I hold that this deliverance is altogether unstatutory and null, and that therefore it must be quashed.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

Poor—Residential settlement—Retention of settlement.—A husband died within four years after removing with his family from the parish of M, in which he had a residential settlement. His widow became chargeable in another parish sometime after the four years of absence from M had expired. Held that the derivative settlement in M which accrued to the widow on her husband's death had not been retained after the expiration of four years and a day from the time of removing from M.

Allan v. Higgins, Dec. 23, 1864, 3 Macph. 309, followed.

M.

WILLIAM ARTHUR, house-painter, acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Maybole. Shortly before Whitsunday 1881 he removed to work in Ayr, but his wife and family remained in Maybole till Whitsunday 1881, when he took them to live with him in Wallacetown, in the parish of Ayr.

On 23d March 1885, when still residing in Wallacetown, in the parish of Ayr, he was killed by an accidental fall when engaged at his work. He left a widow and young family.

In September 1885 his widow became a proper object of relief, and was relieved by the parish of Ayr.

An action of relief was raised in December 1886 in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire, at Ayr, by the parish of Ayr against the parish of Maybole, the parish of Dalmellington, which was the parish of Arthur's birth, and the parish of Stewarton, which was the parish of his widow's birth.

The Sheriff-substitute (Orr Paterson) held that Mrs Arthur became a proper object of relief in April 1885, when she received a sum of relief from the parish of St Quivox, and that that date being less than four years from the time of the removal from Maybole, where her husband had a residential settlement, her settlement derived from him had not been lost by absence from that parish at the time when she became a proper object of relief. He therefore found Maybole liable.

The Sheriff (Brand) on appeal held that Mrs Arthur was not a proper object of relief till more than four years had elapsed from Whitsunday 1881, and that the parish liable to relieve Ayr was Dalmellington, the parish of the birth of Arthur himself.

The parish of Dalmellington appealed.

At the debate on the appeal it was agreed by the parties that neither the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute nor that of the Sheriff could be maintained, the former having found that Mrs Arthur was a proper object of relief in April 1885, whereas it was admitted that she was not a proper object of relief till September 1885, after the expiration of four years from Whitsunday 1881, when the Arthurs left Maybole, while the latter had found Dalmellington liable as the parish of the husband's birth, a decision which could not be supported in law. The question argued, therefore, it being agreed that Dalmellington was not liable, was whether Maybole or Stewarton was liable, the latter being the parish of Mrs Arthur's birth.

Argued for Maybole;—The husband had when he died been absent for nearly four years from Maybole, and the widow had never returned thither. More than four years had elapsed from Whitsunday 1881, during which the family had been away from that parish, and there could therefore never be residence for one year of the five which followed Whitsunday 1881. These simple facts gave occasion for the application of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845.* Further, it was permissible to add the wife's absence to the husband's, and that question was ruled by authority.[1] It was said to be impossible to do this, but the question was, Had the pauper been residing one year out of the five in the parish of Maybole? To argue that adding periods of presence was analogous to adding periods of absence was fallacious. A lunatic could lose a settlement by absence, though he could not gain one by residence. So the fact of public begging would prevent a man acquiring a settlement in the parish where it was practised, but a man would lose an industrial settlement by absence though he was supporting himself by public begging in another parish. A wife, indeed, took her husband's residential settlement as a derivative settlement, but she took it as he had it, and did not, it might be at the end of almost four years' absence on his part, start at his death to run another period of four years for herself.

Argued for Stewarton;—The wife's settlement derived from her husband was her own, and could only be lost by her own absence for more than four years after its acquisition from the parish, i.e., from Maybole. A new course of five years had to run from the time her person ceased to be merged in her husband's, and the settlement became her own. Two absences of a diverse kind, a husband's and wife's, could not be added to destroy, just as two presences could not be added to establish a settlement.[2] Kirkwood's case was later than Allan v. Higgins, and decided that it was not permissible to add two presences together. There were weighty opinions

* The Act 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83 (sec. 76), provides,—" . . . No person who shall have acquired a settlement by residence in any parish or combination shall be held to have retained such settlement if during any subsequent period of five years he shall not have resided in such parish or combination continuously for at least one year."

to the same effect in Hay v. Carse,[1] and the same doctrine was to be found in a very recent case.[2] If, then, a new course of five years ran from the widow's obtaining a settlement from her husband at his death, Maybole would be liable.

Lord Young.—The facts in this case are that the pauper, who is a widow, became a pauper in September 1885. She was then a widow, her husband having been killed by an accident in the preceding March. She and he had resided at Maybole for a period long enough for him to obtain an industrial settlement in that parish, but they left Maybole at Whitsunday 1881, the husband having left Maybole shortly before that, but the wife and children having remained till the Whitsunday.

In March 1885, then, when the husband met with the accident, the period of four years had not elapsed from the time of leaving Maybole, though it had nearly run. It was quite run out in September, when the widow became a pauper. On these facts the question is whether the parish of her settlement at the time she became chargeable in September 1885 is Maybole, where her husband had an industrial settlement, or Stewarton, which is her own birth parish. The judgments of the Sheriffs are opposite, that of the Sheriff-substitute deciding that the parish of settlement is Maybolé, but he came to that conclusion on the ground that the widow became a proper object of relief and received relief within four years from the date of her husband's removal from Maybole, a ground of judgment which the parties are agreed is founded on an erroneous view of a matter of fact, though if the fact were so it would be irresistible.

Again, the Sheriff is of opinion that Dalmellington, the parish of the husband's birth settlement, is liable, but the parties agree that this judgment also cannot be maintained.

The question, then, is whether Maybole is liable, as the Sheriff-substitute held,—but on another ground altogether than he took in his judgment. Maybole was the settlement of the husband at his death, and it accrued to the widow and children when he died. But by September 1885, according to the one party, the provision of the Act of Parliament, which states in what manner a settlement may be lost, had come into effect, because by that time there had been absence by the whole family for more than four years complete—absence without residence in the parish for any one year, and therefore, it is contended, the residential settlement will not survive. In September 1885 it had become impossible that within five years from Whitsunday 1881 there would be one year's residence in Maybole. It is, it is said, destructive of residence in Maybole if you are to take into account the absence of the wife and family after the death of the husband, who died with a residential settlement there.

Now, I think that what the statute contemplated was this. A settlement once acquired by residence shall continue unless the absence has lasted for more than a certain period, but it will be long enough absence to destroy it if there has not been presence for at least one year out of a period of five. After a period of more than four years without any residence it is settled by decision that the settlement is gone, because there can never be then continuous residence for one year of the five. Now, as to joining the continued absence of the widow after the husband died to his own previous absence, I think that that ought to be allowed on principle, and I think that that principle was recognised in the case of Allan v. Higgins, though, indeed, it is difficult to apply authorities where there is such a charming variety of circumstances, and of judicial opinion about them. I think, and I did not mean to suggest anything to the contrary in the case of Jackson, which was cited to us, that if you have the absence by the whole family for the five years without residence for one, that will destroy the settlement though that was the settlement with which the husband died. I do not think it reasonable to say that a new period of five years must begin to run upon his death, though that be on the eve of the expiry of the four years. The fact of absence is the matter to be considered.

[2] Jackson v. Ireland, Jan. 29, 1879, 6 R. 605.

I therefore think that the husband's residential settlement in Maybole was lost by the absence, and that the settlement of the widow when she became chargeable was in the parish of Stewarton.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The controversy is now between Maybole, the parish of the husband's residential settlement, and Stewarton, that of the widow's birth. If the residential settlement which the widow derived from her husband was lost by her continued absence from Maybole, the decision must admittedly be against Stewarton. There is no doubt he had a settlement in Maybole, and that she had it at his death. But such a settlement is kept up only on condition of residence for at least one year out of any period of five. I think that the fulfilment of that condition is the only mode of keeping it up. Here the period had nearly run at the husband's death. Two months or so remained available to begin to keep it up, but that depended on whether the widow should return to Maybole before the period of four years had run. She did not return, and I think that the rule of the statute that "no person who shall have acquired a settlement by residence in any parish or combination shall be held to have retained such settlement if during any subsequent period of five years he shall not have resided in said parish or combination continuously for at least one year," applies to the case. I should have been very sorry to decide in any other way, having regard to the fact that there is authority to the same effect, as the last thing to be desired in a question of poor-law relief is that there should be conflict of decision.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur. I think the case is ruled by that of Allan v. Higgins, and that it is very advisable that what has been decided should be adhered to.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If this were a question of material patrimonial interest I should have been disposed to take time for consideration, as my impression is opposite to the opinions of your Lordships. I think there is strong authority in the opinions of the Judges in previous cases for a different view. But these cases, I must admit, I always hear with some impatience. It is immaterial to the pauper,—some parish must relieve him. Nor is it of consequence to the parochial boards, for the decision we pronounce in favour of a parish to-day may be unfavourable to it in another case to-morrow. But I only say that to excuse myself for not going into the question at length. The rules on the subject are artificial, and the great matter is to have the rule fixed. The unfortunate thing is that it cannot be fixed without a somewhat operose procedure.

THE interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact (1) that the deceased William Arthur removed from the parish of Maybole at

Dec. 10, 1887.
Muir v. Muir's Trustees.

Trust—Nobile officium—Allowances to minor children.—A testator left a heritable estate, the rental of which was £900 a-year, settled upon his only son in liferent and his children in fee. Of the income of the personal estate, which was £4600, the son received annually about £2300 as an alimentary payment for the support of himself, his wife, and children, the remaining £2300 of income being accumulated by the trustees for the children. In a petition at the son's instance, asking that the trustees should be ordained to contribute out of the free annual income for the suitable education and maintenance of the children (of whom there were seven under nineteen years of age), the Court authorised the trustees to pay a sum equal to one-half of the cost of such education in each year, including board when from home, and travelling expenses, the payment by the trustees not to exceed £500 in any one year.

B.

AN agreement was entered into in 1881 between Mr Muir and the trustees under his father's settlement, under which it was, inter alia, arranged (1) that Mr Muir, who was an only child, should make up a title to a landed estate which belonged to his father, the rental of which was about £900, and convey it in accordance with the terms of his father's trust-disposition and settlement of October 1877, i.e., to himself in liferent and his sons in fee successively; (2) that the trustees should pay Mr Muir yearly one-half of the nett revenue of the trust-funds as from 30th May 1880, and that the remainder should be accumulated for his children in accordance with the provisions of his father's trust-disposition.

The amount of the personal estate held by the trustees, as at 30th May 1887, was £139,600, besides accumulations of interest since the truster's death amounting to £21,000.

Mr Muir now presented this petition to the Court asking that the trustees should be ordained to make payment to him, for the suitable maintenance and education of his children (of whom there were seven under nineteen years of age when the petition was heard, viz., two sons and five daughters), out of the free annual income of the estate (other than that portion which was already payable to him), of a sum of £500, to be applied for each of his children in certain stated proportions.

He alleged that his income, both from the proceeds of the trust-estate and from the heritable property, had been seriously diminished; that, on the other hand, his family had been increasing and growing up, and that the expenses connected with their education had become a serious item in his expenditure; and that, accordingly, he found it necessary, in order to maintain and educate them in a manner suitable to their future prospects, to have at his disposal a larger income than he could at present command. He further stated how they were being educated, and what he purposed to do in that way in the future.

The nett income of the trust-estate for the year ending 30th May 1887 was £4623, 12s. 4d., of which there was paid to the petitioner £2311, 16s. 2d., the trustees thus accumulating income on behalf of the children to the extent of above £2300 a-year.

The trustees in answer stated that by the agreement of 1881 it was provided that the payment therein secured to the petitioner should be "strictly alimentary for the support of himself, his wife, and children, until such time as their own provisions, under the settlement or otherwise, vest and become payable," and that the question of the education of the petitioner's children was considered as an element to be taken into account in framing the agreement. They further said that they were willing, if so authorised, to meet the petitioner's wishes to the extent of defraying one-half of the expense of educating the children.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In a case of this kind the first consideration is what is most for the benefit of the children, and I look to see what is the entire income arising from the trust-estate and what part of it is enjoyed by Mr Muir. The nett income arising from the estate is £4623, 12s. 4d., and of this Mr Muir is receiving £2300, while the trustees have been accumulating yearly for the children the balance of £2300, amounting now to upwards of £21,000.

The first question for consideration is, whether it is for the advantage of the children that part of this accumulated income should be applied to the purposes of their education; but in order to determine that question we must also keep in view that Mr Muir is in receipt of a very good income, and therefore I should not be disposed to do anything which would relieve him of the natural burden which falls upon him of educating his own children. But although Mr Muir has a handsome income, still, as it is desirable that the children should receive a superior education, the question is, whether it is fair to lay upon him the whole of the burden while the surplus income is being accumulated for the children in the long run. The proposition of the trustees seems to me to be a fair and just one, that they should provide one half of the sum required and Mr Muir the other half. Whether, in that view, the total cost of the children's education is not stated at too low a figure may be a matter worthy of consideration, but, in that view, I am of opinion that our judgment should be that Mr Muir and the trustees should each contribute one-half of whatever sum may be agreed on as the cost of giving the children a first-rate education.

> THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Authorise and ordain the respondents . . . to make payment to the petitioner at the 31st January and 31st July of each year of an amount equal to one-half of the sum expended by the petitioner in each year on the education of his children, whether mentioned in the petition or not, including board when from home, and travelling expenses, as the same shall be vouched to the satisfaction of the said trustees, said amount payable by the said trustees not to exceed the sum of £500 in any one year, beginning the first half year's payment of said amount at 31st January 1888 for the half year preceding that date, and the next half year's payment at 31st July 1888, and so forth half-yearly thereafter during the education of the said children, and until they become respectively entitled to their shares of the said trust-estate: Authorise and direct the said trustees to make said payment and also payment of the expenses incurred by the petitioner and respondents in this application, as the same may be taxed by the Auditor of Court, as between agent and client, out of the share of the revenue of the said trust-estate pertaining to the children of the petitioner, and to charge the same as a general payment against the said income account: Declaring that the present arrangement shall take effect till the further orders of the Court, and decern."

PETER CAMERON, dentist, Barony Street, Edinburgh, died on 26th November 1882. He left a widow, but no children. He left a holograph writing, dated 10th April 1871, in these terms:—"In order to prevent all dispute after my death regarding the disposal of my property, I hereby leave and bequeath to my beloved wife the whole of the means and effects in my possession, or belonging to me at the time of my decease, to be absolutely at her disposal." At the date of the will he had no heritable property.

Forsyth v. Turnbull.

In 1879, he had acquired from the Magistrates of Kinghorn a piece of ground there, by feu-charter taken to himself "and his heirs and successors whomsoever." On this piece of ground he had built a house. Mrs Cameron continued to occupy the house till her death in September 1886. She died intestate.

In June 1887, Mrs Elizabeth Forsyth and others, the heirs-at-law of Mr Cameron, who had made up a title by general service to the subjects at Kinghorn, and who maintained that Mr Cameron's holograph settlement did not carry heritage, raised an action against William Turnbull and others, the heirs-at-law of Mrs Cameron, for declarator that they had no right or title to the subjects at Kinghorn, and to have them removed therefrom.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The subjects in question having been carried by the holograph will of the said Peter Cameron to his widow, and having become her property, and she having died intestate, the defenders are now entitled thereto as her heirs-at-law.

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are heirs-at-law of the late Peter Cameron, who died on 26th November 1882. They seek by this action to have it found and declared that the defenders (the heirs-at-law of Peter Cameron's widow) have no right to a house in Kinghorn which belonged to him at the time of his death, and ask for decree of removing against them, in order that the pursuers may enter thereto and possess the subjects as their own property.

"As the title of the pursuers is established by the general service, No. 7 of process, and the notarial instrument, No. 9, the question is, whether the defence is established, viz., that the subjects were carried by the holograph will of Peter Cameron? The terms of the will are not in dispute, but it is contended by the pursuers that it has no application to lands, and did not give to the widow a right to the subjects.

"The merits of the defence thus depend on the terms of the will, as affected by the 20th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868.

"The will (dated 10th April 1871) is as follows:"—(Quotes.)

"At the date of the will Peter Cameron was possessed of no right to lands, but in 1879 he acquired the piece of ground in dispute, and built a house upon it. The feu-right was taken to 'the said Peter Cameron and his heirs and successors whomsoever.' He completed no feudal title to it, and his widow also died without making up a title, but the subjects were possessed by him, and afterwards by her, as upon a personal right; and no plea has been stated upon the absence of a completed title as affecting the question.

"If the will be applicable and intended to apply to lands, I think that the feu-charter cannot be said to contain a destination which evacuated, as to this subject, Peter Cameron's testamentary disposition. A man who takes a feu-right in favour of himself takes it also, by the operation of law, in favour of his heirs and successors whomsoever; and the fact that this is expressed in the deed creates, in my opinion, no presumption of an intention to exclude the application of a general settlement to the subject of such a right. The case of Don v. Webster (Nov. 8, 1876, 4 R. 101), referred to by the Lord Justice-Clerk in dealing with the Leith Street subjects in Farquharson v. Farquharson (10 R. 1253), was decided as a case of special destination. A destination to heirs whomsoever, it is well settled, is no destination at all.

"The question whether the will purports to convey lands, and contains with reference to such lands any word or words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor or grantee a right to claim and receive the same, is a question of intention; but I think it is acknowledged in all the cases which have occurred that it is not a question to be decided upon conjecture. If, therefore, the only words used had been those bequeathing the whole of the testator's 'means and effects,' I should have been disposed to hold this case ruled by the cases of Pitcairn (8 M. 604)

Forsyth v. Turnbull.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The object of the Titles to Lands Act, 1868, sec. 20,* was to enable persons to dispose of heritage by will without using technical language, but it was not intended to give a wider meaning to words which, in their natural sense, applied only to moveables. There must be words clearly specifying what was intended to be and Edmond (11 M. 348). But these are not the only words, and I think that it is settled by the decisions that if it clearly appears from the context that the testator intended to dispose of his whole property, whether heritable or moveable, the expression 'means and effects' may be sufficient to include lands. In the case of Urquhart v. Dewar (6 R. 1026) the Lord President expressed his opinion that the question will always be, 'does the deed contain a "word or words," having reference to lands sufficient to express the intention of the testator to pass his heritage by his will? If there be such, either when taken by themselves or in connection with the rest of the will, then I think the lands will be effectually conveyed. . . . I only farther desire to add, by way of caution, that of course words conveying moveables are not sufficient to convey heritable property, unless the wish is clearly implied in the language. They must be words importing that heritable property is meant to be conveyed as well as moveable, or that the whole estate is to be conveyed without distinguishing between the two kinds.' The opinions of the other Judges equally imply that the intention may be gathered either from the words of description themselves, or from the rest of the will.

"The case of M'Leod's Trustees v. M'Luckie (10 R. 1056) was decided on the same principles. The testator there nominated a 'sole executor and trustee,' and after certain bequests of moveables, directed him 'to sell the remainder of my property, wherever situated, and divide it.' The opinions of the Judges of the Second Division in the cases of M'Leod's Trustees (2 R. 481) and of Aim's Trustee (8 R. 294) are clearly to the same effect.

"So standing the authorities, the question is, whether the preamble of this will, 'In order to prevent all dispute after my death regarding the disposal of my property,' is not a sufficiently clear expression of the testator's intention to dispose of his whole estate without distinction? My opinion is that the words 'means and estate,' when read in connection with the rest of the will, are intended to be applicable to the whole property belonging to the testator at the time of his death, and that therefore, under the 20th clause of the Act of 1868, the will is equivalent to a general disposition of the subject in question, and created in favour of the testator's widow an obligation upon the heirs and successors of the grantor to make up titles and to convey the same. The testator having been survived by his wife, this obligation is enforceable by the defenders as her successors.

"I therefore sustain the defences and assoilzie the defenders."

* Section 20 of the Titles to Lands Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, provides "that . . . no testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing purporting to convey or bequeath lands . . . which shall be granted by any person after the commencement of this Act shall be held to be invalid as a settlement of the lands to which such deed or writing applies on the ground that the granter has not used, with reference to such lands, the word 'dispone,' or other word or words importing a conveyance de præsenti; and where a testamentary deed or writing shall not be expressed in the terms required by the existing law or practice for the conveyance of lands, but shall contain, with reference to such lands, any word or words which would, if used in a will or testament with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor of the granter, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables, a right to claim and receive the same, such deed or writing, if duly executed in the manner required or permitted in the case of any testamentary writing by the law of Scotland, shall be deemed and taken to be equivalent to a general disposition of such lands within the meaning of the 19th section hereof by the granter of such deed or writing in favour of the grantee thereof."

conveyed. "Means and effects" did not in common use include lands or houses, and "effects" had been held not to be capable of meaning heritage.[1] It was proposed on the other side to read means and effects in the dispositive part of the will as equivalent to property in the narrative. But that was to control the dispositive words by the narrative, which was not permissible. The testator made the will when all he had was moveable, which accounted for the words he used, and it was reasonable to suppose that he would have made another writing applicable to heritage if he wished to regulate his heritable succession by will. Or it might well be he had intended to make a new will if he ever had any heritage, but had not done it.

Argued for defenders;—It was a question of the testator's intention that required to be decided, and his intention clearly was to give all he had to one person—his wife. "Means" meant means of living, and was a fit word to apply to heritage. The testator set forth that he desired to prevent disputes as to his property by so disposing of it. That purpose applied to all he had, and "means and effects" were meant to be synonymous with property. It was the deed of a man without professional aid, and not professing to use technical language.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the subject of discussion is a mortis causa settlement, written and executed by a non-professional man without the intervention of a law-agent. He does not use, nor intend to use, nor profess to use, technical language in a technical sense. On the contrary, it is plain from the facts that he was not assuming to use them, but was writing as a man desiring without technical words to express the objects which he had in view. The only question is, whether it appears on the face of the instrument what the object was which the maker of it had in view,—for to that we must give effect,—and for my own part, I must say I have not been able, notwithstanding the argument addressed to us, to entertain any doubt as to what he did intend. The will is in favour of the man's wife, and no one else. He says his object is to prevent disputes after his death with regard to the disposition of his "property." I think there is no ambiguity there; and no one reading these words would doubt that he meant to make a settlement of all his property, both heritable and moveable. But he then goes on to express, in the words of bequest, the subject-matter of settlement; he says,—"I hereby leave and bequeath to my beloved wife the whole of the means and effects in my possession or belonging to me at the time of my decease." He disposes of his "property" by leaving his whole means and effects to his wife. That that was meant to cover everything I see no reason to doubt. It is said indeed that in the former condition of our law it was necessary to use technical language in conveying land, and that in that state of the law "means and effects" was understood to apply to moveables and not to heritage, and the question is whether they retain that meaning still contrary to their popular meaning. In some judicial opinions that have been quoted to us more weight has, I think, been given to the mere technical meaning of these words than I myself would give. I think it is impossible in a question of the intention of this man to restrict the meaning of a settlement which he intended to be universal because in some former cases in settlements prepared, not by testators themselves, but by men of business—I think that was the fact with regard to all these cases—the words "means and effects" have been restricted in their application to personal property. They were not, I am convinced, intended to be so restricted in this man's will. While, therefore, I do not doubt there is room for difference of opinion, I have, on the whole, no doubt, for my own part, that the deceased wished to include any heritage of which he might die possessed.

LORD YOUNG.—I think this is a clear case, but for the decisions and dicta to which your Lordship has alluded. But even having regard to them I concur with your Lordship, and hesitate to add anything, since almost everything that can be said in a case of this kind must of necessity be to some extent commonplace. We are here construing a will, and it is a commonplace remark that a will must be construed according to the intention of the maker of it, as we find it in the will itself. But that all comes to this, that you must construe it according to the meaning it brings home to your mind, and unfortunately an instrument may convey different meanings to different minds, and I do not think the Act of 1868 gives us aid in this matter. But for it the instrument before us would indeed be impotent with respect to heritage, for before it was passed the law was that words of conveyance and de præsenti conveyance were necessary, and that a will was ineffectual to convey heritage. A will is not a conveyance, but only an expression of the testator's intention as to what his executor is to do after his decease. But here the question is not as to the language sufficient to convey property, but as to the sufficiency of the description, as to what was included in the description the testator gave. The Act of 1868 states nothing about the language to be used to describe property in a will, but merely that if it is described so as to let the Court know what the testator intended, then land shall pass under it as well as moveables. Now, but for the decisions, I should have said that there was not, and never was, any technical language which required to be used to describe property, though technical language was formerly required to convey it. I should have said that the ordinary rules of language were the only rules for describing property. But some of these decisions go to this, that the words "means and effects" do not include lands, though they do include bonds and dispositions in security, and the like. Now, there is no statute for that, and if there is any rule of the common law to that effect I confess I do not know where it is to be found, except in these decisions themselves, which, I remark, were not unanimous. But these decisions excite difficulty, no doubt. I should say there was more safety, and if I may so express myself, more good sense in making a rule that "means and effects" do not include land, before 1868, than in doing so after it, because then lands and houses required in order to convey them words of de præsenti conveyance. But we are now dealing with the matter in a different spirit, because it is now enacted that if a man expresses his intentions with sufficient distinctness—even if he does so on a sheet of note-paper—that intention will have effect on lands as well as on moveables. I sympathise entirely with your Lordship's observation as to the consideration to be given to the fact that the person who made this will was not acquainted with technical language, and that it was to proclaim that such language was unnecessary that the Act was passed. Now, applying to the present case the loose and general rules I have stated, I draw the conclusion that the maker of this will intended all his property to pass under it. It is not a conveyance; the word "bequeath" does not convey; it is only a direction to an executor. This direction is to have effect as to all the man's "means and effects." I think that expression includes house property, unless there is something to signify the contrary, and the words of this will do not signify anything to the contrary, but lead me to the conclusion that they were meant to include all he had. I therefore come to the conclusion that the deceased used "means and effects" in the later lines of his will in the sense in which he used "property" in the earlier lines of it, and I give the will the same construction as if those two expressions had been transposed.

On these grounds I agree with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. The case is one of some nicety, but I have felt no great difficulty in regard to it. Had the only words been "means and effects," there would have been room for doubt, for in their ordinary meaning those words express moveable property and not heritage, but if we find that the testator intended to include house property a wider meaning will be given to them. The case differs from most of those cited to us in the testator using the word "property" in the opening sentence, in which he says his purpose is "to prevent all dispute after my death in regard to the disposal of my property." It is conceded that "property" will include land as well as moveables, and there is, I think, no escape from holding that he did mean to include his heritage. It would be strange if his purpose being to prevent disputes after his death he intended only to prevent them as to his moveable estate. He meant to prevent them as to heritage also, if he left any. Therefore, the question being what he meant by "means and effects," I think we must read that expression by the light of the word "property," and hold that he meant to include lands under his means and effects. If so, I think the Act of 1868 by its 20th section removes any difficulty. Accordingly we find that if words are used as applicable to lands which in the ordinary meaning of language apply to moveables, there is nothing to prevent the will affecting land. I think that is the case with the will of this testator, and I therefore concur with your Lordship and Lord Young.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The deed before us is a will, and before 1868 a man could not dispose of lands without words of present conveyance. But a change was made by that Act, and it was provided that no testamentary deed "purporting" to convey or bequeath land should be void, for certain reasons specified in the Act. The question is whether this will purports to convey and bequeath house property. If it does it will be effectual, if it does not it will be ineffectual to convey the house property. It does not use law language, but bequeaths "the whole means and effects in my possession belonging to me at the time of my decease," and the question is, if "means and effects" include lands. I am sorry to say I have great doubt on the question. In some decisions which were referred to "means and effects" were held not to comprehend lands. I have therefore great difficulty in saying that we are to read a will disposing of "means and effects" as purporting to convey lands under that denomination, and unless I go against these previous decisions I think I must hold this will ineffectual for that purpose. That is the opinion I have formed, and but for

It formed part of the pursuer's duties as stableman to attend to the feeding of the horses kept in Mr Hood's stable, and before leaving for the night to look round all the horses in the stable and see that they were properly fastened up. . . ." (Cond. 2) "On or about the evening of Tuesday, the 31st of May last, the pursuer entered the stable about nine o'clock for the above purpose. He was immediately followed by the defender, who called his attention to the fact that one of the horses had broken loose from its halter, and desired him to fasten it on again. The pursuer proceeded up the stall to do this, but, on his stooping down to lift up the halter, the horse bit and seized his left arm, crushing it severely. This occurred in the presence of the defender. So soon as the pursuer had extricated himself from the horse's grasp, he came out of the stable, and medical aid was procured, when it was found that his arm was broken in several places, and the bone crushed and protruding. . . ." (Cond. 4) "The horse in question, which was an entire horse, was a vicious and dangerous animal, and on several previous occasions it had attacked, bitten, and severely injured those who were in charge of it. On the 6th of June, about a week after the accident above mentioned, it attacked the man in charge of it, and he was obliged to kill it in self-defence. The defender well knew of the vicious and dangerous character of the horse in question. The said horse was usually muzzled when out driving, and in the stall he was secured by two halters, the one a leather band round his neck, the other a halter with blinders. He was frequently in the habit of breaking loose from the last-mentioned halter, and it was this halter which the pursuer was endeavouring to put on when the accident happened. The said halter had been frequently repaired, and it was not strong enough for the purpose."

Fraser v. Hood.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having sustained loss, injury, and damage through the fault or negligence of the defender, or of those for whom he is responsible, is entitled at common law to decree in terms of the first of the alternative conclusions of the petition, with expenses. (2) The pursuer having, while employed as a servant to the defender, been injured by reason of the fault or negligence or defective plant of the defender, or of those for whom he is responsible, is entitled, under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, to decree in terms of the second alternative conclusion of the petition, with expenses.

The defender pleaded contributory negligence, and further (3) The pursuer being in the knowledge of the character of the horse in question, and having continued to work and attend same without objection or complaint to the defender, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Sheriff (Robertson) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial.

A proposed issue was lodged by the pursuer.

The defender objected to the issue being granted.

Argued for the defender;—There was no relevant case stated at common law. The pursuer knew (cond. 4) that the horse was vicious, and in that knowledge he accepted the employment.[1] A biting horse was one of the ordinary risks of a stableman's employment, and therefore the pursuer could not recover. Under the Employers Liability Act a horse could only be held to be "plant" if it was in actual use. In Haston's case, cited by the pursuer, the horse was in actual use.

Argued for the pursuer;—The averments did not shew that the pursuer knew the danger when he undertook the employment. Condescendence 4 was only a statement of the character of the horse, instructed by recent inquiry. It was not an ordinary risk of a stableman to take care of a vicious entire horse. It was further averred on record that the halter was bad. This made a relevant case under the Employers Liability Act, as a halter was undoubtedly plant; but further, a horse was clearly "plant" in the sense of the Act.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of damages for injuries received from the bite of a horse. The defender is a carting contractor and keeps a number of horses, and the pursuer was at the time of the accident in his employment as a stableman. The occurrence took place on the evening of the 31st May last, and the species facti was that the horse got loose from its halter, and the defender desired the pursuer to tie him up. While he was engaged in so doing the accident occurred. The pursuer himself says that the horse, which was an entire one, was a vicious and dangerous animal, and that on several previous occasions it had attacked, bitten, and severely injured those who were in charge of it. The pursuer had been for some time in the employment of the defender as a carter, having only recently been made a stableman, and he therefore obviously knew, what was known to everyone else, that the horse was a dangerous horse, and had attacked, bitten, and severely injured persons in charge of it, and he was therefore aware of the risk he incurred in entering the stall to tie up the horse. He might have refused to do what he was told to do, but he did it willingly and of his own free will. Whether he performed the work carelessly or recklessly is not known to us, but at anyrate he of his own free will encountered a known and obvious risk, and therefore cannot recover damages from his employer.

I cannot distinguish this case from that of M'Gee v. Eglinton Iron Co., 10 R. 955, and the two cases quoted therein, namely, Crichton v. Keir, 1 Macph. 407, and M'Neill v. Wallace & Co., 15 D. 818, and therefore I consider that the action is irrelevant, and should be dismissed.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer describes the horse as an entire horse, a vicious and dangerous animal that had on several previous occasions attacked, bitten, and severely injured those in charge of it. He further describes how it was muzzled and tied. Besides having been five years in the stable, he had had charge of this horse from the 1st of January up till the 31st of May. He therefore knew the horse and the danger and risk he ran, and on this account I do not consider that he can recover damages. Further, I do not think that the Employers Liability Act of 1880 makes any difference. It was argued that the horse was part of the employer's plant, and I think it was, and that the horse's defective temper was a defect in the plant. That may very possibly be so. But all the Act says is that the workman shall be in the same position in such cases as a third party would have been. But taking it so, this man knew the danger, and wilfully faced it, and therefore I think he can take no benefit from the Act.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT disallowed the issue, and dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Sale—Right in security—Delivery—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 60), sec. 1.—A bleacher who was in embarrassed circumstances, being desirous to raise money, on 1st February 1886 entered into a "minute of sale" with his brother-in-law and son-in-law, which bore that in consideration of an advance of £400 by them, he sold to them absolutely certain pipes used for conveying water into his bleachfield, declaring that he should be entitled to use them so long as they considered proper on payment of a rent of £20 yearly. The pipes were worth much less than £400. The £400 was not instantly advanced, but the purchasers became parties to a cash-credit with a bank by means of which the bleacher drew out the £400 in instalments. On 5th August 1886 he executed a trust for creditors, without having paid the half year's rent due at Whitsunday for the pipes, and his trustee claimed them. Held that there had been a bona fide sale, and that the pipes were not part of the trust-estate.

JOHN WILSON, bleacher at Touch, Dunfermline, carried on business there for many years prior to 1886. For some time prior to that year he had been in embarrassed circumstances. He became desirous to raise funds, but his works, being the subject of three bonds, did not afford additional security. He consulted Adam Darling, his brother-in-law, and W. W. Waddell, his son-in-law, as to a fresh loan, and a loan by them over certain pipes, which he had laid down beneath a public road to bring water into his works, was considered. They were advised by a law-agent that a loan over them would not be a good security, but that Wilson might convey them to Darling and Waddell by an out-and-out sale for £400, the amount they were willing to advance, if they could safely do so, and that he might retain the use of them on a contract of hiring, paying rent for them. A minute of sale was then (1st February 1886) entered into between Wilson on the first part and Darling and Waddell on the second part, narrating that "whereas the second parties have advanced to or for my behoof the sum of £400 sterling, and in consideration thereof the first party has sold and hereby sells and conveys and makes over to the second parties and their respective heirs, executors, and assignees whomsoever absolutely," the iron pipes, with his whole interest in them, and with full power to them to sell and dispose of them as they might think proper, "declaring that the first party shall be entitled to the use of the said pipes for his said bleachworks, so long as the second parties may consider proper, upon payment to the second parties or their foresaids of the sum of £20 sterling yearly in name of rent or hire, payable in equal portions at the terms of Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year, commencing payment of the first termly payment at the term of Whitsunday next, 1886, for the proportion due preceding that date, and the next term's payment at the term of Martinmas following, and so forth half-yearly and termly during the period the first party may use the said pipes: It is further hereby declared that the second parties shall be entitled to put an end to said use at any time upon giving the first party one month's previous notice in writing: And I assign the rents or hires: And I grant warrandice." At the end of this minute was written a receipt, dated February 1886, by Wilson for £400.

Wilson continued in possession of the pipes as before. Prior to 5th August 1886, when he granted a trust-deed for creditors, he had not paid any "rent" for the pipes. Mr John Ross, solicitor, Dunfermline, the trustee for the creditors, claimed right to the pipes.

Darling and Waddell raised this action against him for declarator that they were absolute proprietors of the pipes, and for interdict against his interfering with them. They called also two manufacturers near Dunfermline, with whom he was negotiating for their obtaining leave to make connections with and draw water through the pipes.

Ross alone defended. He alleged that the transaction founded on by the pursuers as a sale of the pipes to them was a simulate sale for the purpose of attempting to create a security; that the pipes never became the pursuers' property; that the minute did not embody, and was not treated as embodying, any real transaction, but was an attempt to obtain security over moveables which remained in the seller's possession and use and under his control.

He pleaded that the pipes were part of the estate, and also (2) The said deed founded on by the pursuers being a simulate sale, for the purpose of creating a security to the prejudice of prior creditors of the insolvent, the pursuers did not thereby acquire any right in the said pipes, and the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (3) The transaction contained in the said minute being an attempt to create a security over moveables, remaining in the possession and under the control of the seller, the pursuers are not entitled to found thereon.

A proof was allowed to the defender of his averments.

It was proved that the pipes had cost Wilson about £220, and the laying of them about £50. It was also proved that the £400 had not been directly advanced at the date of the transaction to Wilson. What was actually done was that Wilson, Darling, and Waddell joined in a cash-credit for that sum, on which Wilson was to operate, and did operate by cheques, initialled according to arrangement among them by Waddell, who was exercising a certain supervision over his affairs. The money was drawn out by him in three instalments, the last of which was on 3d April 1886. The bank were not repaid the amount till 22d June 1887, a week before the diet of proof, when Darling and Waddell paid it up in equal sums. A business account against them had been made out by the agent who prepared and carried through the minute of sale on the footing that they were purchasers of the pipes, and they had also through him entered into negotiations in July and August 1886 with certain manufacturers to let them have for a rent permission to connect their pipes with the pipes in question.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser) found and declared (against Ross, the compearing defender) in terms of the conclusions, and granted interdict.*

* "OPINION.—John Wilson, a bleacher at Touch, near Dunfermline, was in embarrassed pecuniary circumstances in the month of February 1886. His bleachworks were covered with bonds, so that he could borrow no more upon the security of them; but he was proprietor of pipes for carrying water, which were laid in the public road leading from Dunfermline to his works. The pursuers in this action are Wilson's brother-in-law, Adam Darling, and his son-in-law, William Wood Waddell. They were willing to assist Wilson, but only upon getting some security, and he had no further security to offer than the pipes of which he was the owner. The parties applied to Mr William Beveridge, solicitor, Dunfermline, who advised them that no security could, without possession, be effected upon moveable property like pipes, and that the only way in which Darling and Waddell could have any security at all would be simply by Wilson selling to them the pipes. The question in the case is, whether or not there was a valid sale. A minute of agreement of sale in writing was entered into between Wilson and the pursuers in February 1886, by which, upon the narrative that the pursuers had advanced to Wilson £400, he sold, 'and hereby sells, and conveys, and makes over' to the pursuers 'the cast-iron pipes for the conveyance of water from the town of Dunfermline to the said Touch Bleachworks'; but it was declared that Wilson should be entitled to the use of the pipes for his bleachworks so long as the pursuers might consider proper, on payment to them of '£20 sterling yearly in name of rent or hire.'

"Now this is declared by the defender to be 'a simulate sale for the purpose of attempting to create a security,' and indeed no sale at all. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this position taken up by the defender is not well founded. The difficulties in the way of creating a security over moveable property were clearly foreseen and explained by Mr Beveridge, and with the view of avoiding these difficulties it was agreed that there should be an absolute sale. There was nothing at all illegal or improper in this, even although Wilson had been insolvent. He was perfectly entitled to sell for an adequate price the moveable property which belonged to him. He wanted to get money to carry on his business, which was a very legitimate thing to do; and his brother-in-law and son-in-law were perfectly willing to help him. They paid, no doubt, what, according to the evidence, appears to be more than what the pipes were worth, or at least what they cost to lay down. They were willing to make this sacrifice on behalf of their relative. They did not wish to drive a hard bargain, and the fact that they paid more for the pipes (if these were considered as simply old iron) than they were worth, does not in any way detract from the fact that there was here a bona fide sale. As to the good faith of the transaction the Lord Ordinary has no doubt whatever. All the persons who were examined—Beveridge, Wilson, Darling, and Waddell—state that it was intended to make a bona fide sale,—that being the only mode in which the transaction could be carried out with the view of giving to Darling and Waddell some kind of return

Darling v. Wilson's Trustee.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The true question was whether what took place in February was really a sale. The facts shewed it was not. Prima facie, a sale of the piping recently put down to carry on the business was very unlikely. No "rent" was ever paid. Nor indeed was £400 ever advanced at the time of the pretended sale as the minute bore. On the contrary, the lenders or guarantors to the bank simply gave their names to a cash-credit. Again the pipes were never worth £400, the alleged price. They did not cost that when bought new, and placed in position. How could they be worth it if bought and carried away? The £20 of "rent" was just reasonable interest on a loan of £400, and that accounted for the fixing of £20 as the sum. If there was a sale there was no delivery or any equivalent for it. There could be none unless the pipes were taken up and handed over to the new owners. In such cases as Orr v. Tullis[1] founded on by the pursuers, the subject was one which could be sold or let, and used elsewhere, and the bona fides of the transaction was established.

The present case more resembled that of the Heritable Securities Investment Association v. Wingate's Trustee,[2] where a transaction founded on as creating the relation of landlord and tenant was held to be a mere attempt to create a security over moveables, such as the law would not recognise. This case was distinguished from M'Bain v. Wallace & Company[3] by mala fides, and by the parties' actings being inconsistent with a sale.

Counsel for the pursuers were not called on, except as to the absence of delivery. They argued;—It would be absurd to require, as the defender was obliged to contend, that the pipes should be lifted and handed over to the purchaser, who proposed to let them to the seller. The case of Leckie[4] was like the present in this particular. The case of M'Bain[3] was entirely in point, and also those of Orr's Trustee v. Tullis[1] and Robertson v. M'Intyre (Robertson's Trustee).[5]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am quite satisfied with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. It is a question of some nicety how far those pipes, which were laid in the soil, and were never actually delivered over to Darling and Waddell, were the subject of an out-and-out sale. I think it is the result of the cases on this question that if all the possession is given of which the property is capable, and the contract is clear and unreserved, it is not sufficient ground for setting it aside that no delivery was given, because the subject of sale was in a position inconsistent with its being delivered. There is here no doubt as to what the contract was. The object was to give Wilson a certain sum on security of the pipes, and it was necessary in order to that that there should be an out-and-out sale of the pipes. The purchaser was to get complete power over them, except that it was understood that if the seller repaid the price, he was to be allowed to revindicate the property. That was the only distinction between an out-and-out sale and this transaction. There is no ground for saying that in anything it was in bad faith. It was a sale, except that it rested not on the written agreement but on the good faith of parties that if the price were repaid the seller should have back the pipes. The way in which the seller preferred for the money they advanced. The case falls within the decision of Taylor (Orr's Trustee) v. Tullis (2d July 1870, 8 Macph. 936)."

to take payment of the price was that of getting his friends who were assisting him to unite with him in being bound to the bank under a cash-credit bond for £400. On that credit he drew out the whole £400, and it was ultimately paid up by the purchasers. It does not signify that that payment was not made at the time, but some time after. The important matter is that the purchasers put their names to the cash-credit.

I think the case is on all-fours with that of M'Bain v. Wallace, and that the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. I think this is a clear case. Certain points which are altogether distinct have in the argument been mixed.

First, as to delivery, the case stands thus. There is a contract of sale irrespective of delivery. Delivery must follow a completed contract of sale. There is here ex facie a contract of sale as distinct as language can make it. It is written and signed. But by our law the contract of sale does not pass the property, there must be delivery. Was there such delivery as will pass the property,—constructive delivery? The subject of sale was pipes, which passed under a road, a good subject of property and therefore of sale. Delivery by digging them up, handing them to the purchasers, and then replacing them in the ground, would have been ridiculous. Therefore there must be something else. What was done was to change the title on which the person previously owner took the use of them. Subsequent to the contract he was not the owner of them, but had the use of them as a hirer or lessee. Now, it has been held perfectly good constructive delivery that a new contract should be made between the seller and the purchaser under which the seller begins to possess on a new and lawful contract. Here the seller possessed these pipes after the sale as the buyer's lessee. That was what appeared ex facie. Of course it might be all simulate, but so far as the law goes it would be sufficient to pass the property if there were no exception to it in point of fact,—for example, that it was a simulate transaction altogether. Now, the voluntary trustee of Wilson cannot defend the action except on grounds competent to Wilson, and the purchaser could have lifted these pipes and carried them off in spite of Wilson. But his voluntary trustee urges that the alleged sale is bad, because it is only a security. That is quite a legitimate purpose for such a transaction, and that is where the case is indistinguishable from that of M'Bain. A disposition giving the lender of money a proprietor's title has always been held by our law a competent form of security. I remember, when a young counsel, arguing an action of declarator against a money-lender who took such a title, and against whom declarator was sought that the title was only a security title, and that the borrower was entitled to have back his property on paying the advance. It was admitted by the money-lender that it was only a security, but he defended himself on the ground that the declarator sought would prejudice the title for which he had bargained, and the Court refused the declarator on that ground, but intimated that they would interfere to give the declarator if he were tendered his money and then refused to give up the property. That same doctrine was applied to the case of moveable property in the case of M'Bain. There delivery was dispensed with on the authority of the case of Duncanson.[1] It was acknowledged that the transaction was a security, and it was held that the parties had lawfully contracted to accomplish their object by way of a sale. We intimated in our judgment in the passage I read from my own opinion during the argument in this case, and I think the House of Lords also intimated, that if any attempt were made to use the property title to any other effect than to pay the debt and interest, we should interpose to prevent that, and the lender there accordingly undertook that his title should only be good to the effect of obtaining his debt and interest.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It was acknowledged by the reclaimer that M'Bain's case was adverse to him, unless he could distinguish this case from it on certain matters of fact. In his attempt to do so I think he fails on the facts. Therefore there is admittedly a judgment of the House of Lords against him. That makes a simple ground of judgment. I was the Lord Ordinary in the case of M'Bain, and am bound now to confess I was wrong in my judgment in it. While, however, I acknowledge my error, I do not, perhaps, see it so plainly as I should do. I therefore follow the judgment in that case simply as an authority which is in point.

The trustee carried on the farm for some time, and when he gave it up gave notice of a claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, for improvements. The claim consisted of seven heads. The trustee appointed a referee to judge on the claim in terms of the Act. The landlord also appointed a referee, but limited his powers to judging on the sixth and seventh heads of the claims, on the ground that the first five heads did not fall under the statute, in respect that to some of the improvements his consent had not been obtained, and that notice had not been given to him in terms of the statute that the others were about to be executed. The trustee thereupon applied to the Sheriff to have a referee appointed in place of the one appointed by the landlord, and the appointment was made. The landlord thereupon presented a note of suspension and interdict to have the trustee's referee and the referee appointed by the Sheriff interdicted from proceeding with the reference, alleging that five heads of the claim were outwith the statute. The trustee stated that he was not aware whether the statutory requirements with regard to notice or consent had been observed. ALEXANDER CLYNE was tenant of the farm of Weydale Mains, Thurso, belonging to Sir John G. T. Sinclair of Ulbster, Bart., for nineteen years, by virtue of a minute of agreement dated 27th December 1878, from Whitsunday 1879. He occupied the farm till his death on 13th June 1885.

About six months after his death his estates were sequestrated, and Mr William Gordon Oliver was elected trustee in the sequestration.

Mr Oliver carried on the farm till Whitsunday 1887, when he removed from it.

On 8th January 1887 Mr Oliver sent to Sir J. Sinclair's factor a notice of claim for compensation for improvements under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. The claim consisted of seven heads.

On 30th May 1887 Sir J. Sinclair's factor sent to Mr Oliver a notice of counter claim in terms of the Act.

On 2d July Mr Oliver appointed Mr George Brown as referee to decide on the claims, and requested Sir John to appoint another referee.

On 8th July 1887 Mr Logan, Sir John's factor, appointed Mr Barnetson as referee, but, on grounds to be afterwards stated, he limited his powers as to dealing with Mr Oliver's claim to the two last heads of the claim, thus excluding the first five heads thereof. Mr Oliver refused to accept this as a proper appointment, and applied to the Sheriff of Caithness-shire, at Wick, under sec. 9 of the Act, to have a referee appointed.

On 17th October the Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor, held that Sir John Sinclair had not made a proper appointment of a referee, and appointed a Mr Scott to act as referee along with Mr Brown.

On 29th October Sir John Sinclair presented a note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber, in which he prayed the Court to interdict Mr Oliver "from insisting in or prosecuting and following further the first five items of a pretended notice of claim under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, signed by him and addressed to George Logan, Esq., Thurso East, factor for the said Sir John George Tollemache Sinclair, being '(1) £220 sterling, being the value to the incoming tenant of the large and small byres, pigs-house, hen-house, part of barn, corn-loft, gig-house, erected, and dwelling-house repaired, by the said deceased Alexander Clyne; (2) £15 sterling, being the value to the incoming tenant of eighty chains of flag-fencing, erected by the said deceased Alexander Clyne; (3) £35 sterling, being the value to the incoming tenant of the water-course and mill-dam, made by the said deceased Alexander Clyne; (4) £112, 10s. sterling, being the value to the incoming tenant of 750 chains of drains made on the said farm of Weydale Mains by the said deceased Alexander Clyne; (5) £12, 10s. sterling, being the value to the incoming tenant of fifty chains of ditches made on the said farm by the said deceased Alexander Clyne,' in a pretended reference under said Act, wherein the respondent the said George Brown was nominated referee by the said William Gordon Oliver, trustee foresaid, and the respondent Alexander Robert Scott was appointed by the Sheriff-substitute of Caithness-shire to act as referee along with the said George Brown in said reference; and also to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents the said George Brown and Alexander Robert Scott, as referees foresaid, from entertaining or dealing with or awarding any sum in respect of the foresaid items of claim."

He stated,—"The improvements included in the said five items of claim were executed mainly in implement of the obligations contained in said minute of agreement or lease and additional agreement, and they all fall under the first and second parts of the schedule to the said Act. In so far as they were executed before the commencement of the said Act, the landlord, within one year after the commencement of the Act, has not declared in writing his consent to the making of the improvements in terms of section 2 of said Act.* And in so far as such of them as are specified in the first part of said schedule were executed after the commencement of the said Act, they were so executed without the landlord or his agent duly authorised in that behalf having, previously to the execution of the improvements, and after the passing of the said Act, consented in writing to the execution of such improvements, in terms of section 3 of the said Act; and in so far as such of them as are specified in the second part of said schedule were executed after the commencement of the said Act, no notice in writing was given by the tenant to the landlord or his duly authorised agent of his intention to execute such improvements; and no agreement between the landlord and tenant was ever entered into regarding the same in terms of section 4 of said Act. . . . None of the foresaid five items of claim quoted in the prayer of the note fall to be dealt with under the said Act; and in order to prevent the referees proceeding in a reference which, as regards these items of claim, is ultra vires, the present application for interdict has become necessary."

The respondent averred;—"Explained that the respondent, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of the said Alexander Clyne, has made inquiries with the view of enabling him to answer specifically the additional averments made by the complainer. As the result of these inquiries he has ascertained and avers that the improvements included in the first five items of the claim, so far as not provided for by the agreements referred to in statement 1, were carried out by the deceased Alexander Clyne in consequence of communications between him and Mr Logan, the factor for the respondent. After the death of the said Alexander Clyne, the documents in his possession bearing on said improvement, and including the accounts and vouchers connected therewith, were all taken away by the deceased's brother, David Clyne, by whom they were handed to the said Mr Logan. The respondent has had no means of obtaining from him the documents necessary for establishing the said claim, but intended to recover the same in the course of the reference. In these circumstances, the respondent is not able to say whether the written consents and notices required by the Act in reference to claims under schedules I. and II. were or were not given; but he considered it to be his duty to keep the matter open by including the said items in his claim."

He further averred;—(Stat. 3) "Explained that by the 20th section of the Agricultural Holdings Act it is provided,—'Where the sum claimed for compensation exceeds £100, either party may, within seven days after delivery of the award, appeal against it to the Sheriff, on all or any of the following grounds: (1) That the award is invalid . . . (3) That compensation has been awarded for improvements, acts, or things, or for breaches of stipulations or agreements, or for committing or permitting deterioration in respect of which the party claiming was not entitled to compensation . . . And the Sheriff shall hear and determine the appeal, and may, in his discretion, remit the case to be reheard as to the whole or any part thereof by the referee or referees, or oversman, with such directions as he may think fit . . . Section 3 of the Act provides,—"Compensation under this Act shall not be payable in respect of any improvement specified in the first part of the schedule hereto, and executed after the commencement of this Act, unless the landlord or his agent duly authorised on that behalf has, previously to the execution of the improvement, and after the passing of this Act, consented in writing to the execution of such improvement." of the claims which are the subject of the present action, should they award any sum in respect thereof, and it would have been competent for him to have appealed from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute appointing the referee. In these circumstances, it is incompetent to seek to review or set aside the said judgment by means of a note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The reference made by the respondent Oliver being ultra vires, illegal, and inept, in respect that the first five items of the claim made by him are outwith the scope of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, the complainer is entitled to interdict. (2) The first five items of the claim for the respondent Oliver are illegal and unfounded, and he is not entitled to have the same referred under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, in respect (First) the improvements were made under contract with the landlord, who paid the agreed-on compensation therefor; (Second) the landlord did not, within one year after the commencement of the said Act, declare in writing his consent to the making of the improvements, in so far as these were made previous to the commencement of the Act, and neither he nor his agent previously to the execution of the improvements, and after the passing of the Act, consented in writing to the execution of such improvements, in so far as these were executed after the commencement of the Act; and (Third) no notice in writing was given by the tenant to the landlord or his duly authorised agent of his intention to execute such improvements as are specified in the second part of the schedule to the said Act, and no agreement was entered into in regard thereto.

The respondent pleaded;—(1) The present action being incompetent as a method of reviewing the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute referred to in statement 3, the note should be refused, and the respondent found entitled to expenses. (3) The reference in question not being ultra vires or illegal, but being admittedly regular as regards certain of the items claimed, the note should be refused.

On 12th November, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced an interlocutor recalling the interim interdict previously granted, and refused the note.*

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—It was conceded that the improvements claimed for under the first five heads of the claims fell under parts i. and ii. of the schedule to the Act, and therefore to bring the claims under the statute either consent of the landlord or notice to the landlord was required. The question then was, whether when it was alleged by the landlord that a claim did not fall under the statute, and no satisfactory answer was given by the tenant to shew that it did, the Court would interfere by way of interdict to stop the reference going on till that preliminary question was settled. If the landlord's contention here was well founded, the arbiter appointed by him was validly appointed, and could competently judge on the remaining heads of the claim; and the arbiter appointed by the Sheriff had no power to act. If the landlord was wrong then the Sheriff's appointment was good. Till it was settled what was the proper tribunal to try the question, it was useless for the reference to proceed. It had been decided that it was not for the arbiters, but for the Court, to decide on the validity of the notice given by a tenant under the Act,[1] and that decision applied equally to the question whether as a matter of fact the consent of the landlord had been given to improvements which required his consent. The notice of claim ought to specify for what kind of improvements compensation was claimed; and further, that the statutory requirements with regard to the claims had been satisfied. Here there was no averment either on the claim or on record that notice had been given to the landlord, or his consent obtained.

* "NOTE.—The respondent has made a claim against the complainer, under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, and the complainer has intimated a counter claim. As parties could not agree upon their respective claims, the respondent appointed a referee, and called on the complainer to appoint another, who should, in terms of the Act, determine what, if anything, was due, under the said claims or either of them. The complainer appointed a referee, but excluded from the reference several of the heads of the claim maintained by the respondent. The latter thereupon applied to the Sheriff to appoint a referee on behalf of the complainer, on the ground that the complainer had not himself made an appointment as craved. The purpose of the present note is to have the referees interdicted from proceeding with the reference, on the ground that the respondent's claim (to the extent referred to) does not fall within the statute. I am of opinion that I cannot entertain the present complaint. It is the duty of the referees to determine how far either of the claims can be given effect to, and they will do so after having heard parties, and taken such evidence as they may deem necessary or proper. If they go wrong in their decision, by allowing claims not warranted by the statute, or otherwise, the complainer can appeal to the Sheriff, whose judgment on such an appeal will be final. The present complaint is really an attempt to obtain a decision in the Bill-Chamber or Court of Session upon one of the questions which the statute has remitted to the Sheriff for decision, and which therefore should be decided only by the Sheriff."

Argued for the respondent;—Under section 20 of the Act the Sheriff was given power to deal with questions of this kind in the first instance. Were the case allowed to go on before the arbiters it would appear in the proceedings whether this claim was within the statute or not. The Court ought not to assume that the Sheriff and the arbiters would go wrong in a question of law. The respondent would have before the arbiters an opportunity of producing written evidence that notice or consent had been given in due form. This question was not raised, or at least not argued, in the Inner-House in Hunter's case, as both parties wished to have the decision of the Court on the merits.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The proceedings in this case commenced with a notice of claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act made by the respondent, who is the trustee for the late tenant of a farm. The claim consisted of seven heads. The respondent thereafter appointed Mr Brown as his arbiter for the determination of the claim, and the complainer, the landlord, appointed Mr Barnetson as his arbiter, qualifying the appointment, however, by saying that he was only appointed to try the 6th and 7th heads of the claim, because, in his view, the first five heads were not under the statute, and could not competently be made by the respondent. The respondent then applied to the Sheriff to appoint another arbiter, on the ground that the landlord's appointment was not good in respect of the limitation, and the Sheriff-substitute, assenting to that view, appointed Mr Scott as arbiter.

If the complainer is right in holding that the first five heads of the claim are incompetent, and that only the last two can be competently sent to arbitration, then the appointment of Mr Barnetson is good and valid. If, on the other hand, he is wrong in that view, then the appointment of Mr Scott by the Sheriff-substitute is good and valid, and therefore in the one case the tribunal to try the merits of the claim will be Brown and Scott, in the other case it will be Brown and Barnetson. Now, to allow the reference to go on when it is yet in doubt whether Brown and Scott or Brown and Barnetson shall be the a seems to me a proposal of such a nature as to afford a solution of the question now before us. Nothing, I think, could be more inconvenient c incompetent than to allow the reference to go on till it has been decided which of the two sets of arbiters is the proper tribunal to try the cas indeed, the objection of the complainer to the first five heads of the clai manifestly frivolous, or not sufficiently disclosed, I should be inclined to gard it, and to allow the reference to go on on the footing that the arbi pointed by the Sheriff along with Mr Brown formed the proper tribunal, is impossible, looking at the record, to hold that the objection here is a the nature of a frivolous objection. The allegations of the complainer a distinct, that as regards the first five heads the statute requires in the o that written consent, in the other that written notice, should have been while in point of fact neither the one nor the other has been given. not a frivolous objection. Considerable weight, too, is added to the sta when we look at the respondent's answers. There is no doubt that if w complainer avers is true the respondent has no case, and the only answer the respondent gives is that he does not know whether written consent or notice was given, but that he will try to prove that such was the cas apology for making such a statement is that he is only an assignee for cr and that the person whom he represents is now dead, and that there evidence among the deceased's papers that such consent or notice had ev given. In these circumstances I think it would be, to say the least, exce inexpedient to allow the reference to go on until that question of fact i mined. I think therefore we ought to pass the note and grant interim in The objection to our doing so is founded on section 20 of the Act, which appeals to be taken to the Sheriff when the sum claimed exceeds £1 may be proper and competent when the arbiters have entered on the ex of their functions to appeal to the Sheriff, but what security have we h the arbiters have any power at all to try the question? We have none; contrary, that question remains to be determined. I think that the com of this Court to interfere rests on this. There is a relevant averment t first five heads of this claim are without the statute, in short, that the negatives the existence of such claims and forbids them to be brought f I think, therefore, the competency of our taking up the case is bey question.

LORD MURE.—The simple question we have to decide is, whether th shall be passed, and interim interdict granted. If the objection stated complainer to the first five heads of the claim is well founded, it woul competent for the arbiters to entertain them, for he alleges that the st requirements which have to be gone through before such claims can be tained have not been complied with. The objection is very clearly stat I do not think any satisfactory answer has been given to it. The resp very frankly admits that he is not in possession of any written eviden petent to shew that those heads of his claim are competent. In such stances to refuse this note would, in my opinion, be to allow an incon proceeding to go on. In any circumstances I should have been in fa passing the note, but further, I think that the case of Hunter v. Barron' tees (13 R. 883) is an authority which we ought to follow.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. The 7th section of the Act says,—"Every such notice or counter claim shall state, as far as reasonably may be, the particulars and amount of the intended claim." I should think that under that section, whatever the practice may be, so many particulars should be set forth as will shew that the claim is relevant. The claim, as stated here, may be relevant or irrelevant, legal or illegal; that is the result of the way in which it is stated. It is candidly admitted that the respondent does not know whether the claim is relevant or not. He says,—"Let me go to the arbiters with my claim. If it is a good claim, then the arbiters are the proper tribunal to try the question, if not, then they cannot be arbiters at all." That is one consequence of the claim being stated as it is here, and I can fancy a great many more which it is not necessary now to state. I think that in exercising our discretion it would be most inexpedient to send such a case to the arbiters.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to pass the note, and to grant interim interdict.

HENRY NIXON (Inspector of Port-Glasgow), Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Mackintosh—Wallace.

Poor—Settlement—Lunatic.—In an action brought by a relieving parish against the parish of the pauper's birth, it was pleaded in defence that the pauper, in respect of idiocy and imbecility, was incapable of having a settlement other than her father's. It was proved that the pauper, a woman twenty-four years of age, was a congenital imbecile, but not an idiot, that she was incapable of earning a living, and could not learn either to write or to go a message, and that she could not dress herself or do ordinary housework without superintendence. The Court held on the proof that she was not in such mental condition as to be a perpetual pupil, and therefore was capable of having a settlement of her own, which, in the circumstances, was that of her birth.

M.

IN January 1887 the parish of Port-Glasgow raised an action for relief of certain sums expended in relieving a woman named Bridget Tonner against the Burgh Parish of Paisley, as being the parish of her birth. She had been deserted by her father, an Irishman, who had no settlement in Scotland, and relieved by Port-Glasgow. She was about twenty-four years of age.

The Burgh Parish of Paisley stated that she was "a congenital idiot, imbecile from birth, and incapable of earning a subsistence for herself, and of acquiring a settlement in her own right," and pleaded,—(4) In respect of the idiocy and imbecility of the pauper she takes her father's settlement, and the defender is not liable to relieve the pursuer.

At the proof there were examined relatives of the pauper, and a neighbour who had known her all her life. Their evidence was to the effect that she was physically quite strong, but that she could never learn to read or write, or go a message and bring correct change, or know the difference between coins. She could be trusted to attend to a child while some other person was present, but could not be left with one, nor could she sew or light a fire or lamp, or sweep a room in a proper manner. She could not read the clock, or even make a guess at the time of day. She could dress herself, but even as to that required supervision. It had not been found possible to give her any idea of religion.

The defender, who led in the proof, examined Dr Clouston, physician to the Royal Edinburgh Asylum for the Insane and Dr Littlejohn of Edinburgh, who had examined the pauper, and were of opinion that she was a congenital imbecile. They stated that between congenital imbecility and idiocy medical science did not draw a marked line, and that the pauper was distinguished from an idiot by her capacity to speak so well as she did, her speech being articulate and quite intelligible, but "an undeveloped speech—the speech of an imbecile." They found that she had no idea of the time of day, or of the day of the week or month, and thought she was unfit to be trusted with children, or to do simple household work, even under superintendence. They also found her unable to understand simple questions, or to make the same statement twice on a simple matter of fact, or distinguish between a threepenny piece and a sixpence.

The pursuer examined a medical man who had known the pauper and seen her at intervals of several years. He thought her improved since she was fifteen, and had found that she knew coins from each other, and could do simple household work, though she was mentally weak and "silly." The medical officer at the Larbert Institution for Imbeciles, who had recently examined her, also thought her "feeble-minded, but nothing approaching an idiot." She could count up to three, and if she had had better surroundings and training could, he thought, have counted further. The superintendent of the same institution, who had known the pauper a number of years before the proof, thought her a high type of a weak-minded person, and that her faculties were still capable of development.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) decerned against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The pauper was a perpetual pupil, incapable of acquiring a settlement. If a perpetual pupil she must follow her father's settlement, for it had been decided by a majority of the whole Court, in Caldwell v. Dempster,[1] that a pupil born in Scotland and becoming chargeable by its parent's desertion—that

* "NOTE.—It is admitted that the pauper had not acquired a residential settlement in her own right when she first became chargeable.

"But it is said that she had a derivative settlement in Port-Glasgow through her mother. The mother died in May 1879, when the pauper was sixteen years of age, and the father, who had deserted his wife and child in 1864, but had returned in 1878, and had been living in family with them in Port-Glasgow, again deserted his child upon the death of the wife, and has not since been heard of. When the pauper first became chargeable, therefore, she had attained the age of puberty. Her mother had died, and she had been deserted by her father. In these circumstances I think the cases of Craig v. Greig and Macdonald, 1 Macph. 1172, and M'Lennan v. Waite, 10 Macph. 908, are in point, and that the pauper's settlement must be held to have been in the parish of her own birth in preference to any derivative settlement she may have had previously.

"It is said that by reason of her mental weakness she was incapable of acquiring a settlement in her own right, and must therefore take the settlement of her father, which is not in Scotland. I think the case of Cassels v. Sommerville, 12 R. 1155, is conclusive upon that point. That decision, as I understand it, establishes a general rule which, in the common interest of all parishes, ought not to be departed from except upon grounds of distinction much more substantial than any that can be found in the circumstances of the present case."

parent having no settlement in Scotland—did not become chargeable to its birth parish. The Lord Ordinary seemed to think the case of Cassells[1] laid down a rule, but it was quite special. The pauper there was much superior in mental condition to the pauper in the present case. He could do a message and work in a garden, and aid in using a hand-barrow; a decision about such a person laid down no rule which could here be applied.

Argued for the pursuer;—The case of Cassells was sufficiently like the present at least to make it undesirable to attempt to set up distinctions between them. The rule was that only an absolute idiot could be regarded as incapable of having any settlement, and as merely dependent on the father's. This pauper was certainly not an absolute idiot, and that was sufficient.

The Court were of opinion on the evidence that the condition of the pauper was substantially the same as that of the pauper in the case of Cassells v. Somerville and Scott, and that the case was therefore ruled by that authority.

THE COURT adhered.

Superior and Vassal—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 4—Infeftment in trust—Radical right.—In 1836 the heir then in possession of an estate under a fee-simple destination, dated in 1783, in favour of a series of heirs varying in some respects from the legal order of succession, on the narrative that he had resolved to execute a new settlement of his lands and estate, conveyed, mortis causa, the estate to his children nominatim and to the survivors or survivor of them in trust for the purpose of managing the estate and of dividing the rents among themselves so long as one or more of them existed, and at the termination of the trust "then to and in favour of my heir-at-law at that time in fee." It was further provided, that if it should happen that the last survivor of the children was also the truster's heir-at-law, then, or if that event should not happen, then on the death of that last survivor, the trust should come to an end, and the subjects fall and belong to the truster's heir-at-law at the time of that event. The trustees were further given ordinary powers of administration, but they were prohibited from burdening or selling the subjects.

On the death of the granter in 1852, A, his eldest son, completed his title by precept of clare constat as heir of provision to his father under the deed of 1783. The trustees were also infeft under this trust-disposition in terms of the precept contained in the deed, which directed sasine to be given to them, "in trust as trustees for the ends and purposes, and under the declarations, burdens, conditions, and provisions before specified, and upon the termination of this trust . . . then to my heir-at-law at that time in fee."

THE estate of Kinnordy was purchased by Mr Charles Lyell in 1782, and he was infeft therein by instrument of sasine in the same year. By disposition and settlement, dated in 1783, he conveyed the estate to his eldest son, Charles Lyell, second of Kinnordy, and the heirs whomsoever of his body, whom failing, to the other persons therein named. Mr Charles Lyell, second of Kinnordy, was infeft upon that disposition and settlement in 1796, and was duly entered with the superior by charter of confirmation in his favour, dated 28th December 1802.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th May 1836, Mr Charles Lyell, second of Kinnordy, disponed, conveyed, and made over the subjects in question to his wife, who predeceased him, "in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, during all the days of her life after my death in the event of her surviving me, but always with and under the burdens, conditions, and provisions hereinafter written, and also under this condition and declaration, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that upon the death of my said spouse the whole rents then current of the lands and others after described shall belong to and fall under the trust hereinafter created, and no part of said current rents shall fall or pertain to the executors of my said spouse as her executry, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding, and upon the death of the said Mrs Frances Lyell, or in the event of her predeceasing me, to and in favour of Charles Lyell, Thomas Lyell, Henry Lyell, Frances Lyell, Marianna Lyell, Caroline Lyell, Eleanor Lyell, Maria Lyell, and Sophia Georgiana Lyell (being the whole surviving children of the marriage between me and the said Mrs Frances Lyell), and the survivors or survivor of them in trust as trustees for the ends and purposes after mentioned (the majority of the survivors being a quorum for executing this trust), and upon the termination of this trust in the manner and at the period hereinafter expressed, then to and in favour of my heir-at-law at that time in fee."

The purposes of the trust were, First, that the truster's heir-at-law for the time, so long as that character should be in a person other than his daughters, and in the event of his daughters becoming his heirs-at-law, then his eldest surviving daughter for the time, should have the liferent use of the mansion-house of Kinnordy.

The second purpose was,—"With regard to the other trust lands and estate before described and conveyed (except the said mansion-house and Mains of Kinnordy and others foresaid), I direct my said trustees, and the survivor of them, to retain and manage the same in trust so long as there shall exist either more than one of my said children, trustees foresaid themselves, or one of them, along with my heir-at-law in a different person from my last surviving child, and to divide the whole free rents or annual returns from the estate, after paying all expenses, annuities, and other deductions, into equal shares (excepting only the produce from sales of wood), two of which equal shares I direct to be paid over to my heir-at-law for the time, so long as that character is in a person or persons different from my said daughters, and in the event of my said daughters becoming my heirs-at-law, then the said two shares to be paid to my eldest surviving daughter for the time, and one equal share to each of my said other children, trustees foresaid, during their respective lives, the said shares to be paid half-yearly as soon as convenient and practicable after the said rents and annual returns have been got in; but upon the death of any of my said children before named (trustees foresaid), the whole right and interest of such deceaser in the said trust-estate shall thereupon cease and determine without regard to whether such deceaser shall leave lawful children or not, unless such child or children be my heir-at-law at the time of their parent's demise, or should afterwards come to be so, in which event such child or children shall, so long as he, she, or they possess the character of my heir-at-law, be entitled to the liferent of the mansion-house and Mains of Kinnordy, and to the two shares of the annual proceeds of my said other estates (excepting the wood), as before provided to my heir-at-law . . . ."

The third purpose was,—" If it shall happen that the last survivor of my said children shall also be my heir-at-law for the time, then and in that event this trust shall cease and determine, or if that shall not happen, then upon the death of the last survivor of my said children this trust shall cease and determine, and upon the termination of this trust on either of these events, the whole lands and estates before described and disponed shall fall and belong to my said heir-at-law at the period of that event, heritably and irredeemably, with power to my said heir-at-law to expede services, make and grant all deeds, and adopt all proceedings for fully and absolutely vesting the whole of said lands and estates in his, her, or their person, but in no case shall it be competent to dissolve this trust sooner than on either of the events aforesaid, it being my express wish and directions that the same shall be kept up till that period, and that the person or persons possessing at that period the character of my heir-at-law, and no previous heir, shall succeed absolutely to the said lands and estates."

The trustees were further authorised to enter vassals in the lands held under the truster as superior, and to grant leases for any period not exceeding nineteen years, but they were prohibited from selling or alienating any part of the estate, and from mortgaging or burdening it in any way. The truster further came under this obligation,—" In which lands, &c., I bind and oblige myself, my heirs and successors, duly and validly to infeft and seise the said Mrs Frances Smith or Lyell, my spouse, in liferent, for her liferent use as aforesaid, under the burdens, conditions, and provisions before written, and upon the death of the said Mrs Frances Lyell, or in the event of her predeceasing me, the said Charles Lyell," &c. (naming the trustees) " and the survivors or survivor of them, in trust, as trustees, for the ends and purposes, and under the declarations, burdens, conditions, and provisions before specified, and upon the termination of this trust, in the manner and at the period hereinbefore expressed, then my heir-at-law at that time in fee, and that by two several infeftments and manners of holding," &c. The precept directed sasine to be given to the trustees, " and the survivors or survivor of them, in trust, as trustees for the ends and purposes and under the declarations, burdens, conditions, and provisions before specified . . . and upon the termination of this trust in the manner and at the period herein before expressed, then to my heir-at-law at that time, in fee."

On the death of Mr Charles Lyell, second of Kinnordy, in 1852, his eldest son, Sir Charles Lyell, applied to the then superior and obtained a precept of clare constat in his favour, as the eldest son, and nearest and lawful heir of provision to his father under his grandfather's disposition and settlement of 1783. In virtue of this entry he paid a casualty of relief to the superior. Sir Charles Lyell died on 22d February 1875.

The trustees were also infeft on 8th July 1852 in terms of the precept in the trust-deed above quoted.

Lord Home, the superior of the lands in question, now brought an action for payment of a composition of one year's rent of the subjects—stated at £5000—against Miss Sophia Georgiana Lyell, the sole surviving trustee under the deed of 1836.

The pursuer averred that Sir Charles had merely a defeasible mid-superiority, and that on his death in 1875, the trustees, being already the proprietors duly infeft in the subjects, became impliedly entered with the superior, subject to his right to enforce payment of the casualty due on entry by virtue of that Act, the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874. They further stated that the destination contained in the settlement of 1783 had been evacuated by the disposition of 1836.

The defender stated in answer that the disposition of 1836 conferred no power upon the trustees to transmit to anyone, and formed a mere burden on the title of the heir-at-law. She further explained "that the heir-at-law of the late Sir Charles Lyell, and also of the deceased Charles Lyell, is Leonard Lyell of Kinnordy, who is likewise heir of provision under the disposition and settlement and under the destination in the charter of confirmation [of 1802]. He is willing to obtain a precept of clare constat from the pursuer, or, if the pursuer will not grant such precept, he will procure himself duly served as heir, and in either case he will pay relief-duty to the pursuer."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) A casualty of one year's rent of the lands described in the summons having become due to the pursuer, as superior thereof, by the defender, upon the death of the said Sir Charles Lyell, the previous vassal, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The infeftment of the defender being merely a burden upon the radical and proper title to the estate, and the heir being willing to enter to said radical and proper title with payment of a relief-duty, the defender should be assoilzied. (3) The defender by the terms of her title holding only for the heir of the investiture, and having no power of transmission to any but the said heir, the pursuer is not entitled to more than relief-duty.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 14th June 1887, pronounced this interlocutor:—" Finds that Sir Charles Lyell, the last entered vassal, was not divested of his radical right in the lands libelled by the infeftment of the trustees under his father's trust-disposition and settlement; that the said right passed at his death into his hæreditas jacens, and may be taken up by the service of his heir: And in respect of the minute for Leonard Lyell" (offering to enter either by writ of clare or by service) " supersedes farther consideration of the cause for one month, and grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is, Whether the defender has been entered with the superior, by force of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, as a singular successor of the last vassal, so as to exclude the heir of the standing investiture, and to incur liability for a composition of a year's rent? and it depends for its solution on the feudal effect of a trust-disposition executed in 1836 by the father and predecessor of the last entered vassal.

"The truster, Charles Lyell (the second) of Kinnordy, was infeft as immediate disponee under a trust-disposition and settlement executed by his father, Charles Lyell (the first), in 1783, and was entered with the superior by charter of confirmation, confirming the disposition and the infeftment following upon it in 1802. The disposition and settlement, so confirmed, is in favour of a series of heirs, varying in some respects from the legal order of succession; and the destination which it contains was undoubtedly the rule of the existing investiture, as regards succession, when the Act of 1874 came into operation. It was, however, a simple destination which Charles Lyell (the second) was at liberty to defeat; and it is said that he altered it by his trust-disposition and settlement of 1836, so that the implied entry of the trustees under that deed has effected a change in the investiture, and entitled the superior to a composition as for the entry of a singular successor. The answer is, that the trust right is a mere temporary burden, and that the infeftment of the trustees is therefore no feudal impediment to the entry of the heir.

"The trust-disposition and settlement contains a conveyance to the granter's wife in liferent, and, on her death, to his children, who are called nominatim in trust; and, upon the termination of the trust, to the granter's heir-at-law at that time in fee. The trust is created for the sole purpose of making provision, out of the rents of the estate, for the children of the truster, and upon the death of the last child, who shall not be heir-at-law, the trust is to come to an end, and the right of the heir-at-law is to become absolute. The deed contains procuratory of resignation and precept of sasine, authorising the infeftment of the children who are specially named 'in trust, and as trustees for the uses and purposes, and under the conditions' specified in the deed; and also authorising infeftment, at the end of the trust, of the heir-at-law at that time, in fee.

"On the death of the truster in 1852, his eldest son, Sir Charles Lyell, completed a title by infeftment on a precept of clare constat in his favour, as the eldest son and nearest and lawful heir of provision to his father under the settlement of 1783; and in July 1852, the whole surviving children of the truster, eight in number, took infeftment as trustees, upon the precept contained in the trust-disposition and settlement of 1836. It is not stated whether the sasine of the heir or of the trustees was first in date, and it is immaterial, because in either case the feudal effect of the two infeftments will be the same. The pursuer maintains that by their infeftment upon the precept the trustees divested the truster and his heirs of the dominium utile, leaving a bare midsuperiority, which was well taken up by Sir Charles Lyell; that they continued to hold base under Sir Charles until the passing of the Act of 1874, when, by the operation of the 4th section of that statute, the midsuperiority was extinguished, and the trustees were entered with the pursuer as their immediate superior. If this was in truth the effect of the trustees' infeftment, it follows, upon the authority of Lamont v. Rankine, that there is now no room for the entry of Sir Charles Lyell's heir, and that the defender must pay a composition as singular successor.

"The first question therefore is, Whether the truster and his heirs have been divested? It is settled law that a mere trust infeftment does not divest the granter, but operates merely as a burden upon his title. But the pursuer says that this is not a mere trust infeftment, because the disposition and settlement was intended to alter the existing destination, and is effectual for that purpose; and the trustees are therefore holding for the heirs of the new destination, which, according to the argument, has been already enfranchised by the implied confirmation of their infeftment.

"The whole case appears to me to depend upon the soundness of this proposition, and I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained. I am unable, however, to assent to the first point which the defender takes in answer to it. It is said that there is no change in the destination, because the 'heir-at-law,' as used in the trust-disposition and settlement, must be construed to mean heir of the investiture. But 'heir-at-law' is a technical term, which means, in its ordinary acceptation, the heir provisione legis, as distinguished from the heir of a particular destination. There is nothing in the deed to indicate that it was intended in any other than its technical sense, and I think it would be contrary to settled disposition and settlement by Mr Charles Lyell, second of Kinnordy, of even date with the deed founded on in the first action, viz., 28th May rules of construction to force upon it a meaning which it does not naturally bear, merely because the title of the granter of the deed contains a destination differing from the legal order of succession.

"There may have been cases where the word 'heir,' when used in relation to accessory rights, has been interpreted by reference to other deeds, but in the construction of a special settlement, such as the present, the technical meaning of words descriptive of the class of heirs who are to succeed must prevail, unless it can be controlled by other words occurring in the same deed. This was decided in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Douglas, M. 4369, and the decision rests upon principles that are applicable to the construction of all written instruments.

"Nor does it appear to me to be very material to the present question that the characters of heir-at-law and heir of the investiture are at present united in the person of Mr Leonard Lyell. He may or may not be the heir-at-law at the time the trust comes to an end; and it is a sufficient foundation for the pursuer's argument if, at the time when the trustees are said to have been entered, it was possible, according to the conception of the trust, that they might be holding for an heir who should not be the heir of the investiture. Now, there appears to be only one event, but still there is an event, in which the characters of heir of the investiture and heir-at-law might be in different persons at the termination of the trust. The heir-at-law of the truster at that time must be either his last surviving child, or the direct descendant of a predeceasing child. But by the destination of the settlement of 1783 heirs-portioners are excluded, and they are not excluded by the settlement of 1836. It follows that by the latter settlement the estate might be carried to persons who are not the heirs of the investiture, and it is of no importance to the question whether this is a probable or a possible result in the event which has actually happened.

"But, whatever may be the character of the heir who shall take at the termination of the trust, the important question is, Whether the full fee of the estate to which he will then have right is now vested in the trustees? I am not sure that this is exactly what is meant by the pursuer's proposition that the trustees are 'holding for the heir.' That is a very vague phrase, and the pursuer's counsel did not define with any precision the meaning which he attaches to it. But if it does not mean that the fee which the heir is ultimately to take is now in the last surviving trustee, it has no bearing upon the question of the heir's right to enter. If it does mean this, it would appear to me to follow that the heir when his right emerges must take it through or from the trustee by conveyance or by succession; and the best way of testing the soundness of the proposition will therefore be to inquire whether it is possible for the heir to complete a title by either of these methods.

"Now, it is certain that he cannot obtain a title by conveyance from the trustees, because they have no power to convey; and except in the event of the characters of heir-at-law and of last surviving child of the truster being combined in the same person, the trust is to be extinguished by the death of the last trustee before the right of the heir-at-law can be ascertained. A conveyance from the trustees, therefore, to the heir-at-law would be altogether inept and ineffectual. But then it is suggested that the trustees are infeft as the first members of a destination, and that upon the death of the last trustee the heir-at-law may make up a title by special service as heir of provision to her. I think it a sufficient answer that the infeftment of the trustees is expressly qualified as an infeftment in trust, which is to come to an end upon the death of the last trustee. It has long been settled law that where a trust expires with the last survivor of the trustees the feudal title cannot be taken up by his heir even for the purpose of a reconveyance to the truster—Drummond, M. 16,206; Gillespie v. Robertson, 2 Shaw, 795. But this is a much stronger case, for not only is the trustee's title to be extinguished on the death of the last survivor, but the whole purposes of the trust, and all the rights created by it, are to be exhausted upon the occurrence of that event. It appears to me to be altogether contrary to the most elementary principles to represent the estate in the trustees as an estate of inheritance which can pass by succession to their heirs; and it is just as impossible that it should be taken up by heirs of provision as by heirs of law. The truster's heir-at-law is not to take an absolute right in the estate until the trust is at an end. But when that event happens he is to take in his own right as a disponee, and not by way of succession to the trustees.

"But if it be clear that the trustees were infeft in trust only, and under a trust so qualified that the fee of the estate cannot pass to their heirs, it follows of necessity that their infeftment left the fee in Sir Charles Lyell, the last entered vassal. It has been settled law, ever since the case of Campbell v. Edderline's Creditors (Morr. App. Adjud. No. 11), that an infeftment in trust for special purposes does not completely divest the granter, but leaves the radical fee in him, so that on his death it may be adjudged as in hæreditate jacente, or taken up by the service of an heir in special. The rule has been applied in a great variety of cases, the most important of which are cited in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk in Gilmour v. Gilmour, 11 Macph. 856; and the legal principles on which it rests are fully expounded in two very weighty judgments of Lord Moncreiff in the cases of M'Millan v. Campbell, 9 S. 551, 7 W. & S. 441, and Giles v. Lindsay, 6 D. 771. But the present is even a clearer case for the application of the rule than Campbell v. Edderline or M'Millan v. Campbell. For in these cases the trust-deed might have become the regulating instrument for the investiture of the estate, and in the present case, although a change of the investiture may be intended by the truster, the trust infeftment can never be made available for the purpose of effecting the change. The trust is to subsist only so long as shall be necessary for securing provisions out of the estate to children other than the heir-at-law; when that purpose is served it is to be extinguished ipso facto, without the necessity for any conveyance or reconveyance; in the meantime the trustees are to have no other powers, even of management, than are indispensable for the execution of the trust; and not only have they no power of conveyance, but they are expressly prohibited 'from taking grassums or premiums for leases, and from selling or disponing any part of the estate, and from burdening it with debt.' And all due precaution is taken to secure that the conditions and limitations upon their title shall be effectual, because by the terms of the procuratory and precept they are to be infeft in trust as trustees for the purposes and under the conditions and provisions before specified, which are appointed to be engrossed in the charters and infeftments to follow hereon. The series of decisions to which I have referred leaves no room for question as to the feudal effect of an infeftment in these terms. As a trust for special and temporary purposes, it left the granter undivested of the radical right, so that his heir might be served heir in special upon his original title, or adjudication might be led against his hæreditas jacens.

"It follows that the right vested in Sir Charles Lyell by his infeftment on the precept of clare constat was not, as the pursuer supposes, a bare midsuperiority, but the substantial right of property in the estate, under burden of the disposition and settlement. The fee must necessarily have been in him, because it was not in the trustees, and there was no other person in existence who could have it. But for the passing of the Act of 1874, therefore, there could be no question that upon his death the fee passed into his hæreditas jacens, and was open to be taken up, under the same burden as it stood in him, by his nephew Mr Leonard Lyell as his heir of provision. But the 4th section of the Act of 1874 makes no difference if the fee in Sir Charles was not a bare midsuperiority. It enters the proprietor infeft with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in the lands would not have been defeasible at the will of such proprietor. But the trust infeftment makes no real division of the truster's estate, so as to separate the dominium utile from a midsuperiority. It leaves the entire estate in him as it stood before, or in the heir who takes it up from his hæreditas jacens, subject only to the transient burden of the trust; and no part of the estate is defeasible at the will of the trustees, whether the form by which the trust is made real is an a me or a de me holding.

"It appears to be very doubtful, therefore, whether the Act of 1874 is applicable to the case, so as to put the trustees in the position of holding directly of the superior. But if they do hold directly of him, they hold only to the extent of their right, and their infeftment is still nothing more than a burden upon the substantial fee. It is of no consequence to the rule as laid down in Campbell v. Edderline whether trustees hold of the truster or of his superior. The principle is that their infeftment, in whatever form, does not evacuate the infeftment of the granter, and therefore cannot exclude the infeftment of the granter's heir. This is brought out very clearly in the opinion of Lord Corehouse in Melville v. Preston, 16 S. 457. It was a question, in that case, whether trustees under a trust-disposition which had been executed by Sir Robert Preston of Valleyfield, under the burden of an entail, could make up a feudal title to the lands, notwithstanding that the entail had been already feudalised in the person of the institute. And upon that question Lord Corehouse observes,—'As to the feudal difficulty pleaded by the defender, it is without foundation. It is true there cannot be two co-existing and co-ordinate infeftments in fee-simple in one and the same estate; but nothing is more common than to have an infeftment in fee-simple burdened either with an entail or a trust. . . . These are not cases of two co-ordinate and co-existing infeftments in the same fee.' And accordingly the completion of the one title by infeftment interposes no feudal impediment to the completion of the other by infeftment also.

"It is argued, however, that although the infeftment of the trustee might not exclude the heir, if the deed contained nothing more than the conveyance in the trust, the conveyance to the granter's heir-at-law will have a very different effect, because it necessarily operates a change in the investiture. But the change has not yet been effected, and it is very doubtful whether it could ever be effected, without the intervention of the heir of the existing investiture. I assume that the beneficial interest is well given to the heir-at-law, if that character shall belong to a different person from the heir of the investiture when the trust comes to an end. But taking that for granted, the question is whether the conveyance is of itself effectual as a feudal transmission of the estate. The 20th section of the Titles Act of 1868 and the 27th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 have no application to a disposition executed in 1836 and coming into operation by the death of the granter in 1852. The feudal effect of the deed, therefore, must be determined according to the law as it stood before the passing of these Acts; and by the law as then established a proprietor infeft could only infeft a disponee by the warrants contained in a de presenti conveyance in favour of a person capable of taking an immediate right. A precept for the infeftment of persons who cannot be ascertained, and who may not be in existence when the deed comes into operation, was altogether inept and ineffectual. It appears to me, therefore, that there is only one method by which the disponee, if he has a good right at all, will be able to combine his right with the feudal title. He cannot obtain a conveyance from the trustee, because she has no power to convey; he cannot serve heir of provision to her, because she has no right that will pass into her hereditas jacens; he cannot execute the precept in his own favour. The only means by which he can feudalise his right is by adjudication in implement directed against the heir of the investiture. But that means that he can charge the heir to enter, by treating the disposition in his own favour as an obligation upon the heir. And if the heir can enter when the trust is at an end, in order to give effect to his ancestor's conveyance, it follows that the investiture has not been changed, and that he can enter now, because the fee is vacant by the death of the last vassal.

"But if, contrary to the opinion I have indicated, it should be held that the precept is a good warrant for the infeftment of the disponee, that will not in the slightest degree affect the present title of the heir of the investiture as in a question with the superior. The right of the disponee will still be purely personal until he chooses to take infeftment, and if he should be content to stand on his personal title, and to leave the fee vacant for the heir of the investiture, there will be nothing in the state of the titles, or of the substantial rights of the parties, to prevent the heir from entering. It is said that the deed is confirmed, and that the superior cannot but be entitled to found upon a conveyance which the statute supposes him to have recognised. But assuming the implied confirmation to have taken effect, I cannot read the statute as importing a confirmation of anything in the title of a proprietor infeft, excepting only the infeftment and its conditions, and the rights and titles which are necessary to support it. If the deed contains two several rights, upon one of which infeftment has passed, while the other remains personal, the implied confirmation of the feudalised right can have no operation upon the personal. The infeftment of the liferenter alone, under a conveyance to one in liferent and another in fee, is a familiar illustration; and there can be no question that such an infeftment, either before or after the passing of the Conveyancing Act, leaves the fee remaining upon the old investiture. This was well settled under the old law, and it was held by the majority of the Judges in Hope v. Hamilton, 10 R. 1127, to be equally clear in a question under the Conveyancing Act of 1874. Lord Shand, in that case, proceeded upon a different ground, but I do not understand his Lordship to have dissented from the opinion of the other Judges, or to indicate any doubt of the soundness of the distinction between an unfeudalised right, which may import a change in the destination, and the feudal operation, which changes the investiture. The material point is that the superior has no concern with the rights which may be created by his vassal, until the persons in whose favour they may be conceived are brought into direct relation with him by infeftment or a demand for infeftment of and under him. On the same principle it would appear to follow that the implied confirmation of a trust infeftment can have no operation whatever upon the unfeudalised right to the substantial fee. And, therefore, if Sir Charles Lyell had been the last surviving trustee, and the character of heir-at-law and heir of the investiture had been in different persons at his death, I see no ground upon which the superior would have been entitled to plead upon the disposition to the heir-at-law as against the demand of the heir of the investiture for an entry, if the heir-at-law were content, for whatever reason, to waive his right. The case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Guild, 10 R. 1117, would have been directly in point. But if that be so, the heir of the investiture must be equally entitled to enter to the fee left vacant by Sir Charles' death, when the right of the heir-at-law has not yet been ascertained.

"The cases of Hill v. Grindlay and of Lamont v. Rankine are, in my opinion, inapplicable. In these cases the deeds which were confirmed, actually or by implication, were deeds creating a new investiture. As Lord Curriehill points out, 'the trustees on obtaining the charter which they demanded might have used it to create the direct relation of superior and vassal between the superior and a third party, even after the death of the heir, without any farther payment being made to the superior.' In the present case the trustee can never by the exercise of any right in her bring any new vassal into feudal relation with the superior. The infeftment of the trustee is a mere burden which has no effect upon the investiture; and if the investiture should be changed at all by the operation of the trust-disposition and settlement, it will be in virtue of a right which has not yet been feudalised. The superior may be entitled to a composition when the change takes place, if the fee is then vacant. But, in the meantime, he must, in my opinion, be content with relief-duty on the entry of the heir.

"The other case, at the instance of the same superior against the judicial factor upon a trust for creditors, depends upon the same considerations. There ditions, clauses, provisions, and declarations in every respect as are contained in the said trust-disposition and settlement."

None of the trustees under this deed having accepted office, a judicial factor had been appointed in the trust on 9th March 1850. Sir Charles having executed a disposition and conveyance of the subjects contained in the deed of 1836 to the judicial factor, the latter was infeft thereon in July 1854, and this action was now brought against him for payment of a casualty of a year's rent, Sir Charles having died in 1875, and the defender being now impliedly entered with the superior by virtue of the Conveyancing Act of 1874.

As already stated with reference to the other action, Sir Charles Lyell obtained a precept of clare constat in August 1852, and infeftment followed, he paying a casualty of relief.

The pleadings of parties were similar to those in the preceding action.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 14th June 1887, pronounced a similar interlocutor to that in the former action, and his ground of judgment will be found in the last paragraph of his note to the first interlocutor.

The pursuer reclaimed in both cases.

Before the cases were opened the defender was allowed to add the following new plea in each:—"In respect of the provisions of the Act 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 69 (Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1887), the defender is liable in relief-duty only."

Argued for the pursuer;—I. In regard to the defender's new plea, (1) the Conveyancing Amendment Act of 1887 was not retroactive. It did not affect transactions already made, or actions already raised, or interests already vested at the date of the passing of the statute.[1] It was not necessary to the rejection of the plea to hold that the statute could only apply to deeds which came into operation after its date. The words of the 1st section of the Act of 1887 were not wider than those of the 39th section of the Act of 1874, which were the subject of decision in this connection in the case of Gardner. (2) The terms of the 1st section of the Act of 1887 were inapplicable to the facts of this case. "Heir" in that section meant "heir-at-law," and "heir-at-law" only. It was here sought to make it applicable to an heir of investiture, or a selected beneficiary, i.e., a person who should be in the position of heir-at-law at a certain date.

II. The intention of the trust-disposition and settlement of 1836 by Mr Charles Lyell the second clearly was to evacuate the old destination under the deed of 1783 and to create a new one. A destination over to a person who may be "my heir-at-law at that time" was the same as a destination over to a third person.[2] The person entitled to take could not is a power of sale for payment of debts, but the same power existed in the case of Edderline, and in many of the long series of decided cases which followed it; and it is perfectly well settled that until the power is exercised, the trust for creditors is still a mere burden. A more material point of distinction is that there is no conveyance of such part of the lands as may remain unsold by which the rights of the heirs of the investiture can be affected. The trustee for creditors is to convey to the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement, but when the purposes of this last trust have been served, there is no farther conveyance, and no direction or power to the trustees to convey. The heir of the investiture, therefore, is not divested."

be ascertained until the death of the last survivor of the trustees; and although it was true that Mr Leonard Lyell was both heir-at-law and heir of the investiture at present, these two characters might be in different persons when the succession ultimately opened. For instance, if Mr Leonard Lyell predeceased the last surviving trustee, and left daughters only, the fee would go, under the trust-disposition, to them as heirs-portioners—but under the old destination heirs-portioners were excluded. The old destination was therefore altered by the deed of 1836, upon the precept contained in which the trustees under it obtained infeftment in 1852. By that infeftment the truster and his heirs were divested of the dominium utile of the estate, leaving to Sir Charles Lyell a bare mid-superiority; and on the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 the trustees became impliedly entered with the superior, and were liable in the composition now sued for as at the date of the death of Sir Charles in 1875.[1] The Lord Ordinary would have admitted that this argument, founded upon the cases cited above, ruled the present case, if there had been a power in the deed of 1836 to the surviving trustee to convey to the heir, or if the destination had been to the trustees and the heir of the survivor of them. But because his Lordship found in that deed no means by which the estate could be conveyed to the ultimate disponee, he held that the present case was differentiated from those cited above, and that the truster was not divested by the infeftment of the trustees, who, he held, were mere incumbrancers for temporary purposes only. In the case of Campbell v. Edderline,[2] on which the Lord Ordinary founded, the trust was created for the granter's behoof. So too in M'Millan v. Campbell.[3] These cases were thus distinguishable from the present, where the deed was a mortis causa trust, and this distinction was well known to the law.[4] The case of Giles v. Lindsay[5] belonged to a different category—the question there being as to the effect of an ex facie absolute feu-disposition which had been granted for a particular purpose only. In Gilmour v. Gilmours[6] the Lord Justice-Clerk (Moncreiff) (11 Macph. 858) drew a distinction between mortis causa and inter vivos trusts, which applied here. In a mortis causa disposition like the present nothing was left in the hæreditas jacens of the truster. The fee was in the trustees, who held for the heir who might ultimately be entitled to succeed. Where heirs were not mentioned, the trust-estate remained after the death of the last surviving trustee in his hæreditas jacens,[7] and his heir might be sued in a declarator of trust and adjudication with a view to the making up of a title. The cases of Drummond and Gillespie, which were cited on the other side, supported this contention. Under the 43d section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94) the heir-at-law of the last surviving trustee might make up a title as trustee in his room to facilitate the carrying through of the remaining purposes of the trust, or

v. Lyell.

the provisions of the 14th section of the Trusts Act, 1867 (30 Vict. cap. 97), might be taken advantage of.

III. The Lord Ordinary had departed from the rule which was recc in cases of this kind. If there was on the face of the deed, as the here, a clear intention on the truster's part to make a new settlen his estate, the law would not regard the trustees as incumbrancer because there was merely a coupling awanting.[1] For instance, if tl been a case under the old law, and the trustees had gone to the sı asking a charter of confirmation on payment of relief-duty, the sı would have said that the substance of the deed was that the had given away his estate for a new settlement under a new i ture.

If there was a difficulty it was only a technical one. The whole of cases, beginning with Frog's Creditors,[2] supported the view that than hold that a fee was in pendente the Court would invent a fiar, w a fiduciary one or otherwise. Indeed, the invention of the theor fiduciary fiar was due to the necessity of satisfying the right of the sı to have a vassal. There was no case in which an attempt to disp the fee had been denied effect because of the existence of interpose rents. The Lord President put such a case in his opinion in Cum
R. 944) only to reject it. Further, the deed of 1836, as had been p out, was a complete family settlement, altering the previous inve —which was in favour of the view that the trustees' right was not liferent merely.[3]

Second Action.—In regard to the second action, the distinctions we the trustee for creditors was to hand over the balance, after servir purposes of the trust, to the trustees under the trust-dispositio settlement. There was further a power of sale, and the grante thus undoubtedly divested of his estate. This case was a fortiori first.

Argued for the defender;—I. On the construction of the deed o it was important to notice at the outset that the only event in whi characters of heir of the investiture and of heir-at-law could be i ferent persons would be the event of Mr Leonard Lyell predec the last surviving trustee and leaving daughters, who would take the deed of 1836 as heirs-portioners, while under the earlier deed portioners were excluded. The heir of investiture and the heir-being thus the same person, only relief-duty could, in the meanti anyrate, be claimed until it appeared whether the heir-at-law wa heir of investiture.[4] That was upon the footing that the Lord Ord was right in holding that the words "heir-at-law" meant somethin ferent from "heir of investiture."

II. Looking to the terms of the deed itself, there was no mach provided in it by which the trustees could convey to the heir-a they had treated the infeftment as that of the heir-at-law, which, they argued, had been impliedly effected on the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. But the infeftment thus produced was an infeftment of the trustees only, and it was a burdening and not an evacuating infeftment. The dispositive and executive clauses of the deed recognised the conveyance to the trustees as a separate conveyance from that to the heir-at-law, just as if there had been two deeds. This case was therefore really a fortiori of the case of Campbell v. Edderline's creditor.[1] There were several points of distinction between the present case and that of Grindlay v. Hill,[2] which had been cited on the other side. In the latter (1) there was a power of sale; (2) the trustees did not hold for the heir only, but for others as well; (3) there was a direction to convey; (4) what the trustees asked was a charter which omnium consensu would have been assignable.[3] It had been attempted on the other side to establish a canon of law that the question whether an infeftment was to be considered a burdening or evacuating infeftment depended on the consideration whether the deed was one inter vivos or mortis causa, and Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff's opinion in Gilmour's case had been founded on.[4] But the case of Giles v. Lindsay[5] had not been quoted in the case of Gilmour, and the opinions of the Court in that case were quite inconsistent with the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion in Gilmour. The trust in the case of Melville v. Preston[6] was very like the trust in the present case, and was a case of a mortis causa disposition. Further, there was here, under the deed of 1836, a direct disposition to the heir, but no way of making up his title. It was true, as had been argued on the other side, that the heir of a deceased trustee was called in a process of declarator and adjudication which was brought by a beneficiary, where the trust-deed contained no destination to the heirs of the last surviving trustee, in order to have the trust-estate adjudged to him, but this was solely for the purpose of allowing the heir to state any claim to be recouped, or other defence which might have been open to the deceased. There was no feudal fee to be taken out of the deceased trustee. But here the truster never had been divested. There could not be divestiture without another infeftment, vesting the person infeft with the full fee. It was not enough that there was a fiduciary fee in the trustees, seeing that the trust was temporary in its nature, and that the trustee's infeftment was not an infeftment on behalf of the heir.[7] If such an infeftment had been taken, it would not have been in conformity with the precept contained in the deed.[8] The presumption was always against the divestiture of the granter where the trust was for temporary purposes only. The principle of Cumstie's case[9] had never been extended to cases of trust-dispositions for behoof of creditors, nor to other temporary or burdening dispositions.

III. The next question was whether there was a good conveyance to the heir. Under the old law,—i.e., prior to the Titles Act of 1868, and the Conveyancing Act of 1874—it was settled that a de præsenti conveyance to a person not named was good, but the precept in his favour could not be made effectual except by declarator and adjudication or by service.[1] The precept here therefore, in so far as it was in favour of the heir, was unexecuted, and all that was confirmed by the Act of 1874 was the sasine of the trustees.

IV. The Act of 1887 was retrospective. There was no room here for the presumption against the retrospective effect of legislation.[2] The Act itself expressly bore (sec. 1) to deal with infeftments completed prior to its passing. It was said that the section did not cover the present case, because the word "heir," which alone was used there, had a restricted signification, and meant "heir-at-law." But surely it included a case where trustees held for the person who would be entitled to serve as heir-at-law.

Second Action.—There was nothing which could be held to distinguish it from the first. The power of sale which was given to the trustees was immaterial for that purpose.

At advising,—

Lord President.—This is an action at the instance of Lord Home, superior of the lands of Kinnordy against Miss Sophia Georgiana Lyell, who is the last survivor of certain trustees who became infeft in the lands in question in 1852. It is maintained by the pursuer that on the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 the infeftment of 1852 had the effect of entering the defender with the superior as his vassal, and he now therefore demands a composition of a year's rent from the defender as a singular successor of the last entered vassal. The Lord Ordinary has found that "Sir Charles Lyell, the last entered vassal, was not divested of his radical right in the lands libelled by the infeftment of the trustees under his father's trust-disposition and settlement; that the said right passed at his death into his hæreditas jacens, and may be taken up by the service of his heir," and he has superseded farther consideration of the cause in order that Mr Leonard Lyell, as heir of provision, may enter on completing his title either by precept of clare or by service.

To determine the question at issue, it is necessary to go back in the history of the estate and of the titles to it. The estate was purchased in 1782 by Mr Charles Lyell, who by mortis causa deed, dated in 1783, settled it upon his eldest son, Charles Lyell, second of Kinnordy, and a series of heirs, the destination being one which departed in some respects from the legal order of succession. The second Mr Charles Lyell was infeft upon that disposition and settlement in 1796, and he was entered with the then superior by charter of confirmation dated in 1802 on payment of a year's rent as composition, which of course had the effect of enfranchising the series of heirs named in the destination of the disposition of 1796. Upon the death of the second Mr Charles Lyell, in 1852, his eldest son Sir Charles Lyell, third of Kinnordy, entered as heir of investiture by precept of clare constat obtained from the superior in 1852. He died in 1875, and the next heir of the investiture is Mr Leonard Lyell, who is also heir-at-law to the heir of the investiture last infeft.

If the destination in the deed of 1783, to which I have referred, is not evacuated, it is not easy to see how the pursuer's contention can be maintained, because in that case the person clearly entitled to enter as heir is Mr Leonard Lyell, who, as I have said, is the next heir of the investiture. But it is said that the destination has been evacuated by a deed which was executed by the second Mr Charles Lyell in 1836,—upon which the trustees therein named were infeft in 1852,—the same year in which Sir Charles Lyell entered as vassal under the investiture.

It is manifest that the whole question turns upon the terms of the deed of 1836 and the infeftment thereon by the trustees in 1852. If that deed had the effect of transferring to the trustees the fee and property of the estate, then their infeftment operated to divest the truster and his heirs of the dominium utile of the estate, leaving a bare midsuperiority, which was well taken up by Sir Charles Lyell. So matters stood until the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, the 4th section of which,—according to the decisions which have been pronounced,—had the effect of extinguishing the midsuperiority, and making the defender, according to the contention of the pursuer, hold direct of the superior, Lord Home. On the other hand, if the dominium utile was not vested in the person of the defender as the last survivor of the trustees, then the pursuer has no claim to the composition he now seeks.

The deed of 1836 is a very peculiar one. The granter dispones, conveys, and makes over in the first place in favour of his wife "in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, during all the days of her life after my death, in the event of her surviving me," &c.; but as the lady predeceased her husband, that portion of the deed never came into operation. The second part of the conveyance is,—"Upon the death of my said spouse the whole rents then current of the lands and others after described shall belong to and fall under the trust hereinafter created, and no part of said current rents shall fall or pertain to the executors of my said spouse as her executry, any law or practice to the contrary notwithstanding, and upon the death of the said Mrs Frances Lyell, or in the event of her predeceasing me, to and in favour of Charles Lyell, Thomas Lyell, Henry Lyell, Frances Lyell, Marianna Lyell, Caroline Lyell, Eleanor Lyell, Maria Lyell, and Sophia Georgiana Lyell (being the whole surviving children of the marriage between me and the said Mrs Frances Lyell), and the survivors or survivor of them in trust as trustees for the ends and purposes after mentioned (the majority of the survivors being a quorum for executing this trust), and upon the termination of this trust in the manner and at the period hereinafter expressed, then to and in favour of my heir-at-law at that time in fee."

I do not think there is any difficulty in understanding the meaning and intention of the maker of the deed. His intention is that the estate shall be held in trust for a certain period by his whole children, and at the termination of the trust,—on the death of the last survivor,—the estate is to go in fee to the person who may then be in the position of heir-at-law to the truster. The nature of the trust must be ascertained from the other portions of the deed, and may be shortly expressed thus,—that the whole of the children are to enjoy among them the rents of the estate, so long as they or any of them survive,—they are all to take possession of and to administer the property and divide the rents among them, and the survivors and survivor are to do the same. But as soon as the last survivor dies, the trust is to come to an end. The trustees have no power of sale under the deed,—nor can they burden the subjects. They have nothing but ordinary powers of administration, and the enjoyment of the rents for their own lives and those of the survivors and survivor. That being the nature of the trust, the question is, what is the effect of it?

But before answering that question it is desirable to keep in view what is to take place when the trust comes to an end. The estate is then to fall and belong to the person who shall be the truster's heir-at-law at the period of that event. He is not named in the deed, for the reason that he cannot be ascertained until the event occurs, and the expiration of the trust has come about. Further, the trustees are not authorised to convey to that heir; on the contrary, his right depends upon a direct conveyance to him by the granter of the deed on the expiration of the trust. What the effect of that provision is may possibly give rise to a question some day, although it is not necessary to decide the point now. Again, the deed provides that if the last surviving trustee happens to be heir-at-law of the granter, then he is to take the fee of the estate under the operation of this clause; but if he be not so, then the person must be found who answers the description of the granter's heir-at-law at that time.

It is clear that under this deed no proper fee and no property ever vested in the trustees at all. The trust is, perhaps, more than any other trust which we have had before us, of the nature of a purely temporary trust; it is not even like a trust for creditors, where the trustees have powers of sale, and where the granter is not divested of the radical fee unless that power is exercised. There has been no operating upon the estate here by the trustees, excepting only so far as ordinary administration and the enjoyment of the rents for their own benefit is concerned. I can therefore come to no other conclusion than that this trust created a mere temporary burden upon the estate, and that the fee remained in the hæreditas jacens of the son of the granter of the deed, I mean of Sir Charles Lyell, who was himself entered as heir. It may happen in a certain, not very likely, event that the heir-at-law of the truster will not be the heir of investiture when the trust comes to an end. They may be different persons, and a question may then arise which is to be preferred, whether the heir of investiture is to take, or the person who has got a right to the formal conveyance, which may be effectual as an obligation in his favour, though there is no conveyance. It is out of the question to determine that point now. In all human probability the necessity of determining it will never arise. All we have to decide now is, whether Miss Sophia Georgiana Lyell, who is the sole surviving trustee, is clothed with the right of fee in the land, in consequence of which she can be made to enter with the superior as a singular successor, or becomes entered by the operation of the Act of 1874. I am of opinion that there is no such fee in her, and that there never was, and therefore, upon the same ground as the Lord Ordinary, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Mure.—I am of the same opinion. The main question here raised for decision is whether the trustees under the trust-deed of 1836 founded upon were infeft as proprietors in fee of this estate at the time of the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and are now duly entered with the superior in respect of the provisions of the 4th section of the statute. The words of the section are, that "every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate register of sasines, duly entered with the nearest superior." I understand the words "duly infeft" to mean "duly infeft in fee," and the question we have to decide is, whether the present trustees come under this description. I am of opinion that they do not. The trustees seem to me to have been appointed mainly for the administration and management of this property. There is no express conveyance of the estate to them in fee, nor any express mention of the fee till the time of the expiry of the trust, when it is to belong to the heir-at-law of the truster as at that period. The powers of the trustees, moreover, are limited in important respects, and I can find nothing in the trust-deed to shew, or even to indicate, that there was any intention on the part of the testator to vest the fee in the trustees. On the contrary, it appears to be very anxiously provided that the trustees shall not act as proprietors of the estate, because they are prohibited from selling or burdening it, and they have no power to dispone. Neither in words, therefore, nor on any fair construction of the deed, can it be said that they are proprietors of the fee of the estate. Upon that simple ground I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion; and I may add that I concur with his Lordship substantially in the views which he has expressed in his note as to where the fee of the estate has been since the death of the truster.

LORD ADAM.—A great many questions of more or less interest have been argued to us in this case, but I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the grounds upon which we ought to decide it lie within a narrow compass.

It is common ground between the parties that Sir Charles Lyell was the vassal last entered in the fee, and that by an infeftment dated in 1852. That being so, on 22d February 1875, which was the date of his death, the fee of the subjects passed into his hæreditas jacens, and still remains there, unless it can be shewn that it has been taken out of it by the infeftment of the trustees under the deed of 1836, and the operation of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. There is thus raised the simple question whether the infeftment of 1836 was or was not an infeftment in fee. It is clear that no infeftment of the trustees could have the effect of entering them with the superior unless it was an infeftment in the fee.

The question therefore turns upon the effect of the infeftment of the trustees under the deed of 1836. We have not had the infeftment produced, but it is said to be exactly in the terms of the precept of sasine, and if valid must have been so. If this is so, the infeftment was to the truster's widow in liferent for her liferent use, and upon her death to the trustees and the survivors or survivor of them in trust, for the ends and purposes, and under the declarations, burdens, conditions, and provisions contained in the deed—there being no mention, we were told, of the heir-at-law. We are therefore taken back to the deed to see what the trust purposes were. I shall not analyse it again, but it seems to me clear, as your Lordship has pointed out, that its purposes were of a purely temporary nature, and that they were all to come to an end at the death of the last survivor of the trustees, or sooner if the last survivor happened to be the heir-at-law. That being the nature of the infeftment, it appears to me that it is no more than a burden upon the fee. There is no conveyance of the fee to the trustees. The conveyance is direct to the heir-at-law, and this being so, it is impossible to say that the surviving trustee is infeft in the fee of the subjects. It is clear, therefore, that the effect of the statute cannot be to enter the sur-

I therefore think the Lord Ordinary's judgment is quite right. The superior is entitled to have a vassal, but I am clearly of opinion that he cannot have the surviving trustee entered.

Agent and Client—Negotiorum gestor—Remuneration of agent.—A landed proprietor having become insane, his brother, without judicial or other authority, managed his estate with the assistance of the law-agents who had previously managed the estate for the proprietor. After two years a curator bonis was appointed to the proprietor. In an action of accounting brought by the curator against the law-agents, the pursuer maintained that the defenders must be regarded as pro-curators, and were not entitled to credit for professional charges. Held that the law-agents were entitled to the ordinary remuneration for their services.

EDMUND PATERSON BALFOUR HAY of Mugdrum and other estates, on attaining majority in 1869, executed a factory and commission in favour of his mother, who had previously managed his estate as his curator. During her management she had been advised by Mr George Wilson, S.S.C. (of the firm of Wilson & Dunlop, W.S.), who had long been the agent for the Mugdrum estate.

Mrs Paterson died on 6th September 1873. On her death, Mr Hay being of weak mind, it became necessary to make a new arrangement for the management of Mugdrum. On 16th October Mr Hay signed a trust-deed in favour of Sir William Dunbar, Mr Peter Hay Paterson (the granter's brother), and Lord Elibank, but as on that day a medical certificate of Mr Hay's mental unsoundness had been obtained, Mr Wilson thought it inexpedient to treat the trust-deed as delivered, and intimated this to Sir William Dunbar, whose view, however, was that it should be acted upon. Mr Wilson retained the deed in his possession as undelivered, in order that the matter might receive further consideration. It was, however, necessary to make arrangements for payments in connection with Mugdrum at the ensuing Martinmas term. Mr Wilson, for this purpose, arranged to open an account with a bank at Newburgh, into which he paid the whole rents collected, and upon which Mr P. H. Paterson operated. Mr Wilson intimated this arrangement to Sir W. Dunbar on 24th November, who then took up the position that these arrangements amounted to a practical setting aside of the trust-deed, and the setting up of a management outside it, and intimated, on 18th December 1873, that in his view the responsibility would rest with those (Mr P. H. Paterson and Mr Wilson) who so acted. Meantime the arrangement by which Mr P. H. Paterson managed the estate continued. In January 1875 it appeared that Mr P. H. Paterson's affairs were embarrassed, and Mr Wilson found it necessary to bring his management to an end in February 1875.

Sir William Dunbar was in July 1875 appointed curator bonis to Mr Balfour Hay. Messrs Wilson & Dunlop acted under him as factors and law-agents. They had not been paid any business account or factors' fees during Mr Paterson's management, nor had they retained such from the rents they collected.

Sir William Dunbar considered that he ought not to pay their charges applicable to that period, on the ground that they were acting without any proper authority in the management of the estate.

In 1878 the affairs of Wilson & Dunlop became embarrassed in consequence of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, in which one of the partners held shares, and they and the individual partners executed a trust-deed in favour of Mr George Todd Chiene, C.A., as trustee.

Sir William raised an action in May 1884 for an accounting by Mr Chiene as trustee for the intromissions of Messrs Wilson & Dunlop with the affairs of Mr Hay between Mrs Paterson's death on 6th September 1873 and his own appointment in July 1875. Mr Chiene maintained in defence that Wilson & Dunlop having accounted for their intromissions to Mr Paterson were not bound to account again to Sir William.

A proof was led, in which the facts already narrated were disclosed.

A remit was thereafter made to an accountant to examine the accounts. Sir William Dunbar maintained before the accountant, inter alia, that no credit should be given to Wilson & Dunlop's trustee in the accounting for their business charges and factors' fees between 6th September 1873 and July 1875.

The accountant rejected this contention and gave the defender credit for these charges, and the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 14th July 1887, repelled objections to his report, and approved thereof subject to taxation of the business accounts and factors' fees as they should be taxed by the Auditor.*

Sir William Dunbar reclaimed. The only point argued which was of general importance was that relating to the question whether the charges of Messrs Wilson & Dunlop for the period between Mrs Paterson's death and the appointment of Sir William Dunbar ought to be allowed.

The defender did not in the Inner-House dispute his liability to account to the curator.

Argued for Sir William Dunbar;—The proof shewed that Wilson & Dunlop had intromitted with the estate under an arrangement of an unreasonable character, in the face of objections from Sir William Dunbar,

* "OPINION.—The first question for consideration upon these reports is whether Messrs Wilson & Dunlop are to be treated as pro-curators, so as to render them liable for omissions and therefore for rents drawn directly by Mr Peter Paterson from the tenants of Mugdrum House and others, and to debar them from claiming remuneration for their professional services.

"I am unable to assent to the pursuer's argument upon this point. I think Mr Wilson and his firm did not assume the character of curators, but acted in the totally different character of factors and agents. They had held that position under the ward and his mother, and continued to hold it after Mr Peter Paterson had assumed the position of a pro-curator. The evidence shews that they were aware, or ought to have been aware, of the defective title of Mr Peter Paterson; and they cannot therefore discharge themselves of their intromissions with the rents by a proof of payments to him, except in so far as the monies paid to him were applied for the benefit of the ward or his estate. But they are not liable for his intromissions with moneys which did not pass through their hands; and I think they are entitled to set off against the pursuer's claims in this action the sums which may be shewn to be due to them for professional services, of which the estate has had the benefit. I can have no doubt that Mr Wilson acted throughout in good faith, and in the interest, as he believed, of the ward. I see no good ground for holding that he thrust himself into a position in which he must be held in law to have acted gratuitously. . . ."

a relative interested in Mr Balfour Hay. The management had been that of Peter Hay Paterson, an unsuitable person, not skilled in business, and acting under no regular appointment whatever. He did not act under the trust-deed, for it was treated as abortive. He was not curator bonis, nor did he even apply for that office. In short, he had no authority at all. It appeared from the proof that, whatever they might have thought of his being one of three trustees, as the trust-deed had contemplated, neither the late Mrs Paterson nor the ward himself ever would have approved of his being in sole management. When he got into difficulties Mr Wilson simply took the matter out of his hands. That shewed that Mr Wilson was not acting as an ordinary law-agent, but as himself the factor. A law-agent acting as factor was not entitled to charge a business account against the estate.[1] The whole actings of Mr P. H. Paterson being unauthorised and incompetent, his agents—if that was the true position of Messrs Wilson & Dunlop—could not charge the estate of Mr Balfour Hay for their services under him.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—The charges were good, and were justly due. They were the charges of the family agent, who had continued to act on the employment of Mr P. H. Paterson, who had assumed the management of the estate in consequence of Mr Balfour Hay's mental condition. The relatives were against judicial management. The trust-deed they had agreed to take had been rendered of, at least, doubtful validity, and there was no better way to take than had been taken. All the relatives, and even Sir William Dunbar himself, had acquiesced in the management of the ward's brother. The accounting shewed that the estate had been the gainer by the services of Wilson & Dunlop. Even on the principle of quantum meruit the remuneration was due.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been fully stated, though not more so than it deserved. I am not disposed to disturb the verdict of the Lord Ordinary now that we have fully heard the whole matter.

The circumstances under which the action is brought are peculiar. I think, having fully examined them, that they are briefly these. The proprietor of Mugdrum—Mr Balfour Hay—had become incapable of transacting his own affairs. The estate had for a long time been in the hands of Messrs Wilson & Dunlop, as factors and agents upon it, and up to 1873 it had been managed by Mrs Paterson, the mother of the proprietor, they acting as her agents. She died in that year, and the question arose as to the future management. A brother of the proprietor, Mr Paterson, took some part in the management, and Messrs Wilson & Dunlop continued to act for a time without direct authority so as to provide for the ensuing term of Martinmas 1873. But that could not go on for ever, and negotiations took place which ended in Mr Hay executing a trust-deed, under which the trustees were to be Mr Paterson, Sir William Dunbar, and another, but in consequence of what transpired afterwards the deed was, by common consent, never acted upon. Sir William Dunbar expressly declined to act upon it, and so from 1873 to 1875 no one had any proper authority to manage the estate. It seems, however, that Mr Paterson assumed that right, and with the acquiescence of the persons who might have had a title to interfere, and in particular with the acquiescence of Sir William Dunbar. Messrs Wilson & Dunlop then continued to act, though it is right to say not without Sir William lodging a caveat to the effect that if they continued to do so troublesome questions might yet arise. From 1873, then, to 1875, there was no authority but Paterson's, and he took on himself to give instructions. But then there occurred circumstances, to which I need not allude, which made it necessary to bring his management to an end, and the result was the appointment of Sir W. Dunbar to take judicial management, and he has brought this process to have a full accounting by Messrs Wilson & Dunlop for their intromissions with the estate.

The accountant has gone fully into the accounts. One source of complaint arises out of a fact mentioned by him in his report, viz., that cheques on the bank account which had been opened in Mr Paterson's name for the estate were not, as they certainly should have been, drawn by Mr Paterson solely for the purposes of the estate and of the ward. That account had been opened by Mr Wilson in Paterson's name for the purposes of the estate and of the ward only, and Mr Wilson paid all the sums collected from the estate into it, but the accountant gives the statement with regard to the operations upon it to which I have referred. Now in that state of matters it was necessary to have an accounting to clear up the affairs of the estate. In saying so, I am far from making any reflections on Messrs Wilson & Dunlop. It might no doubt have gone hardly with them if in the state of the management I have explained funds of the estate had disappeared, but so far as they were concerned, the estate was kept entire, and whatever the operations of Mr Paterson may have been, at all events Messrs Wilson & Dunlop have not caused any loss to the estate, and there is no ground for reflection as to their intromissions. It is, therefore, not necessary to consider what might have been the result of ultroneous, or at at all events not properly authorised acting, if there had been a deficiency.

(His Lordship then referred to two specific objections which had been stated by the pursuer to the view of the accountant, and proceeded)—On the question then whether Wilson & Dunlop were entitled to their remuneration for their business actings, I think that while there are no doubt cases in which questions of the kind have been decided adversely to the agent, the business done here was done in bona fide, and I am clear that these charges should be allowed.

LORD YOUNG.—I also think the interlocutor should be affirmed.

The action is a simple count and reckoning brought by the judicial factor against Wilson & Dunlop to account for their intromissions with Mugdrum during a certain period. Before the Lord Ordinary they said they acted on the employment of Paterson, and having accounted to him were not bound to account over again to the pursuer. If Paterson had had a title to manage the estate, they would have been discharged by accounting to him, and this action would have been excluded. The Lord Ordinary allowed proof to see if that was the state of fact, and he then decided that Paterson had no title to manage, and that they must therefore account to Sir William Dunbar, and so the accounting went on and was remitted to an accountant on the footing that they were to have no credit for rents which they drew, "except in so far as the monies paid to Paterson were applied for the benefit of the ward or his estate." I think that was perfectly right. I put the question early in the debate if it was disputed, and I was told it was not. The accounting then was on that footing, and the plea that Messrs Wilson & Dunlop were sufficiently discharged by having accounted to Paterson was repelled.

On the accounting, so taken, the parties were fully heard before the accountant, and his final report contains his views, and the Lord Ordinary approved of these views.

The curator maintained that Wilson & Dunlop were not entitled to be paid their professional remuneration for their services, and that was the only use made before us of the undoubted fact that during the period of the services in question there was no legal guardian of the ward. There could be no other use made of it when once it had been decided that they were only to have credit in so far as the estate had received the money they had uplifted. On this point I concur entirely with the Lord Ordinary. It may be said that there is no proper guardian yet. The man has not been cognosced. But we are not sticklers for strict procedure in such a matter, and when all those concerned are agreed that a curator bonis should be appointed we appoint one. But short of that, and it is a frequent case, if a man is not able to manage his affairs, and has a relative who is willing to take the responsibility, there are many instances in which, without their coming to the Court, the family agent is consulted, and the management goes on with his assistance. To say that he must be punished because he does not insist on the parties coming to the Court for a proper judicial management is, I think, extravagant. I cannot therefore censure Messrs Wilson & Dunlop because they countenanced the brother in acting in the management of the estate. I cannot say that in anything they did they acted improperly and ought to be punished by having their charges disallowed. It is not in any respect a case of people thrusting themselves forward to act, to whom it may be said that they were not entitled to interfere, and therefore ought not to be remunerated for doing so. They were the family agents acting for the estate, and ought to have the proper charges as allowed by the Auditor. I therefore agree in affirming the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in all that has been said by your Lordship and Lord Young.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—(After referring to the question whether in fact the amount spent on the ward's maintenance has been excessive)—As to the law charges of Messrs Wilson & Dunlop, I am of opinion that they were properly incurred for necessary business of the estate, and that the agents who did this business ought to have the proper remuneration for it as fixed by the Auditor.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the action.

Dec. 22, 1887.
Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co.

"We are to have the power to cancel this contract should our contract for the erection of the bridge be from any cause determined, as provided in our principal contract with the company, upon the condition that we give you three calendar months' previous notice in writing, and supply you with specifications for those three months to keep you fairly employed for that time, and upon the further condition that we will pay to you the contract price for all steel you may complete according to specification at or before the expiry of such notice, whether the steel be delivered or not within that time.

"Further, we undertake to pay you the amount of loss (if any) you may sustain by the cancelment of your contract or materials (pig iron, ores, &c.), which you may have purchased before notice as against this contract. . . .

"The steel to be manufactured at the works of the Steel Company of Scotland (Limited), and deliveries are to be made at such times and in such quantities as we may, from time to time, require, and to extend over four years, unless otherwise specially agreed, or unless the contract be cancelled as already provided, it being understood that we will furnish specifications so that deliveries shall be as nearly as possible made in equal monthly quantities over the period named.

"The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less. Any question that may arise as to the meaning or intent of this contract to be settled, in the case of difference, by the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company for the time being, whose decision shall be binding upon both parties."

Following on this offer and acceptance the Steel Company supplied steel up to 31st May 1887, to the extent of 26,230 tons.

On 28th June 1887 the Steel Company raised an action in the Court of Session against Messrs Tancred, Arrol, & Company, concluding for declarator "that the pursuers are entitled to supply and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge at present being constructed at Queensferry, and that at the prices and subject to the terms and conditions contained in offer by the pursuers, dated 27th February, and acceptance thereof by the defenders, dated 7th March 1883, and the defenders should be decerned to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £100,000 sterling, as the damages due to the pursuers in respect of the defenders having supplied themselves elsewhere with steel needed for the construction of the said bridge."

They averred that the defenders "have been supplying themselves with steel for the purpose of being used in the construction of the said bridge from other sources, over and above the said excepted amount of 12,000 tons, as to which no question is raised. This they may have been doing at prices considerably under the contract prices above mentioned." This 12,000 tons had been already contracted for with other parties when the contract was entered into.

The defenders averred in their statement of facts,—(Stat. 3) "The work contracted to be done by the defenders was, as stated in their contract with the Forth Bridge Railway Company, 'of great magnitude, and of a special, novel, and exceptional character.' The railway company's engineer had full power to alter the plans and specification of the work, and to increase or diminish the quantities; and the limit of time and the estimate of quantity were introduced to limit and explain the general words used at the beginning of the letters." (Stat. 4) "By the custom and practice of the iron and steel trade in Glasgow, as well as elsewhere, a contract for the supply of a quantity of manufactured iron or steel, in which the quantity to be supplied is described as the whole iron or steel which is or may be required for a particular purpose, and which also contains a clause expressing the estimated quantity to be delivered and taken under said contract, is regarded and held to be a contract only for the estimated quantity so expressed. According to the said custom and practice, the contract libelled is a contract for 30,000 tons of steel, more or less. The words 'more or less' in said contract are by the said custom and practice understood to mean, and were intended by the parties to mean, that the quantity delivered should not exceed or fall short of the estimated quantity by more than 5 per cent. The parties have, since the contract was made between them, acted on the footing that if the defenders took 30,000 tons of steel from the pursuers, they might get any extras elsewhere as not being within the contract of the parties. The pursuers have consistently read the contract between them and the defenders in the way contended for by the latter, and when the present questions arose they endeavoured to get the defenders to amplify the contract on the allegation that there was an agreement, subsequent to that now founded on, to take all extra steel from them, however much it might exceed 30,000 tons." (Stat. 5) "In particular, the contract founded on embraced, inter alia, steel rivet bars. These were specified with the view to the defenders manufacturing the rivets themselves at the Forth Bridge works, but they subsequently found that it would be more convenient to buy them in a manufactured form. They accordingly, on or about 12th September 1884, ordered 700 tons of steel rivets from the Clyde rivet works, providing in their contract that the steel should be obtained from one of two makers, viz., the pursuers or D. Colville & Sons, Motherwell. The Clyde Rivet Company accordingly purchased steel for making said rivets from the pursuers at the market rate then current, which was much lower than the rate in said contract. This steel was tested at the pursuers' works on behalf of the defenders, and the pursuers were well aware that the rivets to be made from it were for use at the Forth Bridge. The pursuers' manager at first objected to what was being done, on the ground that this steel fell within the contract in question. The defenders, however, informed the pursuers that 30,000 tons of steel would be taken under the contract, and that being so, that the contract would be satisfied. This view was acquiesced in by the pursuers, and the steel was sold to the Clyde Rivet Company as before mentioned. Subsequently the following additional quantities of steel were purchased by the defenders from the Clyde Rivet Works Company, viz.:—

March 25, 1886—500 tons @ £6, 5s., less 5 per cent.
Jany. 24, 1887—250 „ £6, 10s., less 5 per cent.

All the said steel was purchased by the Clyde Rivet Works Company from the pursuers, who were quite aware that it was intended for use in the construction of the Forth Bridge Railway. The steel was tested at pursuers' works on behalf of the defenders."

In articles 6-9 the defenders averred other cases of purchases of steel from companies other than the pursuers' with the acquiescence of the pursuers.

They averred further,—(Stat. 9) "The defenders have always been ready and willing to implement the contract between the pursuers and them. They commenced to the work of constructing the Forth Bridge as soon as was possible after the completion of the contract in question, and commenced to order deliveries of steel from the pursuers in terms of the contract, but the pursuers repeatedly failed to make deliveries timeously, and the defenders were put to loss and inconvenience by such failure, and they repeatedly remonstrated with the pursuers for not forwarding steel timeously, so as to enable the work at the bridge to proceed regularly. They would have taken from pursuers by 7th March 1887 not less than 32,000 tons of steel, but for delay on the pursuers' part in giving delivery. The period of the duration of the contract expired on said last-mentioned date. At no time did the pursuers complain of deliveries not being specified or ordered by the defenders in terms of the contract, but acquiesced in the orders as given by the defenders, and, as above explained, failed to overtake even these orders in due time. By the contract founded on by the pursuers all questions between the parties are to be referred to the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company for the time being. The defenders hereby offer to take from pursuers not less than 32,000 tons as aforesaid, and also offer to take from them all such steel for such purposes and at such times as the engineer shall consider the pursuers under the said contract have right to supply."

They further averred that Sir John Fowler was "the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company" at the date of the contract, and that he was so still. This was admitted.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers being able and willing to supply the whole of the steel required for the construction of the Forth Bridge other than the 12,000 tons excepted as aforesaid, the defenders are bound to take the same from the pursuers in terms of the contract constituted by said offer and acceptance. (2) The defenders having committed a breach of said contract, are liable in damages to the pursuers. (3) The facts averred by the defenders, et separatim, the averment as to custom in statement 4, are not relevant to be admitted to probation.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) This action is excluded in respect that the questions raised herein, and in particular the questions how far and under what circumstances the defenders are bound to take further supplies of steel from the pursuers, fall to be determined by the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company, as arbiter under the contract between the parties; in any view, these questions fall to be remitted to the said arbiter. (5) The pursuers are debarred by their own actings under the said contract, and by rei interventus, from maintaining the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (6) On a sound construction of the contract of parties the pursuers were not thereby bound to deliver to the defenders, nor the defenders to take from the pursuers, more than 30,000 tons of steel, more or less, for use in the construction of the Forth Bridge. (7) According to the custom and practice of the iron and steel trade, as well as on a reasonable construction of the words of the contract, the expression, 30,000 tons, more or less, does not cover more than 5 per cent of variation on either side from the specified number of tons. (8) The period during which, according to the contract of parties, deliveries of steel were to be made having expired, the declaratory conclusions of the summons ought to be refused.

On 26th November 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defenders: Before answer, allows to the defenders a proof of their averments contained in their statement of facts Nos. 4 to 9 inclusive, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation, said proof to proceed on a day to be afterwards fixed."

The defenders reclaimed.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) It was admitted that in a reference clause the arbiter must be named, where disputes which might in the future arise were to be sent to reference. Here, however, there was an equivalent for the nomination of the arbiter. Sir John Fowler was "the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company" at the date of the contract, and was so still. He was the person chosen at the time, and so long as he filled the position of engineer to the railway company the rule of law that there must be a delectus personæ was satisfied. The rule that the arbiter must be named had suffered some relaxation,[1] and where a specific individual was so clearly pointed at, if further relaxation was required it should be made. If, as in Bremner's case, a body of persons might effectually be named there was no reason why a person holding an office should not also be named. The dispute here was executorial of the contract, and therefore the nomination of a particular arbiter was not required.[2] (2) The contract here was not clear without proof as to the custom of the trade. A custom quite different from the ex facie meaning of the words was alleged, a custom which amounted to an unspecified term adjected to the words of the contract. The contract was not about a species—the whole steel required,—but about a quantity, viz., a margin of 5 per cent or thereby over or under the specified amount, 30,000 tons. (3) The averments in articles 5-9 of the defenders' statement of facts would, if proved, amount to a positive bar against the pursuers claiming their full right under the contract. They shewed that the pursuers knew the defenders were departing from what was said to be the strict reading of the contract, and had acquiesced in that departure.

Argued for the respondents;—The dispute here was not on a matter of fact as in Merry & Cuninghame's case. It was a dispute purely on the legal effect of the contract, and not in any way ancillary to or executorial of it. The contract need not stop until this question was settled. The pursuers did not ask for interdict. The rule was absolute that where disputes which might arise under a contract were referred to arbitration the arbiter must be named.[3] The case of Bremner (Elgin Lunacy Board) did not alter the rule. The decision there proceeded on the fact that the dispute in question had already arisen at the date of the contract, and the reference, which was to a "society," was treated as being to a single named referee. (2) The averment as to the custom of trade was not relevant to go to proof. Proof of custom was only allowed in a contract of this kind when there were technical words to explain,[4] or where it was offered to prove that the custom added an unexpressed term to the contract. The English cases afforded no analogy, as the Courts of that country had gone much further in allowing proof than the Court of Session.[5] The defenders themselves acknowledged that the work to be done was "novel," and therefore no usage of trade could apply. The mention of 30,000 tons in the offer was simply an estimate, and was necessary in a contract of such magnitude. The contract was one to sell all the steel required. The quantity was to be defined by the requirements of the defenders.[6] With regard to the averments as to the actings of parties, there was no case in which proof of the kind proposed had been allowed with a view to controlling a written contract. The argument on that point could only come to this, that the reclaimers had not insisted in their rights before the full quantity of the estimate had been delivered.

At advising,—

Lord President.—The first question under this reclaiming note is raised by the first plea in law for the defender, which is to the effect that the dispute between the parties falls to be settled by arbitration. The contract is for the supply of the steel required for building the Forth Bridge, and the clause referred to as being a good reference of the dispute is in these terms:—"Any question that may arise as to the meaning or intent of this contract to be settled in the case of difference by the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company for the time being, whose decision shall be binding upon both parties." No person is named in the clause, and the only description of the referee is that he is to be "the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company for the time being."

The dispute which has arisen is whether the contractors, the Steel Company of Scotland are entitled to supply the whole steel required for the bridge, and that depends on the words of the contract itself. If the reference is good otherwise, the dispute, I think, falls under the general description of questions which are to be referred to arbitration.

The objection to the clause of reference is that no referee is named, and that, therefore, there is not such delectus personæ as the law of Scotland requires. The reference is not one of a dispute already come into existence when the contract was made, but of all disputes "that may arise" as to the meaning of the contract. Now, I hold this to be a point which is entirely settled by authority, and I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defenders' first plea in law must be repelled.

What may be called the leading case on this point is the case of Buchanan v. Muirhead, June 25, 1799, M. 14,593, which was decided in 1799. That was an unanimous decision of the Court, and it must not be forgotten that the Court was at that time very strong,—the Court of which we all know so much in the history of the law of Scotland as being presided over by Sir Ilay Campbell. In that case the reference was to the "chairman, deputy-chairman, and secretary for the time being of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufacturers of the city of Glasgow," and the subject of the reference was of "all disputes relating to the affairs of the company, which should arise among the partners,"—that is, of the partnership constituted by the contract. In that case as here the clause of reference occurred in a contract, and the matters which were referred were disputes which might arise. Now, the Chamber of Commerce or any of its members were probably very well fitted to determine such questions as might arise, but still the reference was held to be bad. The ground on which that judgment proceeded is thus stated:—"The case does not hinge upon the supposed difference between an obligation to enter into submission and an actual reference. The difficulty in supporting the plea of the defender arises from the reference being not to an individual but to a description of persons who as well as the point to be decided must necessarily have been indefinite at the date of the contract." That seems to me to express perfectly accurately and precisely the grounds on which such a reference ought not to be sustained. It is unnecessary to investigate the subsequent authorities. They are very numerous, and have all been made the subject of judicial decision within the last few years, but perhaps the most authoritative statement of the law is to be found in the judgment of Lord Chancellor Cairns in the case of the Elgin Lunacy Board v. Bremner, 24th June 1875, 2 R. (H. L.) 136. The reference in that case was sustained, being of a different kind from that which we have here, but dealing with the general principle the Lord Chancellor said,—"Your Lordships have heard an elaborate argument to shew that in Scotland there must, as regards the arbiters, be a delectus personæ; and you were referred to authorities which shew that where there is a contract beforehand to refer to the arbitration of individuals not named, or of individuals filling an official position, or of individuals composing a fluctuating body, and where therefore at the time the contract is made to refer to arbitration future disputes which may not arise for years there can be no delectus personæ, there a contract of that kind cannot be urged and founded on to oust the regular jurisdiction of the Courts of law. I should be sorry to express any opinion adverse to those decisions, or tending to throw any doubt upon the propriety of those decisions." He then goes on to say that that principle does not apply to the case then before the House. I think therefore that the matter here is entirely closed by authority, and that the Lord Ordinary had no choice but to sustain the objection to the reference.

An argument was founded on the circumstance that the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company at the time at which the contract was entered into happens to be the same person who now fills that position, and it was thence argued that there was in effect a delectus personæ. But we cannot judge of the competency of the reference by what has happened since; we must look at it as at the time it was entered into, and at that time it was just as uncertain whether and when any dispute would arise as it was who would be the engineer of the company at the time if any such dispute did arise. That matter makes to my mind no difference whatever in the case.

The only other point of any difficulty in the case is that raised by the defenders' averments in statement 4. The Lord Ordinary has admitted those statements to probation, and on that point I am sorry I cannot agree with him.

That statement is to the effect that by the custom of trade, and of the particular trade in question, a contract such as we have here is understood to mean something different from what is expressed in the contract.

The dispute, as I have said, is whether the pursuers are entitled to supply the whole steel required for the Forth Bridge. The contract is very express on the subject. The offer is in these terms:—"Gentlemen,—We hereby offer to supply the whole of the steel required by you for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained, at the following prices, viz."

The acceptance is:—"Gentlemen,—We hereby accept your offer, dated 7th February, to supply the whole of the steel required by us for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained, at the following prices, viz."

The 12,000 tons of plates, it is explained, had already been contracted for with different companies other than the pursuers', and therefore it was necessary to except that portion from the general description. That exception only makes the language of the contract more distinct and conclusive as to the extent of the subject to be supplied. It is "the whole steel," subject to an exception. No doubt in another part of the contract the pursuers are informed what is the estimate of the parties contracting with them, as to the amount of steel which would be required. "The estimated quantity of the steel, we understand, is

No. 45.

Dec. 22, 1887.
Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co.

30,000 tons, more or less." It is contended that that limits the supply to 30,000 tons, but that is, in my opinion, quite inadmissible. The supply required was very large, and the defenders themselves inform us in their statement of facts that the work contracted to be done is of "great magnitude, and of a special, novel, and exceptional character," and "the railway company's engineer had full power to alter the plans and specification of the work, and to increase or diminish the quantities." That seems to me to afford a very good reason why the pursuers would require to be informed what was a probable estimate of the amount of steel required, because they had to make arrangements so as to be ready to give a supply from time to time, and therefore I think an estimate was almost indispensable. If there were to be any doubt as to the sort of quantity which would be required, the pursuers might have been put to great disadvantage, and have had demands made on them at times and for quantities which no one could expect to be asked for on a short notice. That is the reason why we find an estimate in the contract.

I find, therefore, no difficulty in construing this contract without extraneous aid, but the defender says that it means something different, his statement being,—(Stat. 4) "By the custom and practice of the iron and steel trade in Glasgow, as well as elsewhere, a contract for the supply of a quantity of manufactured iron or steel, in which the quantity to be supplied is described as the whole iron or steel which is or may be required for a particular purpose, and which also contains a clause expressing the estimated quantity to be delivered and taken under said contract, is regarded and held to be a contract only for the estimated quantity so expressed." I think that it is not admissible to send that averment to probation, because it is irrelevant. It is an attempt to set up a custom to contradict the plain and unambiguous terms of the contract. There are no technical words in the contract; it is not alleged that the words "whole of the steel required by you" are technical. They are used in their ordinary sense, and therefore it is impossible to admit evidence of custom to contradict the plain words of the contract on any such ground. It is said, however, that custom may be proved to shew that something else is implied in the contract beyond what is expressed,—that is, that it is a condition of every such contract that the part of the contractor is only to supply the estimated quantity. That is, I think, only a disguising of the same object as I have already adverted to in different words. The doctrine on which this rests is very well settled, so well that it is almost needless to cite any cases upon it. They are, however, very well summed up in Dickson on Evidence (Grierson's edition) at par. 1095 (2d edition, sec. 234). I cannot, I think, do better than quote his words. He is speaking of mercantile contracts in especial,—"Unless the terms of the writing are technical, the evidence of mercantile men will not be admitted to explain it, because the construction of a written contract is for the Court, not for the jury. And if the writing is so copious and precise in its stipulations as to shew that it is a record of the whole agreement relating to the point in issue, and not merely a statement of some of its heads, the rest being left to usage of trade, the Court will give effect to the agreement as recorded, and will not allow stipulations to be added to it by a proof of usage. The sphere of this kind of evidence is therefore limited to interpreting any technical words in the document, and supplying any customary conditions which the parties may be presumed to have tacitly agreed to." He adds in the following section, and it is no unnecessary precaution, quoting the opinion of Lord Jus-

Steel Company of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co.

Justice-Clerk Hope in Mackenzie v. Dunlop, 16 D. 129, aff. 1856, 3 Macq. 22,[1]—"There can be no doubt that we have never in Scotland gone so far as they have done in England in admitting evidence of understanding or usage in order to construe thereby a written document." And Mr Dickson adds,—"Nor does there seem to be any reason for abandoning our own principles for the more lax rules of English law; since among the Judges and text writers of that country there is a strong feeling towards limiting the admission of this kind of proof." In the last sentence he refers to the tendency of some of the more recent judgments in the Courts of England. I have therefore no doubt that applying these doctrines the averments in ans. 4, so far as they relate to custom, cannot be remitted to probation.

But the Lord Ordinary has further allowed a proof of the defenders' averments in arts. 5-9 of their statement of facts. The import of those articles is that in their execution of this contract the pursuers have abandoned their position that they were entitled to supply the whole steel required for the bridge, and that they have submitted to see the material supplied by other companies, and also have agreed to supply it themselves, either directly or indirectly, to other persons by special arrangement at the current price of the day, instead of at the contract price. I can quite understand that a person having such a contract as this may still so comport himself in the execution of it as to bar himself from insisting in the full terms of the contract, and if these statements are established, the pursuer will probably be barred from insisting in his present claim. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, except in so far as it allows proof of the averments relating to custom in art. 4 of the defenders' statement.

LORD MURE.—On the first point here raised, viz., the validity of the reference, I quite concur. As your Lordship has remarked, it has been settled, ever since the case of Buchanan (M. 14,593), that a reference to an unnamed party is bad, and that having been for so long settled I am rather surprised that parties should go on framing clauses of reference in that way, apparently without consulting their legal adviser, who would have told them that such a reference was not a binding submission according to the law of Scotland.

On the second question I am of opinion that the averments in the defenders' statements, 5-9, ought to be sent to proof; but I agree that the defenders ought not to be allowed a proof of their allegations as to custom of trade in their 4th statement, even as amended. For it has also, as I conceive, been deliberately settled, not so far back as the date of Buchanan's case, but since 1826, that you cannot cut down the language of a written contract by proving a usage of trade to the contrary, unless there are words of technical import used in the contract which require explanation. But there are no words of that description here, and what we have to consider is simply whether evidence of an alleged custom or usage can be admitted to prove that the plain words of a contract ought to bear a different meaning from that which the words import. In addition to the authorities referred to by your Lordship I may mention the case of Gordon of Cluny v. Robertson (May 19, 1826, 2 W. and S. 115), in which the decision of this Court giving effect to custom as sufficient to controvert the words of a deed was reversed by the House of Lords. The case being one of importance, the whole Court here were consulted, and with the exception of Lord Cringletie, held that the words used in a lease relative to the consumption of fodder upon a farm might be controlled by an admitted custom or usage to a contrary effect. But that decision was reversed by the House of Lords, and shews, I think, that proof of an alleged custom such as that here proposed ought not to be allowed.

In the notes to the later editions of Dickson on Evidence it is wrongly stated that this judgment was reversed in the House of Lords. The judgment was affirmed on the ground that the evidence of usage was insufficient.

Lord Adam.—It is quite settled in the law of Scotland that an obligation in a contract to refer ab ante possible or contingent questions to a person unknown is not valid. There are numerous cases to that effect. This clause is exactly in that position. The reference is to "the engineer of the Forth Bridge Railway Company for the time being." At the date of the contract no one knew who the engineer might be when a dispute might arise, and therefore the clause falls under the ordinary rule. I have no doubt whatever on that point.

The second question is quite different; it is, Whether we are to admit to proof an alleged custom of trade? According to my understanding of the law such a proof is only admissible either to explain technical terms, whether those terms are ex facie technical or are raised into that position by averment, or where it is proposed to add to the contract an unexpressed term with reference to which it is offered to be shewn that the parties contracted. Neither of these things are present here. There are no technical terms used, and it is not proposed to add any unexpressed term to the contract. This, then, is simply, in my opinion, an offer to prove a custom for the purpose of enabling the Court to interpret the plain untechnical words of the written contract. Such a course is inadmissible. It is the duty of the Court to interpret the words of the contract, but I have not at this stage applied my mind to that question, and only say that there are no words here which require a proof of custom of trade to interpret them.

With reference to the proof of the defenders' averments in arts. 5-8 of their statement, I concur.

Lord Shand was absent.

> The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Alter said interlocutor in so far as it allows a proof of the averments of custom and practice of trade contained in the fourth article of the defenders' statement of facts: Quoad ultra adhere to said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed," &c.

Sutherland v. Taylor.

ANN SUTHERLAND, Petitioner.—Craigie.
J. TAYLOR, Respondent.—Salvesen.

Parent and Child—Custody of illegitimate child—Mother's right to custody.—The mother of an illegitimate child gave the child over when two months old to a stranger and his wife to adopt, on the agreement that they should bring it up as their own "in all time coming." Eighteen months afterwards the mother presented a petition to the Court praying for the custody of the child. It was proved that the mother had no settled place of abode and no means of supporting the child, and a medical certificate was produced to the effect that the child was in a very delicate state of health and shewed symptoms of dangerous disease, and that it was "very essential that she should have (as she has at present) generous diet, warm clothing, and careful nursing, otherwise her bodily condition would certainly deteriorate, and her health and life be seriously endangered." It was further proved that the child was well attended to and had careful nursing in its present home. Held that while the mother was the only person who had a legal title to the custody of the child the Court were bound to consider the interests of the latter in any question as to its custody, and that in the present case the petition should be refused.

B.

On 21st March 1886 Ann Sutherland gave birth to an illegitimate female child. In May following, Mr Taylor and his wife, who had no family, advertised for a child to adopt, and Sutherland wrote asking Mr Taylor to call upon her. It was agreed that he should take the immediate custody of the child and adopt it permanently as his own. She paid him £100 for the maintenance of the child,—a sum which was furnished by the reputed father of the child, and Taylor gave her a written acknowledgment that he would maintain and bring up the child respectably as his own and at his own expense "in all time coming." On 9th June following, the child was baptised.

On 3d November 1887, Sutherland presented a petition to the First Division of the Court, asking for the custody of the child.

Taylor in his answers stated the above-mentioned facts, and he further averred:—"The child has been and is now extremely delicate in bodily health. In consequence it has not been able yet to be vaccinated. The doctor who has attended the child on 8th November 1887 granted a certificate in the following terms:—'I have attended Ethel Kate Sutherland since July 22d 1886 up to the present date. When I saw her at first she was in poor condition, and had a rash on some parts of her body. I have treated her all along for congenital syphilis, and she has much improved under the treatment adopted. The child has been frequently under my observation, and I have always noticed that she has been well fed, well and warmly clothed, and has had all the care and attention that could be given to a child. She is at present suffering from bronchial catarrh, and could not be safely removed from her present home yet for two weeks. GEORGE GUTHRIE, M.B., C.M.' Since the respondent got the custody of the child, the petitioner has not had anything to do with it, and has not manifested the slightest interest in it. . . . The respondent has ascertained, and now avers, that the petitioner is living in an attic in Rose Street; she has no visible means of supporting herself, and has no means to support the child, far less to provide it with the clothing, medicine, and other things essential for the preservation of its life and health in its present extremely delicate condition. It is believed and averred that it would be against the child's moral well-being if the petitioner had the custody of it."

On 26th November 1887, the Court pronounced an interlocutor appointing the petitioner to state in a minute her places of residence at and since the birth of the child, her occupation and means of subsistence during the same period, and what provision she proposed to make for the custody and maintenance of the child if delivered to her.

In obedience to that interlocutor she put in a minute, mentioning various places in Edinburgh in which she had resided, part of the time in service, and further stating that she had returned from her father's house in Aberdeenshire to her present abode in Rose Street, the object of her doing so being to get delivery of her child. "She also begs to state (1) that during the period she remained at 11A Hanover Street, Edinburgh, she was able to live in every comfort, the father of her child contributing whatever was necessary for her and her child's support and comfort, and her own relatives being also able and willing to give her any assistance if she required any; (2) that while she was at home she lived in family with her father; (3) that while she was in employment at Comely Bank she had her wages and board; and (4) that since her return to Edinburgh in August 1887 the father of her child has supplied her with funds, and her own relatives have also assisted her. The petitioner has also some means of her own. She succeeded about two years ago to part of the estate of a deceased aunt, and she has allowed her means to remain in her father's hands. The petitioner has learned the business or trade of a dressmaker, and could, if necessary, go into business for herself, or get employment as a dressmaker.

"The petitioner is quite ready and prepared to do whatever may be considered best for the physical and moral well-being of her child. Her present home at 77 Rose Street is perfectly comfortable. It is not squalid or disagreeable either in itself or its surroundings. If, however, the petitioner's present residence is considered to be unsuitable for the child, she is quite ready and prepared to change her residence to any place which may be considered more suitable, or to go and live with her father. The child's father, as well as the petitioner's father and other relatives, are ready to contribute whatever may be necessary for the support of the petitioner and her child, in addition to what she takes from her own means for that purpose. The petitioner's father is able and willing to support her and her child in his own house, or elsewhere."

In answer to that minute the respondent stated, inter alia, that the place where the petitioner was now living was squalid and unhealthy, and that the yearly rent was only £3; that her mother was dead, and that her father was a tenant crofter with a farm of from only thirty to forty acres in extent, his rent being £30 per annum; that he had married a second wife, who was still alive, and that he had seven of a family, five of them being the offspring of the second marriage, and residing with him.

It appeared that the statement made by the petitioner that she had succeeded to certain means from an aunt was erroneous, and that it was from two uncles, and not from an aunt, that the alleged succession had come, but that no further information as to the amount or nature of the bequest could be obtained from her. The reputed father of the child was ascertained to have gone abroad in bad health.

A further letter from Dr Guthrie was produced, in which he stated that the child was still in a very poor state of health, but that "she has much improved under the treatment adopted, combined with the good food and careful attention and nursing she has received. . . . The manifestation of further symptoms depends much upon the health of the child, and it is very essential that she should have (as she has at present) generous diet, warm clothing, and careful nursing, otherwise her bodily condition would certainly deteriorate, and her health and life be seriously endangered."

Argued for the petitioner;—The agreement of May 1886 between her and the respondent could last only during her pleasure. A mother could not deprive herself of the right to the custody of her illegitimate child. This case was a fortiori of that of Macpherson,[1] because there the respondent was the putative father of the child. No relevant answer was made to the petitioner's claim. It had been held in England that even where a mother was admittedly living an immoral life she must have the custody of her child, or rather she might have her child for the purpose of handing it over to a third party.[1] Inquiry in the case was incompetent, or at least inexpedient.[2]

[1] Macpherson v. Leishman, June 4, 1887, 14 R. 780; cf. also Buie v. Steven, Dec. 5, 1863, 2 Macph. 208 (L. J.-C. Inglis, p. 222).

The respondent argued;—There were two points of distinction between this and Macpherson's case.[3] In the first place, here the agreement was in terms a permanent one. A permanent arrangement, when made, ought to be given effect to. There was no illegality in it. And in the second place, the mother was not a proper custodier of her child. It would be deleterious to the physical as well as to the moral welfare of the child to transfer it to the petitioner. If a disreputable parent were allowed to recall an agreement like that which had been made here, it would come to be used as a means of extortion. If the agreement were binding on the respondent, it must be so also on the petitioner. The principle which applied in the case of legitimate children was applicable here also;[4] and the mother's character was always taken into consideration by the Court in questions relating to the custody of children. The Court had ordained mothers to part with the custody of their children; much more would they refuse this petition when there were allegations against the mother, and none against the respondent. The interests of the child were of paramount importance,[5] and no provision was here proposed by the petitioner for the future maintenance of the child. The respondent had no interest but that of the future welfare of the child.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition by the mother of an illegitimate child for the delivery of the child into her custody. No one can doubt that the petitioner has the only true legal title to the custody of the child. An illegitimate child has no father, and for this reason it is that the mother alone is entitled to its custody and control. In this case, too, the child is very young—it was born on the 21st March 1886—so that in addition to her legal title, the mother is also the natural custodier of a child of that early age. Prima facie, then, everything is in favour of the petitioner's claim. But in questions relating to the custody of children there are other considerations which the Court must keep in view beyond the question of the mere legal title to the custody. The Court have always considered as of paramount importance the interests of the child itself, particularly in regard to its health, its future prospects, and its moral education.

This is a very peculiar case in some of its aspects, and one is induced to inquire how the mother came to part with the custody of her child. This leads one into a somewhat strange history. The mother delivered over the child to the respondent and his wife when it was two months old, and before it was baptised. This was done under an arrangement that the respondent and his wife were to adopt the child as their own, they being childless, and that the child was to remain permanently with them, the petitioner not being in a condition to support the child, and being apparently very willing to be quit of it.

Sutherland v. Taylor.

The child was in very delicate health from causes of a painful nature, and it is not disputed that while with the respondent it has received very careful attention.

The question therefore is, whether it is consistent with the welfare and interests of the child, and particularly with its health and chances of life, that it be given over to its natural and legal custodier or not. With the answers for the respondent, we have had presented to us a medical certificate from a gentleman who has for some time attended professionally in the respondent's family, and which, therefore, is of peculiar value. He says of the child upon the 8th November,—"When I saw her at first she was in poor condition, and had a rash on some parts of her body. I have treated her all along for congenital syphilis, and she has much improved under the treatment adopted. The child has been frequently under my observation, and I have always noticed that she has been well fed, well and warmly clothed, and has had all the care and attention that could be given to a child. She is at present suffering from bronchial catarrh, and could not be safely removed from her present home yet for two weeks."

This and other circumstances which came out at the first hearing of the case induced the Court to order the pursuer to give in a minute stating her present place of abode, and where she had lodged during the time between the birth of the child and the presenting of the petition, and also what her means of subsistence were. A minute has been put in, which only discloses that the petitioner has been leading a somewhat wandering and restless life, and that she has no apparent means for maintaining or taking charge of so delicate a child—with this exception, that she stated that she had lately succeeded to some money from an aunt. The amount of this legacy was not stated, but from her place of abode and present mode of living, and her whole surroundings, she is evidently not in a condition to keep such a child in comfort and safety. Since then it has transpired from correspondence which has taken place between the agents for the parties, that there was some mistake in the statement in the minute, and that in place of getting money from an aunt the money came not from an aunt but from two uncles. Although asked to explain this, she has refused further explanation of any kind, and therefore we are safe in assuming that this alleged succession is quite a delusion, and that the pursuer is in very straitened circumstances, and little capable of bearing an additional burden upon her resources. This bears out still further the fact of her unfitness to take care of the child. It is perhaps fortunate that we have a still later certificate from the same medical gentleman, bringing down his opinion to the 24th of November, in which he says that the present condition and health of the child is fairly good, but he mentions several dangerous and unpleasant symptoms. The report proceeds thus,—"The manifestation of further symptoms depends much upon the health of the child, and it is very essential that she should have (as she has at present) generous diet, warm clothing, and careful nursing, otherwise her bodily condition would certainly deteriorate, and her health and life be seriously endangered."

I think we thus have sufficient materials before us to lead us to the conclusion that if the child were handed over by the respondent to the petitioner, it could not get "generous diet, warm clothing, and careful nursing." On these grounds, then, to deliver over the child to the petitioner would be to imperil its life, or certainly to very seriously endanger its health, and I therefore think that there are good and sufficient reasons here which overcome the legal title of the petitioner. The interests of the child are sufficient to warrant us in declining to give effect to the present petition.

I am therefore for refusing the prayer of the petitioner.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. As your Lordship has remarked, the case is a very peculiar one. By an arrangement between the petitioner and the reputed father of the child it was delivered over to the respondent, upon his undertaking for a certain consideration, to adopt it, and a sum of money, amounting to £100, was provided for that purpose. That arrangement has been quite satisfactory in all respects, and the child appears to have been thoroughly well cared for by the respondent, who has, as I have said, been paid for its upbringing. The question is whether that arrangement is now to be put an end to, on the ground that the mother is the legal custodier of her illegitimate child. In ordinary cases, no doubt, the title of the mother would be conclusive, but, on the other hand, the Court is bound to look to the interests of the child, and I am satisfied that in the present case to transfer the custody from the respondent to the mother would be to imperil its life. The second certificate which is before us is very important, and cannot be disregarded. Accordingly, in the special circumstances of the case, I agree with your Lordship.

LORD ADAM.—There is no doubt that the petitioner—the mother—is the only person who has a legal title to the custody of her child, and looking to the age of the child there is no doubt that she is also the natural person to whom the custody and guardianship of the child ought to be given. Nothing but a very strong case can overcome this natural right. But I think we have such a case here. I think the medical certificate shews that to hand over the child under present circumstances to the petitioner would endanger and imperil its health. The health of the child is of paramount importance, and on that ground I concur with your Lordship that the petition must be refused.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

MRS ANN GARDINER OR GOULD, Defender.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion.—It is not an answer to a husband's action of divorce on account of his wife's desertion, that she has left him because he had superseded her in the management of a shop belonging to him.

2D DIVISION.
Lord M'Laren.
I.

ON 7th March 1887, Isaac Gould, baker, Markinch, brought an action against his wife for divorce on the ground of desertion.

The action was undefended.

The following is the result of the evidence led at the proof:—

The pursuer deponed,—"I was married to the defender on 25th December 1860. . . . At that date I had two daughters by a former marriage staying with me. They were then six or seven years of age. The defender treated them very badly. The elder died in 1867, and the younger ultimately left the house on account of the defender's bad treatment. . . . The defender had a fearfully wild temper. She was very easily excited. She struck me many a time. After our marriage the defender attended at the counter of my shop. I was not satisfied with the drawings while she did so, as I was gradually getting into an unsatisfactory condition financially. I frequently spoke to the defender regarding the shortcomings. In reply, she told me to better myself if I could. I ultimately sent for my daughter who was then in service in England. She came, but did not reside in my house; she resided with her aunt next door, and did not interfere with my house. I noticed that my drawings immediately improved after my daughter came to the shop. The defender frequently left me before 1875 for periods of three or four months at a time. She had a son at the sea, and when he came home she went very often to London to stay with him. (Q.) You objected to her going from home? (A.) I had no objections to her going away for a short time, but there was no necessity for her staying away for four months, when a week might have done. When I remonstrated with her, she told me to better myself if I could. . . . The defender left me finally in March or April 1875. The cause of her leaving me was my bringing my daughter home to attend the shop; my wife did not remain with me for more than a fortnight or three weeks after that. My wife removed everything in the house belonging to her when she went away." By the Court.—"(Q.) That must have been with your consent? (A.) She would take it whether I would or not. I was not going to fight with her. She had a marriage-contract entitling her to retain all her own property." Examination continued—". . . I remonstrated with my wife for going away, and told her to stay, but she said she would go in spite of me. I have seen her once or twice since then. She called on me on one occasion a month or two after she left. That was for the purpose of looking over the house to see if there was anything remaining. I had been kind to the defender while she stayed with me. She was never in want of money for domestic purposes. There have been no children of the marriage between the defender and me. At the time of our marriage she was about forty years of age. I believe the defender has been living in Cupar-Fife since she left me. I have not spoken to her, except on the one occasion, since 1875."

The defender deponed:—"I left the pursuer for his ill-usage of me—coming home at untimeous hours, and his falsehoods. He said I struck him. That is not true. He came one night and threatened me, and I told him that if he offered to put a hand upon me I would take the poker to him, supposing I was put in Cupar jail for it, but I never struck him. (Q.) When you left him, had you formed any intention not to return? (A.) He never asked me. I don't know what I would have done if he had asked me; it would just have depended upon circumstances. I wrote to his agent that I wished I had never seen his face, and did not care if I never saw it again. The letter now shewn me is my letter. I have never offered to go back. (Q.) Are you now willing to go back and stay with him? (A.) It just depends on how he would treat me. I have passed him in Markinch since I left him. He said it was a fine day. I don't think I made any answer. I never tried to avoid him." By the Court.—"I kept pursuer's shop for a great many years. He was in difficulties when I married him, and I gave him £48 when my mother died, which he was to pay me back, and I got £18. I attended to the shop, gave out the bread, took the money and put it in the till, and never heard a word about robbing the till until after I left him. (Q.) What was the occasion of his daughter coming back to her father's house? (A.) I told him to get some person to keep his shop, for I could not live with him.

It is not true that I left him because he had deprived me of the charge of the shop; it was on account of his ill-usage. He said I had robbed the till, and was ill to his children. . . . There is no foundation for these charges." By pursuer's counsel.—"A man named James Drummond came to my house on one occasion. He did not bring a message asking me to return to my husband."

Drummond deponed,—"I remember defender leaving pursuer in 1875. He was very anxious that she should come back to his house again, and a few months after she left I went, at his request, and saw her, and told her that he wished her to return to stay with him. She said No."

On 9th July 1887 the Lord Ordinary (M'Laren) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove facts and circumstances relevant to infer that the defender had wilfully and maliciously deserted him for four years and upwards previous to the raising of the present action; therefore dismisses the action; and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—If it were possible to deal with consistorial cases in the way that all other cases are dealt with, by giving effect to what both parties desire, I should have very little difficulty in dealing with this case; but that is not the mode in which the law prescribes that actions of divorce shall be considered. It is nothing to the purpose that both parties may be willing to be divorced. I must consider whether there were grounds for divorce commencing at the time when separation de facto took place, and continued during the statutory period of four years. Now, according to the pursuer's own statement, he had allowed his wife to take charge of the shop that he kept as a baker during the whole period of their married cohabitation, and I can hardly think that there can be any real foundation for his complaint against her of pilfering money without his knowledge, because that could not have gone on for fifteen years without being found out, or some action being taken by him upon it. But after fifteen years' service as manager of his shop, he, whether upon communication with her or without communication—she says without communication to her—of his reasons, sent for his daughter and deposed his wife from her position as manager of the shop, and put his daughter in her place. She not unnaturally resented this conduct, and left his house. She would not consent to remain there in a subordinate position to her step-daughter. She now says that she knew nothing of this charge of pilfering until afterwards, which is very likely quite true, but she knew that her step-daughter was coming there, and she now says—and this raises the only conflict of evidence in the case—that she was quite willing his daughter should come to take her place, because she was no longer able to work in the shop. But I think I must take the pursuer's own statement, as if not necessarily the more reliable one, at least the one by which he is bound, and it is that he had superseded his wife in the charge of the shop, and that in consequence of that she left him. Well, it may be that she was not entitled to leave him on that ground, but certainly it is a ground that one must have a very considerable sympathy with, and I can hardly look upon her leaving in such circumstances as a deliberate act of desertion. Well, then, according to the law of divorce, the desertion must be continued notwithstanding the remonstrances of the other spouse, and in opposition to his or her wishes; but I have no sufficient evidence that Mrs Gould's absence from her husband's house was continued in opposition to his wishes. One witness says that he had taken a message from the husband to the wife, asking her to return. She denies the statement, and gives a different version of that matter. But there were other ways that might have been tried. The pursuer might have seen his wife or written to her, and expressed regret for anything he had done that had contributed to the separation, and offered a reconciliation. Letters of that kind have often been put in evidence in cases of divorce for desertion, and where they appear to be written in good faith great weight is always allowed to them. In the present case, the result of my consideration of the evidence is, that in the first place, Mrs Gould left her husband, not from any purpose of wilful desertion, but from

Gould.

The pursuer reclaimed.

After the hearing had proceeded some length, the case was adjourned in order that the pursuer might lead additional proof regarding the alleged message by Drummond, as to which the pursuer himself had not been examined.

The pursuer then gave this further evidence:—"I remember sending a message to my wife shortly after she left me in 1875, by Mr James Drummond, who was in the habit of coming about my house. I told him to go to my wife, and tell her I was anxious for her to return. He went to see my wife with the view of inducing her to return to me. I thought he could do that better than if I went myself. He reported the result to me, saying that she said she would never return, and that when she left me she did not mean to come back."

Drummond was also re-examined, and corroborated the pursuer's evidence.

After farther argument,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—(After narrating the facts)—In this state of the facts, the only matters to which it is necessary that I should advert are, first, as to the cause of the defender leaving her husband's home. The pursuer thinks that she left because she was superseded in the management of the shop, and the Lord Ordinary also takes that view in his note. I have no sympathy with that view as an answer to an action by the husband for divorce on account of his wife's desertion. The husband was master in his own house, and if he thought fit to appoint another than his wife to conduct his business he was quite entitled to do so, and it is no excuse for the wife leaving her husband's house that he did so appoint someone else to conduct his business.

Then next in regard to the matter as to which additional proof was allowed. Speaking for myself, I do not know that I should have thought it necessary to order additional proof, because I could not have held that the pursuer's right of divorce had been lost even if he did not send after his wife when she left his house. The Lord Ordinary however felt a difficulty on that point, and the Court in consequence thought that additional evidence might be desirable, as it might clear away the difficulty, and such evidence was ordered accordingly. It appears to me that the result of the evidence which has been led is to displace this ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment also, and to leave us free to form our own opinions on the case. On the whole matter I think that the defender had no excuse for leaving her husband's house, and that he is accordingly entitled to decree.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

natural feelings of resentment caused by his conduct towards her, and that the pursuer has not since then done what was incumbent upon him to induce her to repent and to resume conjugal cohabitation.

"With regard to the other cases which have been cited, while of course it is always very useful to know the views that are taken by the Court of Appeal upon any legal question, I cannot look upon a decision in one case of fact as a precedent or authority for the decision of another question of fact, and, in the view I take, there is no question of law here, and I must give my opinion upon the facts as I find them. I shall therefore dismiss the action."

Marriage-contract—Vesting.—In an antenuptial marriage-contract the husband bound himself to pay an annuity of £150 to his wife, if she survived him, and to pay £4000 to the children of the marriage at the first term after the death of the survivor of the spouses. In security of these provisions he bound himself to convey to trustees an insurance policy for £4000, declaring that if he should predecease his wife the trustees should have power to purchase an annuity of £150 for her, and that the children's provisions should in that event be restricted to the balance of the £4000, and be payable to them at majority or marriage. It was further provided that in the event of there being no children, or of all predeceasing the survivor of the spouses, without lawful issue, the sum should be held for the husband's own heirs and assignees. There were children of the marriage, which was dissolved by the death of the husband. Held that the right of the children vested at the husband's death.

Succession—Vesting of provisions—Parent and child—Payment to father for behoof of pupil children—Alimentary provision.—A testatrix directed her trustees to "hold and apply, pay, divide, and convey" the residue of her estate to and for behoof of her lawful children, the lawful issue of a predeceasing child being entitled to the interest which such child would have taken had it survived; "declaring that the provisions, so far as in favour of or descending upon females," should be purely alimentary, and exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husbands they might marry. She further directed the trustees to hold the income of the children's shares, or such part as the trustees should think necessary, for the education and maintenance of the children, "and to retain the capital in their own hands under the trust hereby constituted until they can pay it over to trustees under a marriage-contract, or otherwise, appointed by my children respectively, under trust which shall prescribe that the said income and produce shall be alimentary for my said children and the capital provided to their issue; declaring that my said trustees and executors shall only be effectually discharged by the trustees under such last-mentioned trusts."

The testatrix left three daughters. One of them predeceased her leaving a son and daughter, who were in pupillarity.

Held (1) that the share which would have belonged to the predeceasing daughter if she had survived vested in her children at the death of the testatrix; (2) that so far as it belonged to the granddaughter it could not be regarded as alimentary; and (3) that the father of the pupils, as their tutor and administrator, was entitled to receive and discharge it, and the trustees of the testatrix were bound to pay it over to him on his receipt.

BY antenuptial contract of marriage between Mr Charles Wilson Murray and Miss Mary Bayne Playfair, dated 28th March 1853, Mr Murray bound himself to pay an annuity of £150 to his wife in the event of her surviving him, and further bound and obliged himself, his heirs, executors, and successors "to make payment to the child or children of the said intended marriage of the sum of £4000, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his the said Charles Wilson Murray's death, if he shall survive the said Mary Bayne Playfair, or at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after her death, if she shall survive him." In security of the provisions for his widow and children Mr Murray bound himself to convey to the trustees a policy of insurance for £4000 on his life and maintain it in force; declaring that if he should predecease his wife the trustees should have power to purchase an annuity of £150 for her, and that the sum of £4000 provided to the child or children should be in that event restricted to the amount which might remain of it after purchasing the annuity, "and in which event also the foresaid provisions in favour of the child or children of the marriage shall be payable to such child or children respectively on the marriage or majority of such child or each of such children, whichever of these events shall first happen, unless such child or children shall have attained majority or been married previous to the decease of the said Charles Wilson Murray: And in the event of there being no children of the marriage, or of the child or children of said marriage predeceasing without lawful issue the last survivor of said spouses, then the sum or sums which may come into the hands of the said trustees under said policy of assurance shall, after providing for said annuity, be held by them for behoof of the heirs and assignees of the said Charles Wilson Murray."

Mrs Murray on her part conveyed her estate to the marriage-contract trustees for purposes specified, it being inter alia declared that in the event of there being more than one child of the marriage surviving at the period of the death of the last survivor of the spouses, the trustees should convey her whole estate to the children in such proportions as Mr Murray might appoint, and failing such appointment, then equally, and in the event of there being no children of the marriage, or of the child or children predeceasing without lawful issue the last survivor of the spouses, "then the said trustees . . . shall convey and make over the said heritable and moveable estate to her own heirs and assignees." The funds thus conveyed by Mrs Murray in the marriage-contract amounted at the date of this special case to about £9352.

There were three children born of the marriage, Jane Ann Murray, Edith Ellen Murray, and Sarah F. T. Murray.

The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mr Murray in 1873. He was survived by all his children. He had made no appointment either of the £4000 or of the fund conveyed to the marriage-contract trustees by Mrs Murray. He left a will bequeathing his whole estate to Mrs Murray. The capital of it was about £30,000.

Jane Ann Murray was married to William Gibson Bloxsom in 1876. By antenuptial contract of marriage, she conveyed her whole estate to trustees.

Mrs Bloxsom died in 1878, survived by her husband and by two children, a boy and a girl.

Mrs Murray died in 1884. She left a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole estate to trustees, and directed them to "hold and apply, pay, divide, and convey" the residue of her estate, amounting to about £30,000, "to and for behoof of" her children equally, the lawful issue of any predeceasing child being entitled to the interest which such child would have taken had it survived; "declaring that the provisions, so far as in favour of or descending upon females shall be purely alimentary, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husbands they may marry, and shall not be affectable by their debts or deeds or the diligence of their creditors; and I direct and appoint my said trustees and executors to hold and apply the rents, interest, and other produce and income of my means and estate falling to each of my said children, or such part thereof as my said trustees may deem necessary and proper, for the upbringing, education, clothing and maintenance of the said children respectively, and to retain the capital in their own hands under the trust hereby constituted until they can pay it over to trustees under a marriage-contract, or otherwise, appointed by my children respectively under trust, which shall prescribe that the said income and produce shall be alimentary for my said children, and the capital provided to their issue: declaring that my said trustees and executors shall only be effectually discharged by the trustees under such last-mentioned trusts."

On the death of Mrs Murray a special case was stated by Mr and Mrs Murray's marriage-contract trustees (first parties), Mrs Murray's testamentary trustees (second parties), Mrs Bloxsom's marriage-contract trustees (third parties), and Mr Bloxsom as his children's tutor and administrator-in-law (fourth party).

The first question of law was,—"Did a right to any portion of the £4000 secured on the policy on Mr Murray's life vest in Mrs Bloxsom? and if so, is that right carried by the conveyance in her marriage-contract?"

On this question the third parties contended that the £4000 settled by Mr Murray in his marriage-contract vested at his death in his children, and therefore that Mrs Bloxsom's share of it had vested then in her, and been carried to them by her conveyance. The fourth party contended that it did not vest till Mrs Murray died, and therefore now belonged to his children. The first parties, who were only interested to obtain a proper discharge, contended that it vested at Mrs Murray's death, but that they were entitled to administer it during the minority of the children.

The second question related to the vesting of the funds settled by Mrs Murray in the marriage-contract, but as at the debate the parties were agreed that these funds did not vest till her death no further notice of the question need be taken here.

The third question was,—"If Mrs Bloxsom did not acquire a vested right to a share of either the policy fund or Mrs Murray's marriage-contract fund, are the parties of the first part entitled to administer the shares of these funds, or either of them, falling to Mrs Bloxsom's children during the minority or until the marriage of the said children respectively, or are they bound to pay over these shares, or either of them, to the party of the fourth part as tutor and administrator-in-law for his children?"

The fourth question was whether Mrs Bloxsom had such an interest in Mrs Murray's testamentary funds as entitled her to affect them by her marriage-contract, and the fifth and sixth questions were,—"(5) If not, do the terms of Mrs Murray's settlement, directing the trustees to pay the shares effeiring to her children to their respective marriage-contract trustees, entitle Mrs Bloxsom's marriage-contract trustees, the parties of the third part, to receive from Mrs Murray's testamentary trustees, the parties of the second part, the fee of one-third of the said fund falling to Mrs Bloxsom or her children, and to administer the same in terms of the trust under which they act? or otherwise (6) Are the parties of the second part bound to pay over the fee of said one-third share to the party of the fourth part as tutor and administrator-in-law for his said children, or are they entitled to hold and administer said share during the minority or until the marriage of said children respectively, and apply the income thereof from time to time for their behoof?"

A curator ad litem was appointed to Mrs Bloxsom's children and became the fifth party to the case.

Argued for Mrs Bloxsom's marriage-contract trustees (third parties);—(1) As to the £4000 settled by Mr Murray in his marriage-contract: This fund vested at the dissolution of the marriage by Mr Murray's death, and the share of it which fell to Mrs Bloxsom therefore vested in her. In a marriage-contract such a provision was presumed to vest at the dissolution of the marriage.[1] Payment was postponed in so far only as was necessary to secure the widow's annuity, and there was nothing to suspend vesting.

(2) As to Mrs Murray's testamentary funds: The share of Mrs Murray's testamentary funds which fell to Mrs Bloxsom's children fell to be administered by Mrs Bloxsom's marriage-contract trustees. Mrs Bloxsom's daughter ought to have the protection of the clause in the settlement, providing that its provisions, so far as applicable to females, were to be alimentary and protected from any husbands they might marry.

Argued for the curator ad litem to Mr and Mrs Bloxsom's children;—(1) The £4000 did not vest at the dissolution of the marriage by Mr Murray's death. There was a destination-over failing the existence of children at the death of the surviving spouse to the "heirs and assignees" of Mr Murray. The fund was thus to go to the heirs and assignees of the settlor at the death of the survivor of the spouses leaving no child of the marriage.[2] The trustees were given special power to apply part of the capital in buying Mrs Murray an annuity, which also was inconsistent with vesting. The case of Wardlaw was to be explained by the particular terms of the settlement there construed.

(2) As to Mrs Murray's testamentary funds: Mrs Bloxsom's children were to get a capital sum. Their father was entitled to receive and manage it for them.[3]

The first and second parties maintained that they would not be properly discharged by paying over to Mr Bloxsom any sums which should be found to have vested in his children. They ought to pay to a trust to be formed, or to retain and administer for the children.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the money falling to Mr Bloxsom's children must be paid to him to be applied for them at his discretion.

As to the question whether the money bequeathed by Mrs Murray is to be an alimentary fund, I think that the testatrix has failed to explain such an intention with sufficient precision for it to receive effect, and that all that could be done would be that the discharge to be granted with reference to Mrs Bloxsom's daughter's provision should bear that it is to be held for her alimentary use. It might be better that it should. But the money must be paid over to the father for his children.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. There are three questions. The first is as to the fund provided by the marriage-contract of Mr and Mrs Murray, which has been called the £4000 question. As to that question I am of opinion that it vested on the death of Mr Murray, not because that was the period of the dissolution of the marriage, for I think it would not have vested on the death of Mrs Murray if the marriage had been dissolved by her death. If it vested on the death of Mr Murray, it therefore vested in Mrs Bloxsom, who survived, and therefore passed to her marriage-contract trustees by her conveyance in that contract.

[3] Stevenson v. Dumbreck, Feb. 18, 1857, 19 D. 462, aff. Feb. 11, 1861, 4 Macq. 86.

Secondly, as to the provision made by Mrs Murray in the marriage-contract, I am of opinion as to this matter that there was no vesting till the death of the surviving wife. This result is, I suspect, the consequence of an error in conveyancing, for it is difficult to imagine that the parties intended a different period of vesting for these two funds. But the parties are agreed, for reasons I can well understand, that the mother's provision did not vest till her death, and as she survived Mrs Bloxsom the result is Mrs Bloxsom's children take in their own right. It vested in them, and did not pass by her conveyance to her marriage-contract trustees.

Thirdly, my opinion is the same as to the provision in Mrs Murray's settlement. There was no vesting under it in Mrs Bloxsom's lifetime. On the death of Mrs Murray, who survived her, the funds in that settlement vested in the children of Mrs Bloxsom. They are therefore the fiars of a sum of about £10,000 under their grandmother's will. They have a legal guardian, and he is entitled to receive the money due to them and to give an effectual discharge. His duty will be to manage it for them, and he is not obliged by law to find caution. But I do not doubt he will secure them against any misfortune which might happen to him. That, in my opinion, he will best do by a voluntary deed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. My only doubt has been as to the interpretation of the clause in Mr and Mrs Murray's marriage-contract on which the question about the £4000 depends. If I were to be guided only by the words of the clause itself, I should have thought there could be no vesting till the death of the surviving spouse, which seems to me to be the natural meaning of the words. But then the deed which was construed in the case of Wardlaw contained expressions similar to those in the present deed. On the authority of that case I agree with your Lordship and Lord Young. As to the other points, I have felt no doubt, and I agree in the decision proposed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur. I think the £4000 vested on the death of Mr Murray.

As to the £9000 I need say nothing. As to the funds settled by Mrs Murray's will, I am clearly of opinion that the children of Mrs Bloxsom take a right of fee in those funds, and that they must be paid over to the father. According to the authority of the case of Stevenson v. Dumbreck, he is entitled to receive and discharge these funds for them. I think it ought to be a simple discharge without any qualification. Further, as to the limitation of the right, I think it cannot be extended to grandchildren, as by the form of the words that provision is applicable only to Mrs Murray's immediate issue, and not to her grandchildren.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords are of opinion in regard to the first question, that a right to one-third of the sum of £4000, part of the sum payable under the policy of insurance on the life of Mr Murray, vested on his death in Mrs Bloxsom, his daughter, and was transmitted to the parties of the third part by the conveyance in her contract of marriage . . . . .; in regard to the second question, ... that one-third of the funds settled by Mrs Murray in her antenuptial contract of marriage vested on the death of the survivor of the spouses in the children of Mrs Bloxsom; in regard to the third ques-

Teinds—Over and under-paying heritors—Prescription.—Held that although in general prescription does not begin to run against a claim for repayment by an overpaying heritor in a locality against an underpaying heritor until a final decree of locality has been pronounced, it did operate where the overpayments by the heritor were caused by his own act in failing to produce a decree of valuation.

The teinds of a parish were valued by the subcommissioners in 1629, and decree of approbation of the valuation was pronounced in 1792. Payments in excess of the valuation by the subcommissioners had been made by A, a heritor, and his predecessors, for nearly eighty years prior to the date of the decree of approbation. In a process of augmentation, modification, and locality brought in 1812, and under two interim decrees of locality in 1815 and 1824 respectively, A made further overpayments of stipend. It was not until a second process was brought in 1842—by which date the objections to which the decree of 1792 was exposed, by reason of prior dereliction of the valuation of the subcommissioners, had prescribed—that A produced and founded on that decree, although he and his predecessors were aware of its existence.

Final decrees of locality in these processes, and in a third brought in 1863, were pronounced in 1878, 1881, and 1882 respectively. A in 1886 sued B, another heritor, for repetition of his overpayments, with interest from 1812 onwards. B pleaded that the claim was prescribed except for forty years prior to 1886, to which A answered that he was non valens agere during the years of prescription.

Held that as A had abstained from producing the decree of valuation, the overpayments were caused by his own fault, and that prescription applied to them.

Lord Kinnear.
B.

On 29th June 1629 the subcommissioners of the Presbytery of Elgin valued the teinds upon the lands in the parish of Lhanbryde at 3 chalders 8 bolls, &c., and this subvaluation was approved of on 21st November 1792 in a process of valuation of the lands at the instance of Lord Fife, who had then come to be the sole heritor in the parish.

In 1715 the minister of Lhanbryde had raised a process of modification and locality, under which he obtained, on 16th January 1717, a decree of modification of his stipend, and by a final decree there was localled upon the teinds of the lands in the parish a stipend of 6 chalders 4 bolls, &c., payment of which was made under that final locality until 1815.

In 1781 the two parishes of Lhanbryde and St Andrews were united, and the united parish was thereafter called St Andrews Lhanbryde, and the stipends which had been paid to the separate ministers thereafter formed the stipend of the united parish.

In 1812 the minister of the united parish raised a summons of augmentation, in which the locality of 1717 was founded on by the heritors as a valuation, and the subvaluation and decree of approbation of 1792 were ignored.

In 1815 an interim decree of locality was pronounced in that process, which regulated the payment of stipend until 1824, when a second interim decree was pronounced, regulating the payment down to 1842. The date of the final locality was 15th November 1878.

In 1842 another process of augmentation was brought in which an interim decree of locality was pronounced in 1844, which regulated the payment of stipend down to 1863. In this process the Earl of Fife's trustees founded on the decree of approbation of 1792, and it received effect in the final locality in 1881 (See Earl of Fife's Trustees v. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, Feb. 28, 1849, 11 D. 889).

In 1863 a third process of augmentation was brought, and an interim decree of locality was pronounced therein in 1865, which regulated the payment of stipend down to 1881. The locality was made final in 1882.

The first two processes were conjoined on 9th February 1844, and these again were conjoined with the third process on 31st January 1868.

In May 1886 Lord Fife brought an action against Miss Anne J. Wharton Duff of Orton and her curator bonis, as representing the proprietors since 1812 of the lands of Barmuckity, in the united parish, and as present proprietrix, for relief of overpayments of stipend alleged to have been made by him under the above four interim localities. He claimed for overpayments (1) from 1812 to 1823, £197, 11s. 11d., being, with interest from the date of each payment to the raising of the action, £872, 0s. 2d.; (2) from 1823 to 1842, £355, 2s. 8d., being, with interest, £1296, 8s. 8d.; (3) from 1842 to 1863, £284, 14s. 4d., being, with interest, £745, 0s. 4d.; (4) from 1863 to 1881, £230, 15s. 6d., being, with interest, £379, 10s. 4d.—in all, £3292, 19s. 6d.

The defender stated that it was for the first time in 1844 in a condescendence lodged in the process of augmentation then pending that Lord Fife founded upon the decree of approbation and valuation of 1792, and took up the position that the whole amount of the valued teind in the parish having been exhausted his lands were not liable for any part of the augmentations, either under the interim schemes of 1815 and 1824, or under that of 1844. She stated further that it was owing apparently to the oversight of the Officers of State and the minister that Lord Fife had in 1792 obtained decree of approbation of the subvaluation of 1629, although he was paying at the time, and he and his successors had continued ever since to pay, stipend in terms of the locality of 1717, which exceeded the valued teind as above stated by 44 bolls, and completely derelinquished the subvaluation. She added,—(Stat. 3) "Had this decree of approbation and valuation been founded on or produced in the localities after mentioned within the years of prescription, it could, and probably would, have been reduced and set aside; it was therefore kept out of view and never founded on or produced in said proceedings until prescription had run upon it, and it had become unchallengeable."

The defender admitted liability for a proportion of the principal sums of the overpayments subsequent to 1846 under the localities of 1844 and 1865, and for such rate of interest thereon as the Court might fix.

The pursuer's explanation of the non-production of the decree of approbation of 1792 prior to 1844 was that it had been overlooked.*

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer and his predecessors having under successive interim localities made overpayments from the teinds of their lands, in respect of the stipend of the ministers of St Andrews Lhanbryde, from 1812 to 1881, is entitled for himself and as in right of his predecessors to recover from the underpaying heritors, or their representatives, their proportion of the overpayments, with interest as concluded for. (2) The defender, as owner of the lands of Barmuckity, and

* A correspondence between Mr Innes, the common agent in the locality of 1815, and Messrs Inglis & Robertson, the agents for Lord Fife, was produced, in which in answer to an inquiry by the former as to whether Lord Fife's teinds in the parish of Lhanbryde were valued, the latter, on 5th May 1815, replied,—"Lord Fife's teinds in the parish of Longbride appear to have been valued in 1792. We shall look into the decree on record, and order an extract if necessary."

The common agent answered on 3d June 1815,—"Dear Sirs,—I now enclose to you copy of a scheme of locality of the stipend of St Andrews Lhanbryde, which was given in and allowed to be seen this morning preparatory to its being approved of as an interim rule of payment as the minister is out of all patience. I looked into Lord Fife's valuation in 1792, which I see embraced the lands which his Lordship then had in St Andrews parish as well as those in Lhanbryde; but it will be of little avail to you I suspect in the latter, and was unnecessary and even prejudicial as to the former—the St Andrews lands—from the whole parish having been valued by a decree of the High Commission on the 28th of January 1713, wherein Lord Fife's lands were valued at a lower rate than by the approbation in 1792. So far as respected the Lhanbryde lands, that approbation was, I am afraid, quite unavailing, because the lands had paid nearly double the teind as it would have been by the decreet 1792 from 1722 downward, and have done so to this hour. I have, accordingly, wholly disregarded your valuation of 1792. I have taken your St Andrews lands by the valuation of 1713, which being a decreet of the High Commission could not, according to the late decisions, be derelinquished; and I have laid one full half of the augmentation (which by the by, is no great matter) on your Lhanbryde lands, presuming that the teind by the present rental of them (the valuation of 1792 being laid aside) would fully warrant that. Along with the copy of the scheme, I send you the excerpt which I made from the valuation of 1792 with scrolls of the jottings explanatory of the view of the teind I have mentioned; and if you conceive that any relief can be got as to your lands in Lhanbryde, I am sure I shall be very well pleased, and will give you any assistance in it I can. . . . It will be absolutely necessary to get the present scheme approved of as an interim rule of payment, as the minister threatens all and sundry with letters of horning, but you should look into it as soon as you conveniently can; and if there are grounds for it, let a rectified scheme be made out for final approbation.—I am, &c."

The condescendence for the heritors of the united parish in the augmentation process of 1812 made no reference to the decree of approbation of 1792, and in the condescendence for Lord Fife's trustees in the process of 1842,—although the decree was then for the first time apparently set forth and founded on,—there was no reason given for its having been previously ignored.

also as representing former owners thereof, having underpaid teind during the period libelled, is bound to pay to the pursuer the proportion of overpayments applicable to the said lands, with interest as concluded for, and with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender is not liable for any alleged overpayments for any period beyond forty years. (3) The decree of approbation and valuation of 1792 having been withheld, notwithstanding the orders of the Court to produce the same, so as to fortify it against reduction by concealing it for the period of the long prescription, the pursuer is barred from claiming any overpayments which were only made on the assumption of the decree being invalid, or separatim is barred from insisting on any such payments for the years prior to 1844, or, at all events, prior to 1832 (the end of the prescriptive period).

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 18th December 1886, sustained the second plea in law for the defender.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer has made overpayments under interim schemes of locality from 1812 to 1881; and he brings this action to recover from the defender, as an underpaying heritor, her proportion of the overpayments. The defender admits her liability to account for underpayments for forty years before the date of the action. But she maintains, on the authority of Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell, decided in the House of Lords (5 Rettie, H. of L. 119), that the pursuer's claim to recover for underpayments before that date is cut off by prescription. She also maintains that, apart from prescription, the pursuer is barred by the conduct of his predecessors from insisting on his claims for the period prior to 1844. But whatever weight may be ascribed, in considering the plea of prescription, to the conduct which is said to create a bar, it does not appear to me that, apart from prescription, it affords a sufficient answer to the pursuer's claims. It appears that in 1629 the teinds of the lands in the parish of Lhanbryde were valued by the subcommissioners of Elgin; that in 1792, the Earl of Fife obtained a decree of approbation and valuation in terms of the report, notwithstanding that in the meantime he had been paying stipend in excess of the valued teind. It is argued for the defender that if this decree of approbation and valuation had been founded on in the localities before it had been fortified by prescription, it would have been seen to be a bad decree, by reason of prior dereliction, and must therefore have been reduced. It is alleged, therefore, that it was purposely withheld till 1844, when it was, for the first time, produced and founded on in the locality then pending. But now that it has been brought forward, it is admittedly a good and valid decree; and since all inquiry into the grounds on which it is said that it might once have been challenged is now excluded by prescription, it must be assumed that it was a good decree from the first. Even if it were challengeable, the defender had at no time any title to challenge it; and she cannot assume that it would or could have been disputed by the Officers of State or the minister, who were parties to the proceeding in which it was pronounced. She does not maintain that the pursuer is barred from founding upon his decree as fixing the true measure of his liability; and, indeed, this is already determined in his favour by the approval of the final scheme in which it has received effect. If she is not in a position to plead prescription, therefore, I am unable to see any ground for maintaining that the decree of valuation, and the decree of locality following upon it, are not to receive effect for the purpose of adjusting accounts between the pursuer and the other heritors, as well as for the purpose of fixing their respective liabilities to the minister for the future.

"The question therefore comes to depend upon the validity of the defender's plea, that the dependence of a process of locality does not exclude prescription. This appears to me to be a question of great difficulty in the present state of the decisions; but I am unable to find any solid ground for distinguishing between the present case and that of Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell, as de by the House of Lords.

"In that case the House of Lords held that the long prescription barre that in so holding the noble Lords who took part in the judgment did n which is clearly undistinguishable from the present case. But I think it overruling that decision, if they had thought it necessary to do so. I they disapproved of the doctrine on which the judgment of the Court of Se

"It is true that there is a marked distinction, in fact, between the po of the underpaying heritor in that case, and the position of the defender.

Andrew Fletcher; and the first of these might probably have been reli without touching the question of prescription, for the House of Lords th that they had not been duly cited, and had not been parties to the proc locality. But the second was admittedly well cited, and had taken part i process, by voting in the election of a common agent. But then he had c to be a heritor, by the sale and conveyance of his lands in the parish, for years before the claim for repetition was brought forward; and the Lord doubtedly attached great importance to the consideration that he had become a stranger to the process of locality before the establishment o liability of his lands for stipend, which gave rise to the claim. But I d think they intended to decide that, independently of prescription, the mer of his having sold his land during the dependence of a process of locality relieve an underpaying heritor of his liability, or deprive an overpaying h of his right to an accounting when the true rights of parties had been ascert
It is clear that it could not be so held consistently with the principle on the right to an adjustment of accounts is based. And there is nothing i decision of the House of Lords to throw any doubt upon that principle, exc regards its operation to exclude prescription. It is true that some doubts we pressed, and similar doubts have been expressed in this Court, as to the acc of the hypothesis which traces the right to a judicial contract. But the do itself does not appear to me to have been questioned. On the contrary, it i tinctly laid down in the opinion of Lord Selborne, where his Lordship says
(H. L.) 125),—'It is settled by the law of Scotland that if one heritor pays a l and another a smaller share of a minister's stipend, or of any augment thereof, than they were respectively by law liable to pay, the underpayi liable in repetition to the overpaying heritor.' And his Lordship goes quote what was said in Haldane v. Ogilvy, where he says it was 'laid down the claim of an overpaying against an underpaying heritor is "strictly and si a claim of debt, a claim for money advanced by the creditor for the debto time when their respective pecuniary liabilities were misunderstood."' It w probably be more accurate to say 'that their pecuniary liabilities had no been ascertained' than that they had been 'misunderstood.' For although may be cases where a heritor has paid too much or too little, because h misunderstood his rights or liabilities, the general rule is that payments u an interim scheme are made provisionally, on the assumption that the sha which the burden of stipend ought to be borne by the various heritors hav yet been determined. The law may reasonably impute to a heritor a know of his liability for teind, for that depends upon his own right alone. Bu upon the liability of others, of which he can know nothing until a scheme of locality has been adjusted. The underpaying heritor, therefore, is not in the position of a debtor who has paid too little in the belief that he was paying according to his liability, but of a contributor to a common fund who has paid provisionally in the knowledge that the true amount of his share of the burden remains to be ascertained. If it turns out, when the proportional liabilities of all the heritors are determined, that he has paid too little, it follows that under the provisional arrangements of the interim scheme his debt to the minister has been paid by those of the heritors who have paid too much. And it appears to be implied in the very nature of the process that he must reimburse those who have paid his debt. Lord Selborne observes, in a later part of this opinion, that the claim which thus arises to the overpaying against the underpaying heritor is one 'which arises in contemplation of law, and is constituted as a legal cause of action at the time when each overpayment takes place.' But, if this be so, it seems impossible to hold that the mere fact of his having sold his land before a final locality had been adjusted can relieve him of a debt or deprive him of a claim which had already accrued.

"It would appear to me, therefore, that the importance which was attached in the House of Lords to the fact of the underpaying heritor having sold his land arises less from any aid which it could afford to the plea of prescription, than because it served to meet the argument that was founded upon a supposed contract between the heritors. And accordingly it is with reference to this argument that the Lord Chancellor observes that the heritor who had sold had thenceforth no power over the litigation, and no means of expediting it. But the question still remains whether, assuming a debt to have accrued with each year's underpayment, the overpaying heritor's right to repetition will be barred by the lapse of the period of prescription. And the House of Lords has decided that question in the affirmative. But it could not be so decided without rejecting the only ground on which the opposite doctrine had previously been maintained. The ground, as I understand it, is that notwithstanding that a debt had n fact been incurred with each yearly overpayment, it could not be known that t had been so incurred until the final locality had been approved of. Till then was thought to be impossible for the overpaying heritor to bring his action, because it could not be known that he had in fact overpaid. It was supposed, therefore, that there was a non valentia agere during the whole period of the dependence of a locality which necessarily interrupted the running of prescription. This is a difficulty which applies just as clearly and directly to the case f a heritor who has sold during the progress of the locality as to a heritor who still retains his land when the locality is brought to an end. But it is a difficulty which was fully before the House of Lords in Campbell v. Sinclair, nd it was held to be no sufficient reason for excluding the plea of prescription. It appears to me therefore to have been decided by the House of Lords that the dependence of a process of locality does not operate to bar prescription.

But if prescription is pleadable against such a claim as the present, it appears o me that this is a very favourable case for maintaining the plea. The first process of augmentation was raised in 1812, and the heritors were appointed to produce their rights and valuations on the 25th of June 1814. And yet it was not until July 1844 that the Earl of Fife produced the valuation of 1792, and protested that the whole amount of his valued teind having been exhausted, he was liable for no part of the augmentations, either under the interim schemes of 1814, 1824, or 1842. During the whole time between 1814 and 1844, he had been paying on the footing that his teinds were not valued; and yet he must have known of the existence of his valuation, and no reason can be suggested to account for his withholding it. He allows forty years more to pass before he brings his action, in which he seeks repetition with interest of annual payments extending over a period of seventy years. It is said that the

Lords.[1] But that case was different from the present, because here the heritor against whom the claim was made had remained in the locality till it became final. In Sinclair's Trustees' case he had sold his lands and ceased to be a heritor in the parish more than forty years before the date of the action. Further, unless the case of Weatherstone v. Lord Tweddale,[2] was overruled by the House of Lords in deciding the case of inclair's Trustees, the principle of that decision must apply here. The laims of relief arising in the course of the process or processes of ugmentation could not be determined until there has been a final ecree of locality, and prescription did not run upon these claims ntil the final decree had been pronounced. Accordingly, the equitble plea of non valens agere was an answer to the defender's plea of rescription.[3]

It was further argued that the pursuer had suppressed the decree of pprobation of 1792, and had purposely done so, until the lapse of rty years had fortified it against the objections to which it was clearly ubject on the ground of prior dereliction. But it was equally the fault f the other heritors that that decree had not been produced. At anyate, they could have set the titular or the minister in motion. Further, here had been no concealment on the part of the pursuer's representaves. The correspondence which had been produced shewed that. The uth rather was that the common agent had disregarded the decree. e pursuer relied upon effect being given to it in the final scheme, and it could not now be challenged it must be assumed to have been a d decree from the first.[4]

Argued for the respondent;—The case of Weatherstone[2] was overruled the House of Lords in deciding Sinclair's Trustees.[4] It was impossible explain the principle of that decision, except on grounds which were onsistent with the principle laid down in Weatherstone. If the prinle of Weatherstone was infringed in one case, and prescription held to ply as in Sinclair's Trustees, there was no logical stopping place, and it ust apply in all. The fact that a heritor sold his lands and left the rish during the progress of the process of locality could not be material, cause the principle was that he had entered into an implied contract the outset of the process that when the final decree was pronounced would repay any overpaying heritor what was due to him, and the pse of forty years would not affect that liability.

Further, the pursuer was personally barred by his neglecting to produce d found upon the decree of approbation of 1792 before prescription had n upon it. By this acting he had of set purpose prevented the objecns to which that decree was ex facie open from being stated. If he d given this opportunity, the decree must have been reduced on the und of prior dereliction. The defender's title to state such a defence an action like the present was supported by the decision in the case of nloch v. Bell.[5] The defender's rights had been prejudiced by the urse followed by Lord Fife's predecessors, and the former should not be ade to suffer, because, owing to no fault on her part, or on that of her edecessors, who could not have reduced the decree, the objections to it d not been timeously stated.

Earl of Fife v.
Duff.

LORD ADAM.—This action is brought to recover payment of a su £3292, 19s. 6d., alleged to be the amount, with interest, due by the defen the pursuer, in respect of the stipend of the minister of the parish of St An Lhanbryde, underpaid by her, and her predecessors, from the lands of Barm and others, from the year 1812 to the year 1881 inclusive.

The corresponding overpayments by the pursuer and his predecessors made under interim decrees of locality pronounced in three successive pro of augmentation, modification, and locality, raised by the ministers of the p and embrace a period, it will be observed, of sixty-nine years.

The sums concluded for amount to about £1068, 4s. 5d. of principa to £2224, 15s. 1d. of interest.

By the interlocutor brought under review the Lord Ordinary has sus the defender's second plea in law, which is, that the defender is not liab any alleged overpayments for any period beyond forty years from the date raising of the action. The Lord Ordinary explains in his opinion the gr of his judgment. He says that he cannot distinguish this case from t Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell in the House of Lords, the judgment in whi thinks, necessarily, although not expressly, overrules the case of Weatherst
The Marquis of Tweeddale. "In that case" (Sinclair's Trustees), he says,— House of Lords held that the long prescription barred any right of recou which had accrued to an overpaying heritor prior to the period of forty before he insisted in his claim for repetition. It is true that, in so holdin noble Lords who took part in the judgment did not expressly overrul decision in the Marquis of Tweeddale v. Weatherstone, which is clearly tinguishable from the present case. But I think it manifest, from the reas upon which their judgment proceeded, that with the exception perhaps of Gordon, they would have concurred in formally overruling that decision, i had thought it necessary to do so. I think they disapproved of the doctri which the judgment of the Court of Session was based, and that they int by their decision to give effect to a contrary doctrine."

I cannot concur in this opinion, and it is entirely rested on the ground the judgment in Sinclair's Trustees' case necessarily overruled Weatherstone'
I may be allowed to refer to a few passages of their Lordships' opinions, in to shew that they did not intend to overrule Weatherstone's case, and that judgment depended on, and was given with reference to a different st facts. These were, that General Fletcher's trustees never had been parties locality proceedings, and that Mr Fletcher had sold his lands in the parish had ceased to be a party to the proceedings for upwards of forty years befo claim for repetition of overpayments was brought against them,—facts whi not exist in this case, and did not exist in Weatherstone's case, where the p or their authors had been parties to the proceedings throughout.

Lord Chancellor Cairns, after referring to the principle that when pay are made under an interim scheme of locality there is an implied contract when a final scheme has been settled, there shall be an adjustment of ove underpayments, says—"For that proposition one authority, certainly goi that extent, has been referred to, and is the foundation of the decision c and in the observations which I am about to make I will assume, althou is not necessary now to decide it, that the principle of the decision in that case is correct and well founded. My Lords, it does not appear to me to apply to the case before your Lordships . . . But what your Lordships have to deal with here is the case of a person who went out of the parish, and left the parish altogether more than forty years ago. You may assume that at the time when he left the parish he was a person who had underpaid—in this case he had paid nothing at all—and that there might have been a right to make him contribute, in that respect, the payment which he ought to have made, but, as I said, he left the parish, he disappeared, he became from that moment a stranger to the proceedings, and from that time he was no party to the litigation, if there was a litigation; from that time the common agent ceased to represent him. Therefore, I am at a loss to see upon what principle it is that, the period of forty years having elapsed, the period after which there is a presumption of the abandonment of every claim having run, there is to be an exception grafted on that prescription, that a person who as I have said has become a stranger to the litigation is after the period of forty years to be held liable."

It will be observed that the Lord Chancellor assumes that Weatherstone's case may have been well decided, and rests upon the fact that the parties had not been parties to the locality proceedings for upwards of forty years.

Lord Hatherley says,—"Whatever may have been said in that case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, in order to apply it to a case like the present, I should have expected to find facts similar to those existing in the case upon which such observations were made, and I find nothing at all comparable in the state of circumstances in the case now before your Lordships for decision to the circumstances in the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale. . . . My Lords, it does not appear to me that the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale can be in any way compared with this."

Lord Selborne says,—"Even if the authority of Weatherstone v. Lord Tweeddale in this question of prescription stood higher than, under these circumstances, it appears to me to stand, it would still not be an authority applicable to the present case," and after explaining that case he adds,—"The doctrine, so explained, seems to be applicable to those only who have been throughout, or at the very least within forty years before action is brought, parties to the locality proceedings, which in the present case none of the appellants were. I do not think it consistent with the principle of any of the authorities on this subject to hold that the cause of action is, in any case of this kind, originally constituted by the final decree of locality, and it would certainly be inconsistent with all principle to hold that it was or could be so constituted as against persons who (like the appellants in the present case) were at the date of the final decree, and had been for many years previously, strangers to the locality proceedings. When the appellant Andrew Fletcher sold his estate in 1833 and ceased to be a heritor, he became a stranger to those proceedings, and had no longer any power (as I apprehend) to intervene in them for any purpose. If the respondents had desired to enforce such liability as he may have been then under to them, and with that view to bring the locality proceedings to a close, it was for them to do so."

Lord Gordon, after adverting to Weatherstone's case, says,—"I think the principles involved in the judgment in that case were right, but I think these principles do not apply to the present case."

Weatherstone's case may or may not have been rightly decided, but looking to the expressions of opinion which I have just read, I cannot agree wit Lord Ordinary in thinking that their Lordships disapproved of the doctri which the judgment in that case was based, and that they intended to effect to a contrary doctrine. I think, as I have said, that the judgme Sinclair's Trustees' case rested upon the fact that the defenders either had been, or had for forty years ceased to be, parties to the locality proceeding

I think that their Lordships (with the exception of Lord Gordon, who, have seen, expressed his opinion that the decision was right), guarded them from expressing any opinion as to what the result might be if the part their authors had been parties to the proceedings throughout, as in this Weatherstone's case.

The question, therefore, raised in this case being, as I think, open fo sideration, I think that it is so far ruled by Weatherstone's case, and tha case was rightly decided.

It appears to me that the principle upon which an overpaying her entitled to obtain relief of his overpayments from an underpaying her one well established in the law of Scotland, and does not depend upo peculiarity of the law or practice in teind cases. It is the principle that one of several debtors who are jointly and severally liable to a credito that creditor either the whole or more than his proper share of the co debt, he is entitled to full relief from his co-debtors. Now, all the heri a parish are liable to the minister in payment of his stipend, to the ext their free teinds. When the minister has obtained a decree of augmen and modification, he is entitled to proceed against any one of the herito to recover from him the full amount of his free teinds, so far as may be sary to operate payment of the stipend, leaving such heritor to seek his against the other heritors, who are equally liable with him in payment
The title of an overpaying heritor to obtain relief of his overpayments fr underpaying heritor does not depend upon the fact that the overpayment been made under an interim decree of locality, though that may have important effects in questions of prescription, but upon the fact that paid to their creditor the whole or part of the debt for which he and the paying heritor were both liable in solidum, and of which, therefore, as other case, he is entitled to relief, to the extent to which he has paid mor his share of the common debt.

I think therefore that the liability to relieve, and the consequent grou action, arises when each overpayment is made, and that, therefore, th negative prescription necessarily applies as each payment is made, unl Lord Cairns says, in Sinclair's Trustees' case, there is to be an exception on that prescription. In Sinclair's Trustees' case, the exception was sough found in the principle affirmed in Weatherstone's case, that, where payme stipends are made under an interim decree of locality, there is an in judicial contract among all the parties, that when the legal obligations heritors shall be determined by final decreet, their several interests sh adjusted from the commencement of the process or processes according true state of their rights and obligations, and that the claims of relie arising cannot be affected by the length of time during which the settl of a final locality may have been delayed.

But it was pointed out in the House of Lords in Sinclair's Trustees' case as Sinclair's Trustees had never been parties to the proceedings, they coul been no parties to any such implied contract; and that as regards Mr Fletcher, he had sold his lands and ceased to be a heritor for upwards of forty years before the claim was made, that he became a stranger to the proceedings, and had no longer any power to intervene in them to any purpose, and, therefore, could not be affected by them. No doubt the overpaying heritor could not sue during the dependence of the locality proceedings, and was, therefore, non valens agere, but, as I understand the case, it was held to be the duty of the overpaying heritor, if he desired to enforce a claim against an underpaying heritor, to bring the locality proceedings to a close within the years of prescription; and that, therefore, it was his own fault if his right of action was cut off.

I think that the effect of payments made under an interim decree of locality, where all the parties have been parties to the proceedings, is more accurately expressed by Lord Selborne in Sinclair's Trustees' case than it is in Weatherstone's case, though, as his Lordship says, "the question may be one more of words than of substance." His Lordship adds,—"That as between the parties, or actors, who were before the Teind Court in a process of augmentation and locality, a right to a future adjustment of such payments as might be made under an interim decree was implied from the very nature of their concursus in that proceeding by which they were all bound, and that the dependence of such a process between them would keep that right alive until a final decree."

I think, as so stated, the principle is perfectly sound, and I can add nothing to what was said on this point by the Judges of the Court of Session in deciding Sinclair's Trustees' case. The principle necessarily excludes any right of action until the amount of overpayments has been ascertained after a final decree, and also, unless there be exceptional circumstances, necessarily prevents prescription from running during the progress of the proceedings,—as during that time the overpaying heritor could not sue, and was therefore non valens agere.

I think, therefore, that, if the defender's plea of prescription depended for its validity solely on the lapse of time, it would not be well founded, as the Lord Ordinary has held it to be, because I think the answer would be good that the pursuer was non valens agere until the locality proceedings came to an end in a final decree of locality.

But this plea of non valens agere is an equitable plea. Professor Bell, in section 627 of his Principles, says of it:—"This is an answer in equity to the plea of prescription, and proceeds on the principle, not on the words, of the law"; and certainly the statutes introducing the long prescription do not, in terms, provide that inability to sue shall have the effect of stopping the currency of prescription.

It is perfectly well settled, however, that it has this effect. Nevertheless, it is, as Professor Bell says, an equitable plea, and it may not in every case be admitted. Thus, Lord Selborne held in Sinclair's Trustees' case that the overpaying heritor could not plead it, because it was his own fault that he was non valens agere.

I think, therefore, that the Court is entitled to consider whether, in the circumstances of this case, it is equitable that the pursuer should be allowed to take off the effect of the long prescription which undoubtedly has run against his claim by pleading non valens agere.

Since the case was before the Lord Ordinary we have had a report from the Teind Clerk, which discloses some very material facts bearing on this point. It is clear from that report that any of the parties to the locality might, but for their own negligence, have brought the proceedings to a close in ample tim have enabled them to take proceedings for the recovery of overpayments, if t desired so to do, within the years of prescription. If, therefore, the claim been, as in Sinclair's Trustees' case, against a person not a party to the proc ings, I should have held, as Lord Selborne did in that case, that the plea of valens agere was of no avail, because it was the party's own fault that he allowed his claim to be prescribed. But to apply this principle as between parties to these proceedings would, I think, be contrary to the principle of decision in Weatherstone's case. It would imply that the negative prescrip applied in all cases of over and underpayments made under an interim de of locality, for I have no doubt that every locality may be brought to an within the years of prescription, and that it is equally the fault of all par concerned if it is not. I am not prepared to sustain the defender's plea of scription on that ground.

But it also appears, from the Teind Clerk's report, that the interim decre locality, under which the overpayments in question were made, was approve an interim rule of payment on 5th July 1815.

It further appears from that report, and the correspondence produced, t the Earl of Fife, the pursuer's author, through his agents, was at and before t time in the full knowledge of the decree of approbation of 1792.

On the 3d June 1815 the common agent writes to Lord Fife's agents,— now enclose to you copy of a scheme of locality of the stipend of St Andr Lhanbryde, which was given in and allowed to be seen this morning preparat to its being approved of as an interim rule of payment, as the minister is ou all patience.

"I looked into Lord Fife's valuation in 1792, which I see embraced the la which his Lordship then had in St Andrews parish, as well as those in Lh bryde; but it will be of little avail to you I suspect in the latter, and was necessary and even prejudicial as to the former—the St Andrews lands—fr the whole parish having been valued by a decree of the High Commission on t 28th of January 1713, wherein Lord Fife's lands were valued at a lower rate th by the approbation in 1792. So far as respected the Lhanbryde lands, th approbation was, I am afraid, quite unavailing, because the lands had pa nearly double the teind as it would have been by the decreet 1792 from 17 downward, and have done so to this hour."

It further appears from the Teind Clerk's report, that large payments in exce of the subvaluation of 1629, which had been approved of by the decree of 17 had been made from 1717 down to the date of the decree of approbation, period of seventy-five years. The decree of approbation, therefore, although facie a valid document, was open to challenge, and would probably, if not ce tainly, have been reduced, if challenged by anyone having a title. The decr of approbation was not produced or founded on, with the result that addition sums were allocated on the Earl's lands by the interim locality of 1815, an still further sums by the rectified interim locality of 1824. It was not unt 1844 that the decree of approbation was produced and founded on.

It is thus apparent that it was not in ignorance of the state of his rights t teinds and valuations that the decree of approbation of 1792 was not produce and founded on by the pursuer's author prior to the interim scheme of 1815.

If the Earl had produced it, one or other of two results would have followe either (the decree being ex facie valid) it would have received effect, if no nged, and the Earl would not have made the overpayments of which he seeks relief; or, if it had been challenged and reduced, the payments ly made would not have been overpayments. The Earl elected not to ce the decree of approbation, and his reason is obvious; he preferred g the payments in question to running the risk of having the decree nged. He continued to make these payments till, by the lapse of time, jections to which the decree of approbation was exposed were cut off by gative prescription. He has thus taken the benefit of the lapse of time ify his decree, but he says that the defender shall not have the benefit of me lapse of time to support her plea of prescription. It is, no doubt, true he Earl was non valens agere during these years, in the sense that he not sue for repayment of these alleged overpayments till a final decree of y had been obtained. But it is equally true that he made the payments edly, and that he need never have been in the position of requiring to sue of his own free will. These payments were the price he was willing to r the purpose of validating his decree of approbation, and having suc- in that purpose he now wishes to have the price repaid. The negative ption undoubtedly strikes, in terms, at his claim, and the question is er, in the circumstances, it would be just and equitable to allow its effect aken off by, as Lord Cairns expresses it, grafting on it this exception. r opinion it would not be just or equitable. It was by the acts of his essors, and for their own purposes, that the pursuer is now in a position uire to sue for these overpayments. I do not think that the principle of erstone's case applies to such a case as this, and I think that in the cir- ances we ought to hold that the pursuer's claim beyond forty years from te of raising the action is prescribed.

n therefore of opinion, though not on the same grounds as his Lordship, he Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right.

D MURE.—Having considered the additional information which has been efore the Court by the reporter, under the remit made to him in June have had no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion as that which Adam has arrived at, and that substantially on the same grounds. For is here, in the view I take of the case, no room for the application of the ne of implied contract on which the decision in the case of Weatherstone d Tweeddale proceeded. When the case was formerly before us, even on cord and productions as they then stood, I was disposed to come to this sion. But with the additional information now before us, I am quite d that the doctrine, as laid down in the case of Weatherstone, does not, circumstances as now explained, apply, and that the ordinary rules of iption must be allowed to take effect.

vas, I conceive, the duty of Lord Fife's advisers to found on the decree of bation of 1792 in 1814, if they considered it effectual to enable Lord Fife st the proposed augmentation. They, however, did not take that course, h quite well aware of its existence. Why they did not do this, it may not e very easy to ascertain. But I think it is not improbable, as has been ted by the reporter, that it was from apprehension that they would be met e plea of dereliction, which they probably would, as the objection to the bation had not then been worked off by prescription. But, whatever may been the reason for this omission, it appears to me that it is sufficient to

"In these circumstances, I think she is fairly entitled to say that a lapse of forty years from the production of the valuation, all claim for re of overpayments made before that date must be presumed to have been aba unless it can be maintained against her that that presumption is exclude dependence of a process of locality which bars prescription. But that in my opinion, be maintained, since the contrary is decided by the H Lords in Campbell v. Sinclair."

* "In regard to the first of the two points remitted, the reporter is of that the delay must be chiefly ascribed to the heritors in not produci rights to teinds and valuations thereof in the first action. None of the creditors were so n terested in the rectification of the locality as the Earl of Fife, as appea the statement produced, and yet it was not till 1844 that the decree of 1 founded on. With so much knowledge of the valuation shewn in the agent's account, it is thought the delay in its production may fairly be at to an unwillingness to found upon the decree during the currency of t years from 1792 to 1832.

"On the second of the points, the reporter finds from the records that stipend allocated upon the Earl of Fife's lands, situated in the then parish of Lhanbryde, so early as 16th January 1717, amounted as fol [Here followed a statement shewing that the old stipend allocated in 1 100 bolls, while the teinds as valued by the subcommissioners amounte bolls, there thus being an excess of payment of 44 bolls, which contin 1805, when there were added 19 bolls more, making the excess paid 1844 about 63 bolls.]

But that case was different from the present, because here the against whom the claim was made had remained in the locality became final. In Sinclair's Trustees' case he had sold his lands ised to be a heritor in the parish more than forty years before the the action. Further, unless the case of Weatherstone v. Lord ale,[2] was overruled by the House of Lords in deciding the case of 's Trustees, the principle of that decision must apply here. The of relief arising in the course of the process or processes of tation could not be determined until there has been a final of locality, and prescription did not run upon these claims ie final decree had been pronounced. Accordingly, the equit- ea of non valens agere was an answer to the defender's plea of tion.[3] s further argued that the pursuer had suppressed the decree of ation of 1792, and had purposely done so, until the lapse of ars had fortified it against the objections to which it was clearly on the ground of prior dereliction. But it was equally the fault ther heritors that that decree had not been produced. At any- ey could have set the titular or the minister in motion. ed for the respondent;—The case of Weatherstone[2] was overruled House of Lords in deciding Sinclair's Trustees.[4] It was impossible in the principle of that decision, except on grounds which were tent with the principle laid down in Weatherstone. If the prin- Weatherstone was infringed in one case, and prescription held to s in Sinclair's Trustees, there was no logical stopping place, and it pply in all. The fact that a heritor sold his lands and left the luring the progress of the process of locality could not be material, the principle was that he had entered into an implied contract utset of the process that when the final decree was pronounced ld repay any overpaying heritor what was due to him, and the forty years would not affect that liability.

ner, the pursuer was personally barred by his neglecting to produce nd upon the decree of approbation of 1792 before prescription had on it. By this acting he had of set purpose prevented the objec- which that decree was ex facie open from being stated. If he en this opportunity, the decree must have been reduced on the of prior dereliction. The defender's title to state such a defence ction like the present was supported by the decision in the case of v. Bell.[5] The defender's rights had been prejudiced by the followed by Lord Fife's predecessors, and the former should not be o suffer, because, owing to no fault on her part, or on that of her essors, who could not have reduced the decree, the objections to it t been timeously stated.

Earl of Fife v. Duff.

At advising,—

Lord Adam.—This action is brought to recover payment of a £3292, 19s. 6d., alleged to be the amount, with interest, due by the def the pursuer, in respect of the stipend of the minister of the parish of St A Lhanbryde, underpaid by her, and her predecessors, from the lands of Bar and others, from the year 1812 to the year 1881 inclusive.

The corresponding overpayments by the pursuer and his predecesso made under interim decrees of locality pronounced in three successive p of augmentation, modification, and locality, raised by the ministers of th and embrace a period, it will be observed, of sixty-nine years.

The sums concluded for amount to about £1068, 4s. 5d. of princi to £2224, 15s. 1d. of interest.

By the interlocutor brought under review the Lord Ordinary has s the defender's second plea in law, which is, that the defender is not li any alleged overpayments for any period beyond forty years from the da raising of the action. The Lord Ordinary explains in his opinion the of his judgment. He says that he cannot distinguish this case from Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell in the House of Lords, the judgment in w thinks, necessarily, although not expressly, overrules the case of Weathe The Marquis of Tweeddale. "In that case" (Sinclair's Trustees), he says House of Lords held that the long prescription barred any right of rec which had accrued to an overpaying heritor prior to the period of for before he insisted in his claim for repetition. It is true that, in so hol noble Lords who took part in the judgment did not expressly over decision in the Marquis of Tweeddale v. Weatherstone, which is clearl tinguishable from the present case. But I think it manifest, from the r upon which their judgment proceeded, that with the exception perhaps Gordon, they would have concurred in formally overruling that decision had thought it necessary to do so. I think they disapproved of the doc which the judgment of the Court of Session was based, and that they i by their decision to give effect to a contrary doctrine."

I cannot concur in this opinion, and it is entirely rested on the grou the judgment in Sinclair's Trustees' case necessarily overruled Weatherston I may be allowed to refer to a few passages of their Lordships' opinions, to shew that they did not intend to overrule Weatherstone's case, and th judgment depended on, and was given with reference to a different facts. These were, that General Fletcher's trustees never had been partie locality proceedings, and that Mr Fletcher had sold his lands in the par had ceased to be a party to the proceedings for upwards of forty years b claim for repetition of overpayments was brought against them,—facts w not exist in this case, and did not exist in Weatherstone's case, where the or their authors had been parties to the proceedings throughout.

Lord Chancellor Cairns, after referring to the principle that when p are made under an interim scheme of locality there is an implied contr when a final scheme has been settled, there shall be an adjustment of o underpayments, says—"For that proposition one authority, certainly g that extent, has been referred to, and is the foundation of the decisio Court below, the case namely of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tw and in the observations which I am about to make I will assume, alth ecessary now to decide it, that the principle of the decision in that case t and well founded. My Lords, it does not appear to me to apply to e before your Lordships . . . But what your Lordships have to h here is the case of a person who went out of the parish, and left the ltogether more than forty years ago. You may assume that at the time e left the parish he was a person who had underpaid—in this case he d nothing at all—and that there might have been a right to make him te, in that respect, the payment which he ought to have made, but, as e left the parish, he disappeared, he became from that moment a stranger roceedings, and from that time he was no party to the litigation, if there tigation; from that time the common agent ceased to represent him.

re, I am at a loss to see upon what principle it is that, the period of forty aving elapsed, the period after which there is a presumption of the ment of every claim having run, there is to be an exception grafted on scription, that a person who as I have said has become a stranger to the n is after the period of forty years to be held liable."

ll be observed that the Lord Chancellor assumes that Weatherstone's y have been well decided, and rests upon the fact that the parties had n parties to the locality proceedings for upwards of forty years.

Hatherley says,—"Whatever may have been said in that case of rstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, in order to apply it to a case like sent, I should have expected to find facts similar to those existing in the on which such observations were made, and I find nothing at all comin the state of circumstances in the case now before your Lordships for n to the circumstances in the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of dale. . . . My Lords, it does not appear to me that the case of Weather-
The Marquis of Tweeddale can be in any way compared with this."

Selborne says,—"Even if the authority of Weatherstone v. Lord Tweed- this question of prescription stood higher than, under these circum-
, it appears to me to stand, it would still not be an authority applicable present case," and after explaining that case he adds,—"The doctrine, so ed, seems to be applicable to those only who have been throughout, or at y least within forty years before action is brought, parties to the locality dings, which in the present case none of the appellants were. I do not it consistent with the principle of any of the authorities on this subject l that the cause of action is, in any case of this kind, originally consti-by the final decree of locality, and it would certainly be inconsistent with inciple to hold that it was or could be so constituted as against persons like the appellants in the present case) were at the date of the final , and had been for many years previously, strangers to the locality progs. When the appellant Andrew Fletcher sold his estate in 1833 and l to be a heritor, he became a stranger to those proceedings, and had no r any power (as I apprehend) to intervene in them for any purpose. If espondents had desired to enforce such liability as he may have been then r to them, and with that view to bring the locality proceedings to a close, s for them to do so."

rd Gordon, after adverting to Weatherstone's case, says,—"I think the ciples involved in the judgment in that case were right, but I think these ciples do not apply to the present case."

Veatherstone's case may or may not have been rightly decided, but looking to the expressions of opinion which I have just read, I cannot agree wi Lord Ordinary in thinking that their Lordships disapproved of the doctr which the judgment in that case was based, and that they intended t effect to a contrary doctrine. I think, as I have said, that the judgm Sinclair's Trustees' case rested upon the fact that the defenders either had been, or had for forty years ceased to be, parties to the locality proceedin I think that their Lordships (with the exception of Lord Gordon, who, have seen, expressed his opinion that the decision was right), guarded then from expressing any opinion as to what the result might be if the par their authors had been parties to the proceedings throughout, as in this Weatherstone's case.

The question, therefore, raised in this case being, as I think, open fo sideration, I think that it is so far ruled by Weatherstone's case, and tha case was rightly decided.

It appears to me that the principle upon which an overpaying her entitled to obtain relief of his overpayments from an underpaying her one well established in the law of Scotland, and does not depend upo peculiarity of the law or practice in teind cases. It is the principle that one of several debtors who are jointly and severally liable to a credito that creditor either the whole or more than his proper share of the co debt, he is entitled to full relief from his co-debtors. Now, all the heri a parish are liable to the minister in payment of his stipend, to the ext their free teinds. When the minister has obtained a decree of augmer and modification, he is entitled to proceed against any one of the herito to recover from him the full amount of his free teinds, so far as may be sary to operate payment of the stipend, leaving such heritor to seek his against the other heritors, who are equally liable with him in payment The title of an overpaying heritor to obtain relief of his overpayments fr underpaying heritor does not depend upon the fact that the overpayments been made under an interim decree of locality, though that may have important effects in questions of prescription, but upon the fact that I paid to their creditor the whole or part of the debt for which he and the paying heritor were both liable in solidum, and of which, therefore, as other case, he is entitled to relief, to the extent to which he has paid mor his share of the common debt.

I think therefore that the liability to relieve, and the consequent grou action, arises when each overpayment is made, and that, therefore, th negative prescription necessarily applies as each payment is made, unl Lord Cairns says, in Sinclair's Trustees' case, there is to be an exception g on that prescription. In Sinclair's Trustees' case, the exception was sough found in the principle affirmed in Weatherstone's case, that, where payme stipends are made under an interim decree of locality, there is an ir judicial contract among all the parties, that when the legal obligations heritors shall be determined by final decreet, their several interests sh adjusted from the commencement of the process or processes according true state of their rights and obligations, and that the claims of relie arising cannot be affected by the length of time during which the settl of a final locality may have been delayed.

But it was pointed out in the House of Lords in Sinclair's Trustees' case as Sinclair's Trustees had never been parties to the proceedings, they coul been no parties to any such implied contract; and that as regards Mr Fletcher, he had sold his lands and ceased to be a heritor for upwards of forty years before the claim was made, that he became a stranger to the proceedings, and had no longer any power to intervene in them to any purpose, and, therefore, could not be affected by them. No doubt the overpaying heritor could not sue during the dependence of the locality proceedings, and was, therefore, non valens agere, but, as I understand the case, it was held to be the duty of the overpaying heritor, if he desired to enforce a claim against an underpaying heritor, to bring the locality proceedings to a close within the years of prescription; and that, therefore, it was his own fault if his right of action was cut off.

I think that the effect of payments made under an interim decree of locality, where all the parties have been parties to the proceedings, is more accurately expressed by Lord Selborne in Sinclair's Trustees' case than it is in Weatherstone's case, though, as his Lordship says, "the question may be one more of words than of substance." His Lordship adds,—"That as between the parties, or actors, who were before the Teind Court in a process of augmentation and locality, a right to a future adjustment of such payments as might be made under an interim decree was implied from the very nature of their concursus in that proceeding by which they were all bound, and that the dependence of such a process between them would keep that right alive until a final decree."

I think, as so stated, the principle is perfectly sound, and I can add nothing to what was said on this point by the Judges of the Court of Session in deciding Sinclair's Trustees' case. The principle necessarily excludes any right of action until the amount of overpayments has been ascertained after a final decree, and also, unless there be exceptional circumstances, necessarily prevents prescription from running during the progress of the proceedings,—as during that time the overpaying heritor could not sue, and was therefore non valens agere.

I think, therefore, that, if the defender's plea of prescription depended for its validity solely on the lapse of time, it would not be well founded, as the Lord Ordinary has held it to be, because I think the answer would be good that the pursuer was non valens agere until the locality proceedings came to an end in a final decree of locality.

But this plea of non valens agere is an equitable plea. Professor Bell, in section 627 of his Principles, says of it:—"This is an answer in equity to the plea of prescription, and proceeds on the principle, not on the words, of the law"; and certainly the statutes introducing the long prescription do not, in terms, provide that inability to sue shall have the effect of stopping the currency of prescription.

It is perfectly well settled, however, that it has this effect. Nevertheless, it is, as Professor Bell says, an equitable plea, and it may not in every case be admitted. Thus, Lord Selborne held in Sinclair's Trustees' case that the overpaying heritor could not plead it, because it was his own fault that he was non valens agere.

I think, therefore, that the Court is entitled to consider whether, in the circumstances of this case, it is equitable that the pursuer should be allowed to take off the effect of the long prescription which undoubtedly has run against his claim by pleading non valens agere.

Since the case was before the Lord Ordinary we have had a report from the Teind Clerk, which discloses some very material facts bearing on this point. It is clear from that report that any of the parties to the locality might, but for their own negligence, have brought the proceedings to a close in ample tin have enabled them to take proceedings for the recovery of overpayments, if desired so to do, within the years of prescription. If, therefore, the claim been, as in Sinclair's Trustees' case, against a person not a party to the proc ings, I should have held, as Lord Selborne did in that case, that the plea o valens agere was of no avail, because it was the party's own fault that he allowed his claim to be prescribed. But to apply this principle as betwee parties to these proceedings would, I think, be contrary to the principle o decision in Weatherstone's case. It would imply that the negative prescri applied in all cases of over and underpayments made under an interim d of locality, for I have no doubt that every locality may be brought to an within the years of prescription, and that it is equally the fault of all pa concerned if it is not. I am not prepared to sustain the defender's plea of scription on that ground.

But it also appears, from the Teind Clerk's report, that the interim decr locality, under which the overpayments in question were made, was approv an interim rule of payment on 5th July 1815.

It further appears from that report, and the correspondence produced, the Earl of Fife, the pursuer's author, through his agents, was at and before time in the full knowledge of the decree of approbation of 1792.

On the 3d June 1815 the common agent writes to Lord Fife's agents,— now enclose to you copy of a scheme of locality of the stipend of St And Lhanbryde, which was given in and allowed to be seen this morning prepar to its being approved of as an interim rule of payment, as the minister is o all patience.

"I looked into Lord Fife's valuation in 1792, which I see embraced the l which his Lordship then had in St Andrews parish, as well as those in L bryde; but it will be of little avail to you I suspect in the latter, and was necessary and even prejudicial as to the former—the St Andrews lands—the whole parish having been valued by a decree of the High Commission o 28th of January 1713, wherein Lord Fife's lands were valued at a lower rate by the approbation in 1792. So far as respected the Lhanbryde lands, approbation was, I am afraid, quite unavailing, because the lands had nearly double the teind as it would have been by the decreet 1792 from 1 downward, and have done so to this hour."

It further appears from the Teind Clerk's report, that large payments in ex of the subvaluation of 1629, which had been approved of by the decree of 1 had been made from 1717 down to the date of the decree of approbatio period of seventy-five years. The decree of approbation, therefore, althoug facie a valid document, was open to challenge, and would probably, if not tainly, have been reduced, if challenged by anyone having a title. The de of approbation was not produced or founded on, with the result that additi sums were allocated on the Earl's lands by the interim locality of 1815, still further sums by the rectified interim locality of 1824. It was not u 1844 that the decree of approbation was produced and founded on.

It is thus apparent that it was not in ignorance of the state of his rights teinds and valuations that the decree of approbation of 1792 was not produ and founded on by the pursuer's author prior to the interim scheme of 1815.

If the Earl had produced it, one or other of two results would have follow either (the decree being ex facie valid) it would have received effect, if challenged, and the Earl would not have made the overpayments of which he now seeks relief; or, if it had been challenged and reduced, the payments actually made would not have been overpayments. The Earl elected not to produce the decree of approbation, and his reason is obvious; he preferred making the payments in question to running the risk of having the decree challenged. He continued to make these payments till, by the lapse of time, the objections to which the decree of approbation was exposed were cut off by the negative prescription. He has thus taken the benefit of the lapse of time to fortify his decree, but he says that the defender shall not have the benefit of the same lapse of time to support her plea of prescription. It is, no doubt, true that the Earl was non valens agere during these years, in the sense that he could not sue for repayment of these alleged overpayments till a final decree of locality had been obtained. But it is equally true that he made the payments designedly, and that he need never have been in the position of requiring to sue except of his own free will. These payments were the price he was willing to pay for the purpose of validating his decree of approbation, and having succeeded in that purpose he now wishes to have the price repaid. The negative prescription undoubtedly strikes, in terms, at his claim, and the question is whether, in the circumstances, it would be just and equitable to allow its effect to be taken off by, as Lord Cairns expresses it, grafting on it this exception. In my opinion it would not be just or equitable. It was by the acts of his predecessors, and for their own purposes, that the pursuer is now in a position to require to sue for these overpayments. I do not think that the principle of Weatherstone's case applies to such a case as this, and I think that in the circumstances we ought to hold that the pursuer's claim beyond forty years from the date of raising the action is prescribed.

I am therefore of opinion, though not on the same grounds as his Lordship, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right.

LORD MURE.—Having considered the additional information which has been laid before the Court by the reporter, under the remit made to him in June last, I have had no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion as that which Lord Adam has arrived at, and that substantially on the same grounds. For there is here, in the view I take of the case, no room for the application of the doctrine of implied contract on which the decision in the case of Weatherstone v Lord Tweeddale proceeded. When the case was formerly before us, even on the record and productions as they then stood, I was disposed to come to this conclusion. But with the additional information now before us, I am quite satisfied that the doctrine, as laid down in the case of Weatherstone, does not, in the circumstances as now explained, apply, and that the ordinary rules of prescription must be allowed to take effect.

It was, I conceive, the duty of Lord Fife's advisers to found on the decree of approbation of 1792 in 1814, if they considered it effectual to enable Lord Fife to resist the proposed augmentation. They, however, did not take that course, though quite well aware of its existence. Why they did not do this, it may not now be very easy to ascertain. But I think it is not improbable, as has been suggested by the reporter, that it was from apprehension that they would be met by the plea of dereliction, which they probably would, as the objection to the approbation had not then been worked off by prescription. But, whatever may have been the reason for this omission, it appears to me that it is sufficient to between the present case and that of Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell, as decided by the House of Lords.

"In that case the House of Lords held that the long prescription barred any right to recoupment which had accrued to an overpaying heritor prior to the period of forty years before he insisted in his claim for repetition. It is true that in so holding the noble Lords who took part in the judgment did not expressly overrule the decision in the Marquis of Tweeddale v. Weatherstone, which is clearly undistinguishable from the present case. But I think it manifest from the reasoning upon which their judgment proceeded that, with the exception perhaps of Lord Gordon, they would have concurred in formally overruling that decision, if they had thought it necessary to do so. I think they disapproved of the doctrine on which the judgment of the Court of Session was based, and that they intended by their decision to give effect to a contrary doctrine.

"It is true that there is a marked distinction, in fact, between the position of the underpaying heritor in that case, and the position of the defender. There there were two successive proprietors against whom a claim was made for repetition of overpayments of stipend—General Campbell Fletcher's trustees and Mr Andrew Fletcher; and the first of these might probably have been relieved, without touching the question of prescription, for the House of Lords thought that they had not been duly cited, and had not been parties to the process of locality. But the second was admittedly well cited, and had taken part in the process, by voting in the election of a common agent. But then he had ceased to be a heritor, by the sale and conveyance of his lands in the parish, for forty years before the claim for repetition was brought forward; and the Lords undoubtedly attached great importance to the consideration that he had thus become a stranger to the process of locality before the establishment of the liability of his lands for stipend, which gave rise to the claim. But I do not think they intended to decide that, independently of prescription, the mere fact of his having sold his land during the dependence of a process of locality would relieve an underpaying heritor of his liability, or deprive an overpaying heritor of his right to an accounting when the true rights of parties had been ascertained. It is clear that it could not be so held consistently with the principle on which the right to an adjustment of accounts is based. And there is nothing in the decision of the House of Lords to throw any doubt upon that principle, except as regards its operation to exclude prescription. It is true that some doubts were expressed, and similar doubts have been expressed in this Court, as to the accuracy of the hypothesis which traces the right to a judicial contract. But the doctrine itself does not appear to me to have been questioned. On the contrary, it is distinctly laid down in the opinion of Lord Selborne, where his Lordship says (4 R. (H. L.) 125),—'It is settled by the law of Scotland that if one heritor pays a larger and another a smaller share of a minister's stipend, or of any augmentation thereof, than they were respectively by law liable to pay, the underpaying is liable in repetition to the overpaying heritor.' And his Lordship goes on to quote what was said in Haldane v. Ogilvy, where he says it was 'laid down that the claim of an overpaying against an underpaying heritor is "strictly and simply a claim of debt, a claim for money advanced by the creditor for the debtor at a time when their respective pecuniary liabilities were misunderstood."' It would probably be more accurate to say 'that their pecuniary liabilities had not yet been ascertained' than that they had been 'misunderstood.' For although there may be cases where a heritor has paid too much or too little, because he has misunderstood his rights or liabilities, the general rule is that payments under an interim scheme are made provisionally, on the assumption that the shares in which the burden of stipend ought to be borne by the various heritors have not yet been determined. The law may reasonably impute to a heritor a knowledge of his liability for teind, for that depends upon his own right alone. But his proportional liability for stipend within the full amount of his teind depends remitted "to the Teind Clerk to report generally the course of proceedings in the locality or conjoined localities of St Andrews Lhanbryde during upon the liability of others, of which he can know nothing until a scheme of locality has been adjusted. The underpaying heritor, therefore, is not in the position of a debtor who has paid too little in the belief that he was paying according to his liability, but of a contributor to a common fund who has paid provisionally in the knowledge that the true amount of his share of the burden remains to be ascertained. If it turns out, when the proportional liabilities of all the heritors are determined, that he has paid too little, it follows that under the provisional arrangements of the interim scheme his debt to the minister has been paid by those of the heritors who have paid too much. And it appears to be implied in the very nature of the process that he must reimburse those who have paid his debt. Lord Selborne observes, in a later part of this opinion, that the claim which thus arises to the overpaying against the underpaying heritor is one 'which arises in contemplation of law, and is constituted as a legal cause of action at the time when each overpayment takes place.' But, if this be so, it seems impossible to hold that the mere fact of his having sold his land before a final locality had been adjusted can relieve him of a debt or deprive him of a claim which had already accrued.

"It would appear to me, therefore, that the importance which was attached in the House of Lords to the fact of the underpaying heritor having sold his land arises less from any aid which it could afford to the plea of prescription, than because it served to meet the argument that was founded upon a supposed contract between the heritors. And accordingly it is with reference to this argument that the Lord Chancellor observes that the heritor who had sold had thenceforth no power over the litigation, and no means of expediting it. But the question still remains whether, assuming a debt to have accrued with each year's underpayment, the overpaying heritor's right to repetition will be barred by the lapse of the period of prescription. And the House of Lords has decided that question in the affirmative. But it could not be so decided without rejecting the only ground on which the opposite doctrine had previously been maintained. The ground, as I understand it, is that notwithstanding that a debt had in fact been incurred with each yearly overpayment, it could not be known that it had been so incurred until the final locality had been approved of. Till then it was thought to be impossible for the overpaying heritor to bring his action, because it could not be known that he had in fact overpaid. It was supposed, therefore, that there was a non valentia agere during the whole period of the dependence of a locality which necessarily interrupted the running of prescription. This is a difficulty which applies just as clearly and directly to the case of a heritor who has sold during the progress of the locality as to a heritor who still retains his land when the locality is brought to an end. But it is a difficulty which was fully before the House of Lords in Campbell v. Sinclair, and it was held to be no sufficient reason for excluding the plea of prescription. It appears to me therefore to have been decided by the House of Lords that the dependence of a process of locality does not operate to bar prescription.

But if prescription is pleadable against such a claim as the present, it appears to me that this is a very favourable case for maintaining the plea. The first process of augmentation was raised in 1812, and the heritors were appointed to produce their rights and valuations on the 25th of June 1814. And yet it was not until July 1844 that the Earl of Fife produced the valuation of 1792, and protested that the whole amount of his valued teind having been exhausted, he was liable for no part of the augmentations, either under the interim schemes of 1814, 1824, or 1842. During the whole time between 1814 and 1844, he had been paying on the footing that his teinds were not valued; and yet he must have known of the existence of his valuation, and no reason can be suggested to account for his withholding it. He allows forty years more to pass before he brings his action, in which he seeks repetition with interest of annual payments extending over a period of seventy years. It is said that the the dependence of which the alleged overpayments of stipend were made, and specially (First) to what cause or causes is to be ascribed the long delay which occurred in adjusting a final scheme of locality; and (Second) whether there were overpayments of stipend by the Earl of Fife, prior to the decree of approbation, sufficient to infer dereliction of the subvaluation of his teinds." The conclusions of that report, which dealt very fully with the subjects of the remit, are stated below.*

defender cannot complain of the delay, because she and her predecessors might have pressed on the proceedings in the locality. But the delay which followed the production of the valuation would appear to have been caused by a protracted litigation between Lord Fife and the Crown. The defender had no part in that litigation, and no power to expedite the proceedings.

"In these circumstances, I think she is fairly entitled to say that after the lapse of forty years from the production of the valuation, all claim for repetition of overpayments made before that date must be presumed to have been abandoned, unless it can be maintained against her that that presumption is excluded by the dependence of a process of locality which bars prescription. But that cannot, in my opinion, be maintained, since the contrary is decided by the House of Lords in Campbell v. Sinclair."

* "In regard to the first of the two points remitted, the reporter is of opinion that the delay must be chiefly ascribed to the heritors in not producing their rights to teinds and valuations thereof in the first action. Had these been produced, all questions between the Crown and the heritors, and also the liabilities of the individual heritors, might have been settled in the first action within the seven years that action was asleep. When the discussion between the Crown and the Earl of Fife took place in the second action" (i.e., in the process which was raised in 1842), "the chief points in discussion were settled within five years; and the remaining question might have been settled within two years. It is true the Crown did not press the objections which had been made in 1824, but the heritors nevertheless continued to pay their shares of stipend, and in the case of the Earl of Fife to make a large overpayment in the knowledge that the decree of approbation of 1792 was in existence, and fixed the teinds at a much smaller quantity than was being paid. None of the creditors were so much interested in the rectification of the locality as the Earl of Fife, as appears from the statement produced, and yet it was not till 1844 that the decree of 1792 was founded on. With so much knowledge of the valuation shewn in the common agent's account, it is thought the delay in its production may fairly be attributed to an unwillingness to found upon the decree during the currency of the forty years from 1792 to 1832.

"On the second of the points, the reporter finds from the records that the old stipend allocated upon the Earl of Fife's lands, situated in the then separate parish of Lhanbryde, so early as 16th January 1717, amounted as follows:—[Here followed a statement shewing that the old stipend allocated in 1717 was 100 bolls, while the teinds as valued by the subcommissioners amounted to 56 bolls, there thus being an excess of payment of 44 bolls, which continued till 1805, when there were added 19 bolls more, making the excess paid till after 1844 about 63 bolls.]

"The original overpayment appears to have continued down to 1792, a period of about seventy-five years; and as it was continued down to 1812, and was increased by the interim locality of 1815 . . . and farther increased by the rectified interim locality of 21st January 1824, there is no reason to doubt that there was good ground for challenge of the decree of approbation of 1792 if it had been founded on within forty years of its date.

"With reference to the approbation of 1792, it is only fair to state that the proceedings in that action were not unduly hurried."

Lords.[1] But that case was different from the present, because here the heritor against whom the claim was made had remained in the locality till it became final. In Sinclair's Trustees' case he had sold his lands and ceased to be a heritor in the parish more than forty years before the date of the action. Further, unless the case of Weatherstone v. Lord Tweeddale,[2] was overruled by the House of Lords in deciding the case of Sinclair's Trustees, the principle of that decision must apply here. The claims of relief arising in the course of the process or processes of augmentation could not be determined until there has been a final decree of locality, and prescription did not run upon these claims until the final decree had been pronounced. Accordingly, the equitable plea of non valens agere was an answer to the defender's plea of prescription.[3]

It was further argued that the pursuer had suppressed the decree of approbation of 1792, and had purposely done so, until the lapse of forty years had fortified it against the objections to which it was clearly subject on the ground of prior dereliction. But it was equally the fault of the other heritors that that decree had not been produced. At any-rate, they could have set the titular or the minister in motion. Further, there had been no concealment on the part of the pursuer's representatives. The correspondence which had been produced shewed that. The truth rather was that the common agent had disregarded the decree. The pursuer relied upon effect being given to it in the final scheme, and as it could not now be challenged it must be assumed to have been a good decree from the first.[4]

Argued for the respondent;—The case of Weatherstone[2] was overruled by the House of Lords in deciding Sinclair's Trustees.[4] It was impossible to explain the principle of that decision, except on grounds which were inconsistent with the principle laid down in Weatherstone. If the principle of Weatherstone was infringed in one case, and prescription held to apply as in Sinclair's Trustees, there was no logical stopping place, and it must apply in all. The fact that a heritor sold his lands and left the parish during the progress of the process of locality could not be material, because the principle was that he had entered into an implied contract at the outset of the process that when the final decree was pronounced he would repay any overpaying heritor what was due to him, and the lapse of forty years would not affect that liability.

Further, the pursuer was personally barred by his neglecting to produce and found upon the decree of approbation of 1792 before prescription had run upon it. By this acting he had of set purpose prevented the objections to which that decree was ex facie open from being stated. If he had given this opportunity, the decree must have been reduced on the ground of prior dereliction. The defender's title to state such a defence in an action like the present was supported by the decision in the case of Kinloch v. Bell.[5] The defender's rights had been prejudiced by the course followed by Lord Fife's predecessors, and the former should not be made to suffer, because, owing to no fault on her part, or on that of her predecessors, who could not have reduced the decree, the objections to it had not been timeously stated.

No. 49. At advising,—

Dec. 23, 1887. Earl of Fife v. Duff.

LORD ADAM.—This action is brought to recover payment of a sum of £3292, 19s. 6d., alleged to be the amount, with interest, due by the defender to the pursuer, in respect of the stipend of the minister of the parish of St Andrews, Lhanbryde, underpaid by her, and her predecessors, from the lands of Barmuckity and others, from the year 1812 to the year 1881 inclusive.

The corresponding overpayments by the pursuer and his predecessors were made under interim decrees of locality pronounced in three successive processes of augmentation, modification, and locality, raised by the ministers of the parish, and embrace a period, it will be observed, of sixty-nine years.

The sums concluded for amount to about £1068, 4s. 5d. of principal, and to £2224, 15s. 1d. of interest.

By the interlocutor brought under review the Lord Ordinary has sustained the defender's second plea in law, which is, that the defender is not liable for any alleged overpayments for any period beyond forty years from the date of the raising of the action. The Lord Ordinary explains in his opinion the grounds of his judgment. He says that he cannot distinguish this case from that of Sinclair's Trustees v. Campbell in the House of Lords, the judgment in which, he thinks, necessarily, although not expressly, overrules the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale. "In that case" (Sinclair's Trustees), he says,—"the House of Lords held that the long prescription barred any right of recoupment which had accrued to an overpaying heritor prior to the period of forty years before he insisted in his claim for repetition. It is true that, in so holding, the noble Lords who took part in the judgment did not expressly overrule the decision in the Marquis of Tweeddale v. Weatherstone, which is clearly undistinguishable from the present case. But I think it manifest, from the reasoning upon which their judgment proceeded, that with the exception perhaps of Lord Gordon, they would have concurred in formally overruling that decision, if they had thought it necessary to do so. I think they disapproved of the doctrine on which the judgment of the Court of Session was based, and that they intended by their decision to give effect to a contrary doctrine."

I cannot concur in this opinion, and it is entirely rested on the ground that the judgment in Sinclair's Trustees' case necessarily overruled Weatherstone's case. I may be allowed to refer to a few passages of their Lordships' opinions, in order to shew that they did not intend to overrule Weatherstone's case, and that their judgment depended on, and was given with reference to a different state of facts. These were, that General Fletcher's trustees never had been parties to the locality proceedings, and that Mr Fletcher had sold his lands in the parish, and had ceased to be a party to the proceedings for upwards of forty years before the claim for repetition of overpayments was brought against them,—facts which do not exist in this case, and did not exist in Weatherstone's case, where the parties or their authors had been parties to the proceedings throughout.

Lord Chancellor Cairns, after referring to the principle that when payments are made under an interim scheme of locality there is an implied contract that, when a final scheme has been settled, there shall be an adjustment of over and underpayments, says—"For that proposition one authority, certainly going to that extent, has been referred to, and is the foundation of the decision of the Court below, the case namely of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, and in the observations which I am about to make I will assume, although it is not necessary now to decide it, that the principle of the decision in that case is correct and well founded. My Lords, it does not appear to me to apply to the case before your Lordships . . . But what your Lordships have to deal with here is the case of a person who went out of the parish, and left the parish altogether more than forty years ago. You may assume that at the time when he left the parish he was a person who had underpaid—in this case he had paid nothing at all—and that there might have been a right to make him contribute, in that respect, the payment which he ought to have made, but, as I said, he left the parish, he disappeared, he became from that moment a stranger to the proceedings, and from that time he was no party to the litigation, if there was a litigation; from that time the common agent ceased to represent him. Therefore, I am at a loss to see upon what principle it is that, the period of forty years having elapsed, the period after which there is a presumption of the abandonment of every claim having run, there is to be an exception grafted on that prescription, that a person who as I have said has become a stranger to the litigation is after the period of forty years to be held liable."

It will be observed that the Lord Chancellor assumes that Weatherstone's case may have been well decided, and rests upon the fact that the parties had not been parties to the locality proceedings for upwards of forty years.

Lord Hatherley says,—"Whatever may have been said in that case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale, in order to apply it to a case like the present, I should have expected to find facts similar to those existing in the case upon which such observations were made, and I find nothing at all comparable in the state of circumstances in the case now before your Lordships for decision to the circumstances in the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale. . . . My Lords, it does not appear to me that the case of Weatherstone v. The Marquis of Tweeddale can be in any way compared with this."

Lord Selborne says,—"Even if the authority of Weatherstone v. Lord Tweeddale in this question of prescription stood higher than, under these circumstances, it appears to me to stand, it would still not be an authority applicable to the present case," and after explaining that case he adds,—"The doctrine, so explained, seems to be applicable to those only who have been throughout, or at the very least within forty years before action is brought, parties to the locality proceedings, which in the present case none of the appellants were. I do not think it consistent with the principle of any of the authorities on this subject to hold that the cause of action is, in any case of this kind, originally constituted by the final decree of locality, and it would certainly be inconsistent with all principle to hold that it was or could be so constituted as against persons who (like the appellants in the present case) were at the date of the final decree, and had been for many years previously, strangers to the locality proceedings. When the appellant Andrew Fletcher sold his estate in 1833 and ceased to be a heritor, he became a stranger to those proceedings, and had no longer any power (as I apprehend) to intervene in them for any purpose. If the respondents had desired to enforce such liability as he may have been then under to them, and with that view to bring the locality proceedings to a close, it was for them to do so."

Lord Gordon, after adverting to Weatherstone's case, says,—"I think the principles involved in the judgment in that case were right, but I think these principles do not apply to the present case."

Weatherstone's case may or may not have been rightly decided, but looking to the expressions of opinion which I have just read, I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that their Lordships disapproved of the doctrine on which the judgment in that case was based, and that they intended to give effect to a contrary doctrine. I think, as I have said, that the judgment in Sinclair's Trustees' case rested upon the fact that the defenders either had never been, or had for forty years ceased to be, parties to the locality proceedings, and I think that their Lordships (with the exception of Lord Gordon, who, as we have seen, expressed his opinion that the decision was right), guarded themselves from expressing any opinion as to what the result might be if the parties or their authors had been parties to the proceedings throughout, as in this and in Weatherstone's case.

The question, therefore, raised in this case being, as I think, open for consideration, I think that it is so far ruled by Weatherstone's case, and that that case was rightly decided.

It appears to me that the principle upon which an overpaying heritor is entitled to obtain relief of his overpayments from an underpaying heritor is one well established in the law of Scotland, and does not depend upon any peculiarity of the law or practice in teind cases. It is the principle that when one of several debtors who are jointly and severally liable to a creditor pays that creditor either the whole or more than his proper share of the common debt, he is entitled to full relief from his co-debtors. Now, all the heritors in a parish are liable to the minister in payment of his stipend, to the extent of their free teinds. When the minister has obtained a decree of augmentation and modification, he is entitled to proceed against any one of the heritors and to recover from him the full amount of his free teinds, so far as may be necessary to operate payment of the stipend, leaving such heritor to seek his relief against the other heritors, who are equally liable with him in payment of it. The title of an overpaying heritor to obtain relief of his overpayments from an underpaying heritor does not depend upon the fact that the overpayments have been made under an interim decree of locality, though that may have most important effects in questions of prescription, but upon the fact that he has paid to their creditor the whole or part of the debt for which he and the underpaying heritor were both liable in solidum, and of which, therefore, as in any other case, he is entitled to relief, to the extent to which he has paid more than his share of the common debt.

I think therefore that the liability to relieve, and the consequent ground of action, arises when each overpayment is made, and that, therefore, the long negative prescription necessarily applies as each payment is made, unless, as Lord Cairns says, in Sinclair's Trustees' case, there is to be an exception grafted on that prescription. In Sinclair's Trustees' case, the exception was sought to be found in the principle affirmed in Weatherstone's case, that, where payments of stipends are made under an interim decree of locality, there is an implied judicial contract among all the parties, that when the legal obligations of the heritors shall be determined by final decreet, their several interests shall be adjusted from the commencement of the process or processes according to the true state of their rights and obligations, and that the claims of relief thus arising cannot be affected by the length of time during which the settlement of a final locality may have been delayed.

But it was pointed out in the House of Lords in Sinclair's Trustees' case, that, as Sinclair's Trustees had never been parties to the proceedings, they could have been no parties to any such implied contract; and that as regards Mr Fletcher, he had sold his lands and ceased to be a heritor for upwards of forty years before the claim was made, that he became a stranger to the proceedings, and had no longer any power to intervene in them to any purpose, and, therefore, could not be affected by them. No doubt the overpaying heritor could not sue during the dependence of the locality proceedings, and was, therefore, non valens agere, but, as I understand the case, it was held to be the duty of the overpaying heritor, if he desired to enforce a claim against an underpaying heritor, to bring the locality proceedings to a close within the years of prescription; and that, therefore, it was his own fault if his right of action was cut off.

I think that the effect of payments made under an interim decree of locality, where all the parties have been parties to the proceedings, is more accurately expressed by Lord Selborne in Sinclair's Trustees' case than it is in Weatherstone's case, though, as his Lordship says, "the question may be one more of words than of substance." His Lordship adds,—"That as between the parties, or actors, who were before the Teind Court in a process of augmentation and locality, a right to a future adjustment of such payments as might be made under an interim decree was implied from the very nature of their concursus in that proceeding by which they were all bound, and that the dependence of such a process between them would keep that right alive until a final decree."

I think, as so stated, the principle is perfectly sound, and I can add nothing to what was said on this point by the Judges of the Court of Session in deciding Sinclair's Trustees' case. The principle necessarily excludes any right of action until the amount of overpayments has been ascertained after a final decree, and also, unless there be exceptional circumstances, necessarily prevents prescription from running during the progress of the proceedings,—as during that time the overpaying heritor could not sue, and was therefore non valens agere.

I think, therefore, that, if the defender's plea of prescription depended for its validity solely on the lapse of time, it would not be well founded, as the Lord Ordinary has held it to be, because I think the answer would be good that the pursuer was non valens agere until the locality proceedings came to an end in a final decree of locality.

But this plea of non valens agere is an equitable plea. Professor Bell, in section 627 of his Principles, says of it:—"This is an answer in equity to the plea of prescription, and proceeds on the principle, not on the words, of the law"; and certainly the statutes introducing the long prescription do not, in terms, provide that inability to sue shall have the effect of stopping the currency of prescription.

It is perfectly well settled, however, that it has this effect. Nevertheless, it is, as Professor Bell says, an equitable plea, and it may not in every case be admitted. Thus, Lord Selborne held in Sinclair's Trustees' case that the overpaying heritor could not plead it, because it was his own fault that he was non valens agere.

I think, therefore, that the Court is entitled to consider whether, in the circumstances of this case, it is equitable that the pursuer should be allowed to take off the effect of the long prescription which undoubtedly has run against his claim by pleading non valens agere.

Since the case was before the Lord Ordinary we have had a report from the Teind Clerk, which discloses some very material facts bearing on this point. It is clear from that report that any of the parties to the locality might, but for their own negligence, have brought the proceedings to a close in ample time to have enabled them to take proceedings for the recovery of overpayments, if they desired so to do, within the years of prescription. If, therefore, the claim had been, as in Sinclair's Trustees' case, against a person not a party to the proceedings, I should have held, as Lord Selborne did in that case, that the plea of non valens agere was of no avail, because it was the party's own fault that he had allowed his claim to be prescribed. But to apply this principle as between the parties to these proceedings would, I think, be contrary to the principle of the decision in Weatherstone's case. It would imply that the negative prescription applied in all cases of over and underpayments made under an interim decree of locality, for I have no doubt that every locality may be brought to an end within the years of prescription, and that it is equally the fault of all parties concerned if it is not. I am not prepared to sustain the defender's plea of prescription on that ground.

But it also appears, from the Teind Clerk's report, that the interim decree of locality, under which the overpayments in question were made, was approved as an interim rule of payment on 5th July 1815.

It further appears from that report, and the correspondence produced, that the Earl of Fife, the pursuer's author, through his agents, was at and before that time in the full knowledge of the decree of approbation of 1792.

On the 3d June 1815 the common agent writes to Lord Fife's agents,—"I now enclose to you copy of a scheme of locality of the stipend of St Andrews Lhanbryde, which was given in and allowed to be seen this morning preparatory to its being approved of as an interim rule of payment, as the minister is out of all patience.

"I looked into Lord Fife's valuation in 1792, which I see embraced the lands which his Lordship then had in St Andrews parish, as well as those in Lhanbryde; but it will be of little avail to you I suspect in the latter, and was unnecessary and even prejudicial as to the former—the St Andrews lands—from the whole parish having been valued by a decree of the High Commission on the 28th of January 1713, wherein Lord Fife's lands were valued at a lower rate than by the approbation in 1792. So far as respected the Lhanbryde lands, that approbation was, I am afraid, quite unavailing, because the lands had paid nearly double the teind as it would have been by the decreet 1792 from 1722 downward, and have done so to this hour."

It further appears from the Teind Clerk's report, that large payments in excess of the subvaluation of 1629, which had been approved of by the decree of 1792, had been made from 1717 down to the date of the decree of approbation, a period of seventy-five years. The decree of approbation, therefore, although ex facie a valid document, was open to challenge, and would probably, if not certainly, have been reduced, if challenged by anyone having a title. The decree of approbation was not produced or founded on, with the result that additional sums were allocated on the Earl's lands by the interim locality of 1815, and still further sums by the rectified interim locality of 1824. It was not until 1844 that the decree of approbation was produced and founded on.

It is thus apparent that it was not in ignorance of the state of his rights to teinds and valuations that the decree of approbation of 1792 was not produced and founded on by the pursuer's author prior to the interim scheme of 1815.

If the Earl had produced it, one or other of two results would have followed, either (the decree being ex facie valid) it would have received effect, if not challenged, and the Earl would not have made the overpayments of which he now seeks relief; or, if it had been challenged and reduced, the payments actually made would not have been overpayments. The Earl elected not to produce the decree of approbation, and his reason is obvious; he preferred making the payments in question to running the risk of having the decree challenged. He continued to make these payments till, by the lapse of time, the objections to which the decree of approbation was exposed were cut off by the negative prescription. He has thus taken the benefit of the lapse of time to fortify his decree, but he says that the defender shall not have the benefit of the same lapse of time to support her plea of prescription. It is, no doubt, true that the Earl was non valens agere during these years, in the sense that he could not sue for repayment of these alleged overpayments till a final decree of locality had been obtained. But it is equally true that he made the payments designedly, and that he need never have been in the position of requiring to sue except of his own free will. These payments were the price he was willing to pay for the purpose of validating his decree of approbation, and having succeeded in that purpose he now wishes to have the price repaid. The negative prescription undoubtedly strikes, in terms, at his claim, and the question is whether, in the circumstances, it would be just and equitable to allow its effect to be taken off by, as Lord Cairns expresses it, grafting on it this exception. In my opinion it would not be just or equitable. It was by the acts of his predecessors, and for their own purposes, that the pursuer is now in a position to require to sue for these overpayments. I do not think that the principle of Weatherstone's case applies to such a case as this, and I think that in the circumstances we ought to hold that the pursuer's claim beyond forty years from the date of raising the action is prescribed.

I am therefore of opinion, though not on the same grounds as his Lordship, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right.

LORD MURE.—Having considered the additional information which has been laid before the Court by the reporter, under the remit made to him in June last, I have had no difficulty in coming to the same conclusion as that which Lord Adam has arrived at, and that substantially on the same grounds. For there is here, in the view I take of the case, no room for the application of the doctrine of implied contract on which the decision in the case of Weatherstone v Lord Tweeddale proceeded. When the case was formerly before us, even on the record and productions as they then stood, I was disposed to come to this conclusion. But with the additional information now before us, I am quite satisfied that the doctrine, as laid down in the case of Weatherstone, does not, in the circumstances as now explained, apply, and that the ordinary rules of prescription must be allowed to take effect.

It was, I conceive, the duty of Lord Fife's advisers to found on the decree of approbation of 1792 in 1814, if they considered it effectual to enable Lord Fife to resist the proposed augmentation. They, however, did not take that course, though quite well aware of its existence. Why they did not do this, it may not now be very easy to ascertain. But I think it is not improbable, as has been suggested by the reporter, that it was from apprehension that they would be met by the plea of dereliction, which they probably would, as the objection to the approbation had not then been worked off by prescription. But, whatever may have been the reason for this omission, it appears to me that it is sufficient to constitute a good defence in this case to the pursuer's demand, and that there is no good answer to the alternative view of the question put by Lord Adam. At the date of the augmentation in 1814, the then Lord Fife either had a good claim to exemption upon the decree of approbation, or he had not. If he had not, he was not localled upon beyond his liability at the time; so that there was then no overpayment, and there could be no implied contract to repay. If on the other hand the claim upon the decree was well founded, and could then have been maintained, the predecessor of the present pursuer was alone to blame for not having made the claim effectual. It is not alleged that he was non valens agere, and the pursuer cannot therefore, in my opinion, be now heard to maintain upon that, or any other ground in equity, that the plea of prescription does not apply.

In coming to this conclusion I do not think that we are departing in any respect from the rule laid down in the case of Weatherstone, nor do I think that in the case of Sinclair's Trustees the House of Lords gave any decided opinion as to the conclusion they might have come to, had any precisely similar question been before them for decision. What that House in substance seems to me to have said was, that they did not consider it necessary to go into that question, because, assuming Weatherstone's case to have been well decided, there were specialties in the case of Sinclair's Trustees which took it out of the rule applied in the case of Weatherstone; and for the reason I have now shortly explained, it appears to me that there are specialties in the present case which entitle us to come to a similar conclusion.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have had an opportunity of reading Lord Adam's opinion and of considering it very thoroughly, and as I entirely agree in the views stated by his Lordship I shall only add a very few observations, which I should have thought unnecessary, were it not that in consequence of the recent judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Sinclair's Trustees there appears to be some misunderstanding as to the present position of the law regarding cases of this kind.

I do not think there is any difficulty in defining the precise grounds in law on which a claim like the present rests, and I do not think it at all necessary to refer to any doctrine of implied contract as the foundation of such a claim. When the minister of a parish obtains a decree of augmentation and modification he is enabled to recover his stipend from any of the heritors who have free teind in their hands, and it is his right to go against any one of these heritors, for they are all conjunctly and severally liable. Of course he cannot recover from any one more than the amount of free teind in that heritor's hands, but to that extent he is entitled to obtain from the individual heritor either the whole of his stipend or as much of it as the free teind in that heritor's hands will furnish. What, then, is the position of the heritors under such a decree of modification, and what is their relation to the minister? They are simply correi debendi, and if one of several correi debendi pays more than his proportion of the common debt there arises to him at once a right of relief against those who have paid less than their proportion, and that right of relief is the foundation of such a claim as the present. If a number of persons are bound in one contract, conjunctly and severally, we know very well the liability attaching to each, but there is a good deal of difficulty in adjusting the precise proportion that each has to pay and in enforcing it as between correi debendi. And that gives rise to what is called, according to the practice of our law, an action of contribution—that is, just a series of actions of relief, and the claim, whether in one case or the other—whether in this or any other case such as I have supposed—is a direct claim of relief at the instance of one of several correi debendi against his co-debtors. The circumstance that the obligation arises under an interim locality for the purpose of regulating so far as can be done the proportions in which the heritors are to pay the stipend does not seem to alter the nature of the right; it is an interim arrangement, and it does not seem to matter that the proportions may be altered by circumstances before the final locality, because the heritors are liable for their proportions even before the decree of locality is pronounced. So that this pursuer's claim is really nothing else than a right to claim relief as one of several correi debendi against his co-debtors.

No. 49.

Dec. 23, 1887.
Earl of Fife v. Duff.

That such a claim is liable to be met with the plea of the negative prescription cannot, I think, be doubted. It is liable to be extinguished by the lapse of forty years like any other debt, for it is nothing but a debt, although it is in the nature of a claim of relief. Looking therefore to the Statute of 1617 alone one would say that there is no answer to the plea of negative prescription.

But then we all know that in the administration of the law under that statute equitable considerations have been admitted for the purpose of limiting that plea to a considerable extent. Negative prescription cannot be said to run, according to that equitable rule, until the demand of the creditor has become enforceable, and the ground of that equitable exception to the application of the statute is nowhere, so far as I know, so well stated as in the passage of Mr Erskine's Institute, to which we were referred (iii. 7, 36),—"The negative prescription begins to run only from the time that the debt or right can be demanded in judgment or sued upon, because till then negligence cannot be imputed to the creditor, and prescription is the penalty of negligence. The Act of 1617 does indeed precisely fix the date of the obligation to be the period from which that prescription begins its course; and in the same manner the Act of 1579, c. 82, declares that actions of removings against tenants shall prescribe in three years after warning given to the tenant; but the words of these and other such statutes are in practice equitably explained, or rather corrected, into an agreeableness with this rule, that the course of prescription cannot by its nature commence against an obligation till that obligation be productive of an action."

Now, that qualification of the strict rule of the Statute of 1617 will also undoubtedly apply to the present case, and therefore if the creditor in this obligation of relief has been prevented, not by his own fault, from bringing forward and enforcing his claim, then the equitable rule comes in and the years of prescription will run from the date when the claim arose, and prescription will not begin to operate until he could have sued upon his claim.

The question in the present case therefore comes to be, when could this claim have been sued upon, and through whose fault or negligence is it that the claim has not been capable of being sued upon at an earlier date? and there, I think, lies the point of the present case.

The Earl of Fife in the year 1815, when the first of these overpayments commenced, was in possession of a decree of approbation of a subvaluation of the teinds in question. It was suggested to him that that decree of approbation might be liable to challenge. It was thought that there had been such a constant series of overpayments beyond the subvaluation that it was thereby impaired, and that the plea of dereliction would have applied, and if stated, either in a process of locality or in a reduction of the decree of approbation, would have effectually set aside that decree.

Now, what was Lord Fife's position in these circumstances? He was well aware of this decree, and also of the objections which might be stated against it. If the decree had been challenged when produced by him, and that could alone have been done, so far as I can see, either by the titular or the minister, then it would have been set aside effectually as regards all parties, and the overpayments alleged by the Earl of Fife would not have been overpayments at all. On the other hand, if it had not been challenged by the minister or the titular nobody could have challenged it in the locality, and there would have been no call upon Lord Fife in that case to make these overpayments at all. So that the fact of these overpayments having been made, whichever view you take of this decree of approbation, was due entirely to the conduct of the Earl of Fife and his predecessors. It was he that allowed these overpayments to be made by his own conduct.

Now, that surely is not a man placed in the position contemplated by the equitable doctrine stated by Mr Erskine, for he is not only negligent—he is a great deal more than negligent—he has been active against himself, and has been positively heaping up a number of payments against himself, which he never would have done or thought of doing if his decree of approbation was good; while, on the other hand, the overpayments were perfectly right and properly made if the decree was bad.

Now, I cannot say that a party who keeps up a decree of approbation till it becomes fortified by prescription is in a position to plead that his claim cannot be met until forty years after it has become a final decree, because if he had produced it, and it had been given effect to, the interim locality might have been rectified upon his application, and this debt would never have been incurred. It seems to me, therefore, that Lord Fife himself has not been equitable in the proceedings on his own side, and accordingly I think that his plea cannot be given effect to.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the reclaiming note . . . along with the report by the Teind Clerk, and whole other proceedings, and heard counsel for the parties, adhere to said interlocutor."

to accumulate the balance of the income till her death, and "as soon after the death of my said wife as convenient," to distribute the estate among his children in a certain manner, declaring that if any of them should predecease the term of payment without leaving issue his or her share should fall into residue, which was to be divided among children surviving the term of payment and the issue of children predeceasing it. 2D DIVISION.

Charles Muirhead, poulterer in Edinburgh, died on 23d May 1865, leaving a widow and four children—Agnes, Jessie, Charles, and James.

He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1861, conveying his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes. By the trust-deed Mr Muirhead, who was possessed of heritable property in Edinburgh and also of moveable property, directed that in the event, which happened, of his wife's survivance of him, she should have the liferent of a dwelling-house in Young Street, Edinburgh, and the furniture therein, and also a certain annuity varying in its exact amount according to an event specified, but in no case nearly equal to the revenue of his estate. After directions for a conveyance to Charles and Agnes in equal shares of his business, and of the lease of the business premises, of which he was tenant, he provided,—"(Fourth) My said trustees are hereby directed to draw the revenue of all my estate not above disposed of during the lifetime of my said wife, and to accumulate the revenue after paying my wife's said annuity with the principal: (Fifth) As soon after the death of my said wife as convenient my said trustees are directed to dispone" a certain subject to Agnes. By purposes sixth and seventh the trustees were directed to convey other heritable properties to Jessie and Charles, in each case "as soon after the death of my said wife as convenient." "(Eighth) All the foregoing purposes being satisfied, I direct my said trustees to realise the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate," and "(Ninth) I direct my trustees to divide the residue into four equal parts or shares, and to pay over and invest the same as follows," viz., one to be paid over to each of Agnes, Jessie, and Charles, and the fourth to be invested for James in liferent only, and his children in fee; "and if any of my children predecease the term of payment of their provisions under this deed, the said provisions shall lapse and become part of the residue of my estate, unless in the event of the predeceasing child or children leaving lawful issue, in which case such lawful issue shall succeed equally among them to the provisions their parent would have received had that parent survived the term of payment foresaid; and in the event of the predeceasing child dying without lawful issue, and that child's provisions becoming part of the residue of my estate, my said trustees are directed to divide the residue of my estate into as many shares as I have children surviving the said term of payment, or children who, though dead, have left lawful issue, and to pay over, divide, and invest the same in the proportion of one share to each surviving child, and one share to the children of each deceasing child who has left lawful issue."

Mrs Muirhead rejected her testamentary provisions before the end of 1865, and claimed her terce and jus relictæ. Shortly after her husband's death she discharged her jus relictæ for a sum paid to her. She accepted an annual sum in lieu of terce, and this was paid to her down to 31st August 1886, when, under an agreement with the beneficiaries, she discharged it along with all her claims whatsoever as Mr Muirhead's widow.

In September 1886 an action of multiplepoinding was raised with a view to the distribution of the estate, in name of Mr Latta, S.S.C., who had been appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate in consequence of the declinature of the trustees.

In this action the truster's children (1) Charles, (2) Agnes (Mrs Christie), together with her marriage-contract trustees, and (3) the judicial factor, all lodged separate claims maintaining that the period of vesting and of distribution under the trust would not arrive till the death of Mrs Muirhead, the widow.

The truster's daughter Jessie died on 10th September 1866, without issue, but leaving a will, by which she left her estate to her husband, James Crellin, whose representative, James B. Crellin, also claimed on the footing that the provisions to the truster's children had in consequence of the widow's repudiation of her rights under the trust vested at the death of the truster.

James Muirhead, the real raiser, maintained points not necessary to be here reported.

Charles Muirhead, Mrs Christie, and her children and marriage-contract trustees, pleaded;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the trust-settlement of the late Mr Muirhead, no right to the heritable subjects therein specified, or to the residue of the trust-estate, vests in the beneficiaries during the lifetime of the truster's widow, and the claims of Mr James Muirhead and Mr Crellin, proceeding upon the assumption that the said right is now vested, ought to be repelled.

Crellin pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The repudiation by Mrs Muirhead of her liferent provisions under her husband's trust-deed accelerated the period of vesting and distribution of the trust-estate, and in that respect was equivalent to her death.

The Lord Ordinary (Fraser), on 10th June 1887, pronounced an interlocutor finding that the time for distributing the estate had arrived, and repelling the claim for Crellin.*

* "OPINION.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the time for distribution of this estate, and for putting an end to the trust, has arrived. No doubt this would not have been the case if the provisions of the trust-deed had been allowed to take their natural course. The period of division was appointed to be at the death of the truster's widow, and that widow is still alive. Until that event happened, the trustees were appointed to hold the property, and pay the widow her annuity, and to accumulate the balance of the income; but the scheme, as framed by the truster, was not allowed to take effect. The widow refused to accept the provisions in her favour under the will, and claimed her legal rights of terce and jus relictæ, which were accorded to her. The jus relictæ was at once paid up, and quoad the terce, she continued to draw it down to 31st August 1886, when by an arrangement with the beneficiaries she discharged it. Consequently, there is no reason for keeping up this trust any longer so as to protect the provision in her favour. Nor is there any other good ground for doing so arising out of any of the provisions of the deed. It is true that the truster has directed that the income of his estate shall be accumulated by a clause in the following terms: 'My said trustees are hereby directed to draw the revenue of all my estate not above disposed of during the life of my said wife, and to accumulate the revenue, after paying my wife's said annuity, with the principal.' This direction has now become inoperative in consequence of its falling within Crellin reclaimed, and argued;—The vesting was a morte testatoris. There was to be a postponement of it, indeed, by contemplation of the truster, but for one object only, the benefit of the widow. But the widow rejected the provisions of the will and chose her legal rights. She thus wrote herself out of the will and brought to an end the one object of the postponement of distribution. It was said that the truster had another object—the accumulation of income for the benefit of his children on the widow's death, but that was an unnatural view of the settlement, for the children were, in point of fact, grown up and in business before he died. It was thus not like the case of accumulating for behoof of minor children. If, then, the widow's provisions were the one object of the postponement of distribution, her repudiation was equivalent to her death, and as the time of it was the time of her husband's death, the result was vesting at the time of his death.[1] It was impossible to maintain the view of the Lord Ordinary that the time of vesting and distribution was a time subsequent to the widow's repudiation of her testamentary provisions, but yet anterior to her death. There was no sound ground for the argument that the date of a transaction as to terce could be taken as the date of vesting.

Argued for the other claimants;—Mrs Crellin's will could carry nothing if nothing had vested in her. Now nothing vested under the trust till Mrs Muirhead should die, because the testator had postponed the vesting, not merely to secure the widow's provision, but also to build up large benefits for his children. He wished accumulation with capital of all the rents and profits not needed for the widow's annuity, and till the Thellusson Act barred accumulations, in 1886, twenty-one years after he died, he could accomplish that. The expression prefixed to the gift, the prohibition enacted by the Thellusson Act, for on the 23d of May 1886 a period of twenty-one years from the death of the truster expired, and the provisions of the Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III., cap. 98) came at once into operation. Now, although the truster has said that the estate is not to be divided until the death of his wife, this must, in the circumstances, be held to mean that it is not to be divided until her interest in it has ceased, which it has now done by the discharge. There is no object now in keeping up the trust, and no interest to protect, and consequently the trust is at an end (Annandale and Others (Macniven's Trustees) v. Macniven and Others, 9th June 1847, 9 D. 1201; Pretty and Others v. Newbigging and Another (Hunter's Trustees), 1st March 1854, 16 D. 667).

"In regard to the daughter of the truster, Mrs Jessie Crellin, nothing vested in her, and therefore nothing was transmitted by her to her husband, or through him to his executor. She died before the widow had discharged her claim of terce, and she has died before the widow of the truster. It is immaterial therefore to consider which of these periods shall be adopted as the period of vesting. But it is contended on behalf of James Crellin, who claims through her, that the period of distribution must be held to be the date of the widow's repudiation of the conventional provisions in her favour, which was shortly after her husband's death on 23d May 1865, while Mrs Crellin survived till 10th September 1866. The Lord Ordinary is unable to accept this view, which would certainly defeat the provision for accumulation, which was quite lawful for the period of twenty-one years, and would give to the immediate children of the truster a right which he did not intend them to possess,—at least during that period. He provided that in the event of their not surviving the period of distribution their share should go to their children, a provision that would be defeated by holding that the money could be distributed immediately upon the widow's repudiation of the conventional provision in 1865. . . ."

Muirhead.

"as soon as convenient after the death of my said wife," more than once repeated, prevented vesting. The gift to the children was to be after that event, nothing being expressed in favour of the beneficiaries except a direction to convey to them on the occurrence of a certain event, and not sooner, and failing any of them without issue, the provisions conceived in their favour were intended to lapse, and there was no vesting.[1] None of the cases (except perhaps that of Lucas) on which the other side founded were decided on testamentary provisions similar to those here in question, and even that case was distinguished by the terms of the direction to accumulate. In any view there was no vesting till the accumulations became illegal by the operation of the Thellusson Act.[2] That would put out of the deed the direction to accumulate. Annandale's case was doubted in Pretty v. Newbigging.[3] This very settlement had already been before the Court, and it had been held that there was no vesting while the widow survived.[4]

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case some important questions are raised, on which we are now to give our opinion. The main question is one which has occurred in many cases. It is the question how far the repudiation by a widow of the provisions made for her by her husband's settlement, and her betaking herself to her legal rights, will operate as an acceleration of the period of the payment of the provisions made for the beneficiaries under the settlement. In this case the widow's repudiation took place many years ago. She claimed her legal rights and obtained them. After she had for many years enjoyed her terce she entered into an arrangement with her husband's trustees by which she commuted it.

I need not go over the various clauses of the will. It is sufficient to say that ample provision is made for the widow by way of an annuity, and also provision that the money is to be accumulated so far as not required for payment of the annuity. Now, as she took her legal rights the object of the provision for an annuity terminated, or rather never arose, and the question now is, whether the date of her death is still to continue the period of vesting and payment of the provisions under the will, or whether the effect upon it of the events which have occurred is tantamount to her death? The Lord Ordinary has given effect to the latter principle of construction to a certain extent, but he has decided that the date from which the effect of the repudiation is to take effect is not the date of the repudiation, but a date subsequent to it. I have come to be of opinion that that is not the true operation of the principle, but that if the repudiation is to be equivalent to the death of the widow in the sense of the will, that principle must have its full effect, and that the provisions must be held to have vested a morte testatoris, and not from the date merely when she transacted with her husband's trustees to give up her right of terce. I need not go at length into the decisions on the matter. The principle is simply this (and it has often received effect), viz., that where provisions are made for a wife, and the term of payment of the children's provisions is postponed till her death, her repudiation of these provisions and betaking herself to her legal rights will operate as her death, if the postponement is substantially intended solely for the benefit of the wife. If a testator arbitrarily fixes a period, or if he shews a clear intention of postponing the distribution, irrespective altogether of the wife's interest, the wife's betaking herself to her legal rights may not operate as her death would do. But, on the other hand, it has been distinctly decided in the case of Annandale, to which I need not refer at length, that where the object of the postponement is the benefit of the wife, and she betakes herself to her legal rights, the effect will be to accelerate the distribution, as if she had died. The case of Annandale, which has been always upheld as authoritative, referred only to personal property, for the deed was, as far as it related to heritage, reduced ex capite lecti. But there are two other cases which I have before me which deal also with heritage. In one of them, the case of Alexander, 8 Macph. 414, the truster directed his trustees to make certain provisions for his widow during her life, and upon her death, and the youngest of his children having attained majority, and the whole of them being married, to divide the residue of the estate among them. The widow renounced her provisions, and claimed terce and jus relictæ, and the Court held that "as it appeared from the deed that the truster had postponed the period of division to the date of the widow's death for no other purpose than to give effect to the provisions in her favour, which had now lapsed, the period had arrived for dividing the residue."

The same result was arrived at in the late case of Lucas' Trustees, 8 R. 502, where the trustees were directed to pay the testator's widow an annuity, and to give her the liferent of a house, "and whatever further interest and annual income my said estates shall yield . . . shall be accumulated during the lifetime of my said wife by my trustees, and form part of my estate." The estate yielded a revenue after paying the annuity. The residue on her death, after paying certain bequests, was to be vested in certain trustees for the establishment of a charitable foundation, to be called the Lucas Trust. It was held, as the rubric bears, "on the widow's repudiation of the settlement that the trustees and patrons of the Lucas Trust were entitled to an immediate conveyance of the residue, subject to existing and contingent interests." That is the principle to which the Lord Ordinary has given some effect, but as long as the widow was receiving her terce he thinks a bar existed to its receiving full effect. But I think it is now settled that such a settlement must be construed on the principle that the widow's repudiation of the provisions of the will must have the same effect as her death, and I therefore think that these provisions vest a morte testatoris.

There are one or two expressions in the settlement which appear at first sight to create a further difficulty. In particular, there is the provision that if any of the testator's children predecease the term of payment of their provisions under the deed—that is the widow's death—their provisions should lapse unless they leave issue. But I have come to the conclusion that that clause cannot operate to the contrary of the result to which I have otherwise come, and I am of opinion on the whole matter that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and find that the provisions vested a morte testatoris.

LORD YOUNG.—I have thought this case one of difficulty, but on the whole have come to the same conclusion. I do not know how the case ought to have been decided but for previous decisions. But the judgment now proposed is in accordance with these decisions. Had it not been for them there would have been much that was worthy of consideration in the doubt which was felt by Lord Fullerton in one case.[1]

Latta v.

Lord Craighill.—I agree in the opinions which have just been expressed, and have little to add. The question in dispute between the parties is the interpretation of the will of the late Mr Muirhead, who died so long ago as 1865. His widow repudiated the provisions of his settlement immediately after his death, but parties proceeded with the administration of the estate on the assumption that the death of the widow was the time when the beneficiaries under the will acquired a vested interest in their provisions, and when the estate behoved to be realised for distribution. Shortly, however, before the raising of this action some of those interested took up a different view, and the point now to be decided is, what is the true import of the will. Had the widow accepted the provisions which were left to her, no controversy could have arisen. The words used by the testator are plain enough. She was to have her annuity, and until her death the rights of other beneficiaries could not vest, because in every case the death of the widow was specified as the time at which the rights conferred by the settlement were to take effect. The interest of those who predeceased either fell into residue or transmitted to those who had been conditionally instituted. But the widow repudiated her testamentary provisions, betaking herself to her legal rights, and the consequence was that her annuity ceased, and the only impediment to vesting which was apparently in view of the testator was then removed. What is now to be decided is, whether the death of the widow, which was in the view of the testator, or the lapse of her annuity by the repudiation by the widow of her conventional provisions, was to be the period of vesting. The question is one of difficulty, and but for the decisions of the Court in the cases of Annandale and Alexander's Trustees, to which reference has been made, I should have found it difficult to adopt the latter period as the date of vesting. It is always more or less unsafe to depart from the words of a will where these are plain. The risk which is encountered is the making of a new will in place of merely interpreting the words of the testator as we find them in the deed. Whatever conclusion we adopt we must be sure that it is the will of the testator in the one case as well as in the other. Reading the will as a whole, I think the inference is that the death of the widow was specified only because that was the period at which, according to the anticipation of the testator, her annuity would cease. This, I think, is shewn by the fourth purpose of the trust-deed, whereby his trustees are "hereby directed to draw the revenue of all my estate not above disposed of during the life of my said wife, and to accumulate the revenue, after paying my wife's said annuity, with the principal." Thus the payment of the annuity was assumed to be coincident in point of duration with the life of the widow, and but for this consideration her death, so far as we can see, would not have been chosen as the period at which the rights of the other beneficiaries were to become effectual. An earlier period—the lapsing of the annuity—would have been chosen, and accordingly it is only reasonable, I think, to conclude that the termination of the annuity was the end of the time during which the vesting was to be in suspense. This is certainly a reasonable interpretation, and as the presumption is for vesting at the earliest period compatible with the purposes of the trust, and as there are decisions, the authority of which has never been questioned, to the effect that the repudiation is the same in its consequences upon the other trust arrangements as the death of the beneficiary would have been, my opinion has come to be that the date of the repudiation is here the date of vesting.

On the other points which have been noticed it is unnecessary for me to say anything. I concur in what your Lordship and Lord Young have said. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be altered, so that effect may be given to the views of the Court, and the cause remitted to the Lord Ordinary that such order as may be necessary for carrying out the testamentary arrangements of the trust consistently with what has now been decided may be pronounced.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that we must follow the decisions. I therefore concur with your Lordship.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the right to the provisions made by the truster Charles Muirhead in his trust-disposition and settlement vested in the beneficiaries on his death; and with this finding remit to the Lord Ordinary with instructions to proceed as accords."

Arrestments—Recall—Labourer with precarious income—Aliment.—A colliery labourer was entitled to a payment of 12s. per week from his father's estate for his alimentary use allenarly. Owing to an accident he was unable to earn a full wage, but was in receipt of about 12s. per week for his work in the pits. His employment was, however, precarious in respect of his state of health. In an action brought by him in the Court of Session he was unsuccessful, and the defenders obtained decree for expenses. Following thereon they arrested money due to him from his father's estate in the hands of the trustees. The Court in the circumstances recalled the arrestments.

M.

JOHN DICK, colliery labourer, Hamilton, was the eldest son of Robert Dick, who died on 8th June 1885 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he appointed his trustees to pay the liferent of his whole property to his wife, and on her death to hold his whole estate for the liferent use of his surviving children, for their alimentary use allenarly. The provision was declared to be not affectable by their debts or deeds, or liable to the diligence of creditors.

On 10th December 1885 John Dick raised an action in the Court of Session against his father's trustees for reduction of this deed. Mrs Margaret Dick or Russell, and Miss Annie Dick, executrices-dative to Mrs Robert Dick, the truster's widow and one of his trustees, who died in 1886, were sisted as defenders in the action.

John Dick was unsuccessful in the action, and was found liable in expenses.

On 1st December 1887 Mrs Robert Dick's executrices, in virtue of the decree for expenses, arrested the share of the income due to John Dick from his father's estate from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1887 (amounting to £16, 12s. 10d.) in the hands of the trustees.

On 6th December 1887 John Dick presented a petition to the First Division praying the Court, inter alia, to recall these arrestments.

Mrs Russell and Miss A. Dick lodged answers.

Dick v. Russell.

The petitioner averred that in December 1879 he fell into a vat of boiling liquid and was so seriously injured that he was confined to bed for six months, and that he had not recovered and never would recover altogether from the results of the accident. "He is besides suffering from a dropsical affection in his feet and legs which prevents him from working save at light labour. His employment is accordingly precarious, and when working he only earns about 12s. a-week or thereby." He further averred that though anxious to meet his obligations under the decree he was unable to set aside towards that object any part of the alimentary income from his father's estate (about 12s. a-week), upon which he "at present depends for his support." He therefore maintained that the arrestments were oppressive.

The respondents averred that the petitioner was unmarried and able-bodied, and suffered from no incapacity, mental or physical, and that he was in receipt of a wage sufficient to aliment and maintain him suitably in his position in life.

Lord President.—There is no doubt that this fund is alimentary, the only doubt is whether this man's income is excessive, his aggregate income being about 24s. per week. I cannot say that I think that that is more than is necessary for the support of a man in his position. If he were able to earn larger wages the case would be different, but it is evident that he is not in the proper sense of the term able-bodied, and that he cannot earn more than 12s. a-week, and that is somewhat precarious. He is a labourer in the pits, and his work is apt to be interrupted owing to the state of his health. His wages, therefore, depend on his being constantly in employment. In these circumstances, I am for recalling the arrestments of 1st December.

Lord Mure and Lord Adam concurred.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court recalled the arrestments.

Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 47), sec. 4—Moveable Estate—Where no vested right in absentee.—Trustees under a trust-settlement were directed, on the death of the testator's widow, to pay the income of the estate to his son and daughter, and were authorised to pay to them such part of the capital as they should see fit, but they were also empowered to withhold payment thereof altogether. In the event of the son's death without issue before receiving payment of any part of the capital, they were directed to pay his share to the issue of the daughter. The widow died in 1865, and the daughter in 1874. The son, who was not married, disappeared in Australia in 1853 before receiving payment of any part of the estate. In a petition presented under sec. 4 of the Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881, by the issue of the daughter, for authority to make up a title to and receive the share of residue destined to the son in the same manner as if he had died in 1860, held that, as no part of the testator's estate had vested in the absent person, the petitioners could not complete a title through him under sec. 4 of the said Act, and petition refused.

Gordon Ellis, Aberdeen, died on 5th February 1853, possessed of estate to the value of about £650. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 18th May 1850, and duly recorded, in which he directed his trustees to pay the whole revenue of the estate to his wife during her life, with power to encroach on capital, if necessary for her comfort.

The third purpose was,—"Upon the death of my said spouse, I appoint my said trustees and their foresaids to pay the whole annual rents, interest, and revenue which they may receive from my said whole estate, or the remainder thereof, to Gordon Ellis, my son, and Margaret Ellis, my daughter, and that yearly or half-yearly, as they receive the same, and they shall have full power to pay such part of the principal sums or stock of my estate to my said son and daughter, at any time my said trustees and their foresaids may think proper, my said trustees having full power either to withhold payment to my said son and daughter of any part of the principal or stock of my said estate, or they may pay the same to them equally by one payment or by various payments, as to them may seem proper; but my said son and daughter shall have no right to demand payment from my said trustees and their foresaids of the said principal sum or stock of my estate, or any part thereof, it being my wish and intention that my said trustees and their foresaids shall have full and discretionary power either to pay the whole or part of my said estate to my said son and daughter, or to withhold the same from them altogether: Declaring farther, that in case of the death of my said son and daughter, or either of them, before receiving payment of the whole or any part of the principal sums or stock of my estate, and leaving lawful issue, my said trustees and their foresaids shall in that event pay the whole principal sums or stock of my estate remaining unapplied as aforesaid, if any, one half thereof to the lawful issue of my said son, and the other half to the lawful issue of my said daughter, equally among them, or in the event of only one of my said son and daughter leaving lawful issue, then to pay the whole to such issue equally among them."

The testator's widow received the income of the estate till her death in 1865.

His daughter Margaret Ellis or Minty died in November 1874, survived by George Cumming Minty and two other children.

Gordon Ellis junior, son of the testator, left Scotland for Melbourne, Australia, in 1850, being then 21 years of age. He disappeared there, being last heard of late in 1853.

Under these circumstances, George Cumming Minty, and the other children of Margaret, the testator's daughter, presented a petition in terms of sec. 4 of the Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881,* for "authority to make up a title to, enter into possession of, receive, and discharge the

* Sec. 4 provides that "in the case of any person who has been absent from Scotland, or who has disappeared for a period of fourteen years or upwards, and who has not been heard of for fourteen years, and who, at the time of his leaving or disappearance, was possessed of or entitled to moveable estate in Scotland, or who has since become entitled to moveable estate there, it shall be competent to any person entitled to succeed to the said absent person in such moveable estate to present a petition to the Court setting forth the said facts, and after proof of the said facts and of the petitioner's being entitled as aforesaid, and after such procedure and inquiry, by advertisement or otherwise, as the Court may direct, the Court may grant authority to the petitioner to make up a title to, receive and discharge, possess and enjoy, sell or dispose of the said moveable estate in the same manner as if the said absent person were dead." It is provided by section 8, that "for the purposes of this Act, in all cases where a person has left Scotland or has disappeared, and where no presumption arises from the facts that he died at any definite date, he shall be presumed to have died on the day which will complete a period of seven years from the time of his last being heard of at or after such leaving or disappearance."

share of the residue of the estate of the said Gordon Ellis destined to the said Gordon Ellis junior, with the dividends and interest thereof, in the same manner as if the said Gordon Ellis junior had died on 31st December 1860, or on such other date as your Lordships shall fix as the date at which the said Gordon Ellis junior must be presumed to have died."

The testator's trustees lodged answers, in which they submitted that Gordon Ellis junior, if he was to be presumed to have died not later than 31st December 1860, never became entitled to any part of the trust-estate, and that therefore the petition was incompetent. They did not, however, oppose the granting of the prayer of the petition.

The petitioners argued that the Act ought to apply. Were it held not to apply, the petitioners could not get the estate at common law, as Gordon Ellis only disappeared in 1853, when he was quite a young man.[1]

Lord President.—It may be regretted that the Presumption of Life Limitation Act is not so framed as to cover such a case as this, but the only question for us to decide is, whether it does so or not. I do not think that there is any room for doubt about the matter. The testator's directions to his trustees were to pay such portions as they thought proper to the son and daughter, but everything was left to the trustees' discretion, and till they paid a portion to one or the other no right was vested in Gordon or Margaret Ellis. Everything depended on the will of the trustees, for the alternative power of withholding any share of the estate from the son or daughter is clearly expressed. What has happened is this. The son has disappeared for a sufficient time to let in the presumption of the statute, and he must be presumed to have died, under the provisions of the 8th section, in 1860. The effect of his death is not to open to the petitioners a right of succession to him, for he had nothing for them to succeed to, but a right of succession under the will of the testator. They take therefore in their own right, and not as coming in place of the deceased man or taking through him. Now, the section of the statute on which this petition proceeds (sec. 4) contemplates that it shall be competent "to any person entitled to succeed to the said absent person," to petition the Court under the statute. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the petition is incompetent. The position of these beneficiaries is not so desperate as it has been represented to be, for I think ways and means may be found to extricate them from it, and to enable them to get the estate they claim.

Lord Mure and Lord Adam concurred.

Lord Shand was absent.

The Court refused the petition.

Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, as Local Authority for the city, established a fever hospital for the city, and the Royal Infirmary ceased to treat fever patients. The trustees of the fund presented a petition to the Court for leave to divide the fund equally between the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, to be applied by them towards the erection of a home for nurses connected with the infirmary, and the "Dorcas Society in connection with the Belvidere, Knightswood, and Govan Fever and Smallpox Hospitals." The Court being of opinion that the purposes of that society were more nearly akin to the wishes and intentions of the raisers of the fund than the establishment of a home for the nurses of the Royal Infirmary directed the trustees to pay over the funds to the magistrates and council as Local Authority, to be held by them in trust for the Society in order that the annual proceeds might be applied by that society exclusively for the benefit of convalescent fever patients treated in hospitals, the property of the Local Authority of the city, for fever patients belonging to the city of Glasgow, and that by supplying patients who were in need of the same with clothing upon leaving the hospitals, or by enabling them to sojourn for a time in the country or otherwise.

1st Division.

On 15th October 1887 Miss Beatrice Clugston and Others, trustees of the Fever Home Fund, Glasgow, presented a petition to the Court of Session in which they prayed the Court "to authorise the petitioners to make payment to the directors for the time being of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, and to the office-bearers for the time of the Dorcas Society in connection with the Belvidere, Knightswood, and Govan Fever and Smallpox Hospitals, of one-half share each of the sum of £3476, 9s. 6d., together with any farther interest that may accrue thereon, the sum to be paid to the directors of the said Infirmary to be applied by them towards the erection of a home for nurses in connection with said Infirmary; and the sum to be paid to the said Dorcas Society to be applied by it to the purposes of that society: or otherwise, to settle a scheme for the administration of the said fund, with the interest that has accrued and may yet accrue thereon, and that by applying the capital and interest of the said fund, or interest that has accrued or may yet accrue thereon, in the manner above suggested in this petition, or in such other manner as your Lordships may be pleased to appoint; and to grant warrant to the petitioners to apply the said fund, according to the scheme to be settled by your Lordships."

They stated that in December 1866, "a bazaar was held in Glasgow under the auspices of the Royal Infirmary Dorcas Society, Glasgow, for the purpose of raising funds for the establishment of a home for the reception of patients recovering from fever, and a children's hospital, both in or near Glasgow,—both of which charities were promoted by the petitioners, Miss Beatrice Clugston," &c.

"The funds realised at the said bazaar were lodged with the head office of the City of Glasgow Bank, in an account-current in name of 'The Bazaar Fund, per Alex. Stronach,' who acted as honorary treasurer of the bazaar. After payment of various incidental expenses, the net proceeds, which amounted to £4893, 0s. 3d., were appropriated in certain proportions, in pursuance of an arrangement among the parties interested—(1) Towards the establishment of a Convalescent Fever Home, the bazaar having, as already mentioned, been held under the auspices of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary Dorcas Society (the Royal Infirmary being then the only institution for treating fever patients); and (2) In aid of a Sick Children's Hospital. The former sum amounted to £1976, 4s. 6d., and the latter to £2916, 15s. 9d."

They further stated that the sum appropriated to the Sick Children's Hospital was applied in the manner proposed, but that the sum set aside for the Convalescent Fever Hospital, being insufficient to erect such a home as was contemplated, was lodged in bank, and in 1887 amounted to £3476, 9s. 6d.

They further stated,—"The conditions with regard to fever and other infectious diseases existing in 1866 differed from those which the petitioners found to exist on entering upon their duties (1871), in respect (1) that the treatment of these complaints was not then fully assumed by the Local Authority, (2) their hospital accommodation was limited, and (3) it was situated in the centre of the town. The necessity for a Fever Home which existed at the date of the bazaar now, however, no longer exists, for since that date the Local Authority of Glasgow, under the powers and obligations conferred by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, have wholly taken in hand the hospital treatment of infectious diseases. Their accommodation is ample, the hospital being situated in the country, with several acres of pleasure ground attached. The convalescents are kept apart from acute cases, and are retained until fit for work. It is thus obvious that the functions which it was intended should be discharged by the Fever Home are now fully and efficiently discharged, as statutory duties with which private benefactions like the fever fund cannot be mixed up.

"The petitioners therefore believe that in these circumstances it is not only inexpedient, but that it has become impracticable, for them to carry out the objects for which the fund was created, and it cannot be anticipated that anything will occur to alter the position of matters."

Answers were lodged to the petition by (1) the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, and the "Dorcas Society in connection with the Royal Infirmary."

They averred;—"The primary object of this society [the Dorcas Society above named] is to provide warm clothing and other necessaries for the convalescent poor who are about to leave the infirmary; but, as explained in the report for 1886, herewith produced, there are 'besides this, the society's main work, a variety of ways in which it endeavours to follow up and supplement the good work done in that noble institution.' It was this society which, in 1866, organised and held the bazaar mentioned in the petition, conform to copy advertisement from the Glasgow Herald of 17th December 1866, herewith produced. The different stalls or tables were so arranged that while the monies drawn at some were for the Sick Children's Hospital and some for the Fever Convalescent Home then intended to be instituted in connection with the infirmary exclusively, the others were for both objects equally. The funds raised at the different stalls, and apportioned, according to this arrangement, to the Children's Hospital, have been duly paid or applied to that institution, which is now in operation. The remaining funds now in question were intended, as the respondents aver, for the benefit and increased efficiency of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, the particular means then in view being the establishment of a Fever Convalescent Home in connection with that infirmary, which then treated infectious fevers and other infectious diseases. The Lord Provost, who opened the bazaar, was ex officio chairman of the infirmary, and other gentlemen, who had been managers of the infirmary, took part in the proceedings. Three ladies, active members of the Infirmary Dorcas Society, and who, or whose representatives, concur in these answers, were stall-holders in the bazaar.

"At the time of this bazaar, and for some years afterwards, the managers of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary had in view a scheme for erecting a Fever Convalescent Home, but the funds collected at this bazaar were by themselves insufficient. In 1872, while that scheme was still contemplated, they received notice from the trustees of the late Alexander Mitchell of a bequest of £1000, specifically given 'for a Fever Convalescent Home when erected.' Then, or soon thereafter, the managers bought a building at Saltcoats, on the Ayrshire coast, for the purpose of using the same as a Fever Convalescent Home; but they met with so much opposition from the inhabitants of Saltcoats that they gave up their purchase. It was shortly after this that the treatment of fevers and other infectious cases was wholly undertaken by the Local Authority of Glasgow, under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867. That Local Authority has since assessed the city, and erected at Belvidere, near Glasgow, accommodation for fever patients at the public expense, and maintained it at an expense out of the rates of some £35,000 per annum, with ample grounds for convalescents. The infirmary being thus relieved of infectious diseases, has since, and of late years, in addition to its general work, as at the time of the bazaar, laid out large sums of money in providing accommodation, appliances, and staff for treating specialties not previously treated, such as diseases of women, the eye, the ear, and the throat, thereby making the infirmary, as it is recognised to be, one of the largest, if not the largest and best equipped general hospital in the Kingdom. At the present time, and in the present state of the infirmary funds, the particular means of maintaining its usefulness and efficiency most urgently required appears to its managers to be the provision of a suitable Nurses' Home in close proximity to the wards. Such a home has long been contemplated, and would have been built before now, but for the want of funds. It was explained and pressed in the medical superintendent's report for 1885 in the following terms:—'Additional accommodation for the nurses is urgently required, and this can only be met by the erection of a Nurses' Home. Such a home would increase their comfort and preserve their health; it would give additional beds for the reception of patients; and it would also keep the infirmary abreast of the improvements that had been adopted in other similar institutions.' The managers of the infirmary, considering that whatever could contribute to the efficiency of the nursing staff would be of benefit to the patients, and that it was in the interest of the infirmary, as a curative institution, that a separate Nurses' Home should be provided, have, though hampered by the state of their funds, already proceeded with the erection of the necessary buildings, which will cost, when completed, more than £6000. The fund now in question, raised to help their institution with a Fever Convalescent Home no longer required by them, would, especially if undivided, be a substantial assistance towards the present much needed improvement of a Nurses' Home. The Mitchell bequest above mentioned has already been applied to the like purpose by the Court, on the petition of the present respondents, the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, as reported in 14 Rettie, p. 680."

"The respondents plead that the money having been raised in connection with and for the benefit and further efficiency of the Glasgow Royal Infirmary, by adding to its charitable arrangements a Fever Convalescent Home, and that particular purpose having through public legislation become no longer necessary, the money should now be applied to the next best means for promoting the further efficiency of the same infirmary, viz., a Nurses' Home."

Answers were also lodged (2) for the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow, as Local Authority for the city, and the "Dorcas Society in connection with the Belvidere, Knightswood, and Govan Fever and Smallpox Hospitals."

They averred;—"Under the Glasgow Police Act of 1862 the police board in 1865 had provided a temporary fever hospital, situated near Parliamentary Road. By the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, this hospital, which is called 'The City of Glasgow Fever Hospital, Parliamentary Road,' was made a permanent institution, and is now retained as a reserve hospital. The compearers the Magistrates of Glasgow having, under the powers and obligations conferred and imposed upon them by the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, undertaken the treatment of infectious fever cases, they, in 1870, purchased the estate of Belvidere for the purpose of erecting thereon a fever hospital. This estate, which is situated on the eastern outskirts of the city, extends to upwards of 31½ acres. Temporary pavilions were put up to meet the immediate requirements, and from time to time permanent structures were substituted. In this year, 1887, 'The City of Glasgow Fever Hospital, Belvidere,' was finally finished, with 390 beds, having cost altogether the sum of £76,176. In 1876 the Glasgow Royal Infirmary shut up their fever house. The parochial boards had already given up providing accommodation for paupers affected with infectious disease, so that since 1876 the whole hospital treatment of fever has been assumed by the compearers, the Corporation of Glasgow, as the Local Authority. The said Fever Hospital includes accommodation for convalescents, 130 out of the total 390 beds being set aside for that purpose; and the grounds also contain ample accommodation, and are used for the convalescent patients. A difficulty arose almost at once in the hospital management with reference to the clothing of convalescents on dismissal. The great majority of the patients treated in the said hospital belong to the poorer class. Some of them are removed to the hospital with only night-clothes, and others with clothes so dirty and worn-out that the washing to which they are necessarily subjected entirely puts an end to their existence as garments, and almost all the patients, when the time of leaving the hospital comes, are insufficiently clad. The average residence of patients is about six weeks. Prior to 1871 the Dorcas Society in connection with the Royal Infirmary of Glasgow was in the habit of supplying fever convalescent patients with warm clothing, but that Society having intimated that they would be unable to render any more assistance to convalescent fever patients after the expiry of the month of December in that year, a meeting of parties interested was held in the Corporation Galleries, Glasgow, at which, in order to meet the want thus indicated, 'the Dorcas Society in connection with the Glasgow Fever Hospital,' whereof the office-bearers are compearers, was established. The chief object of the members of the society is to provide warm clothing for the fever convalescents on leaving the hospitals. They also occasionally assist convalescents to go to the country for a short time to effectuate complete recovery. During last year they collected money and distributed 5540 articles of clothing among 1307 convalescent fever patients. In 1877 the burghs of Partick, Hillhead, and Maryhill erected on the estate of Scotstoun 'The Joint Burghs Hospital, Knightswood,' and in 1883 'The Govan Combination Fever Hospital' was erected by the burghs of Govan, Govanhill, and Kinning Park, and Govan (Landward) Parish. As these institutions came into existence the Dorcas Society extended their operations so as to include the convalescent fever patients of these hospitals, and the name of the Society was, in 1886, changed to 'The Dorcas Society in connection with the Belvidere, Knightswood, and Govan Fever and Smallpox Hospitals.' A large store for the clothing, and a sitting-room for the lady in charge, have been provided by the Local Authority at the Fever Hospital, Belvidere, which is the centre from which articles are sent to the suburban institutions at Knightswood and Govan.

"Under these circumstances the compearers submit that inasmuch as the funds were undoubtedly originally raised for the purpose of the Convalescent Fever Home, and inasmuch as the institutions above mentioned are now the only institutions which answer that description, the fund should be made over for the benefit of the patients treated therein. The Magistrates of Glasgow, while they have no desire that the said funds should be applied in diminution of the rates, are of opinion that the same should be preserved and applied for the benefit of convalescent fever patients, and the compearers are willing that the fund should be either paid to the Corporation of Glasgow, to be held by them in trust for the compearers, the Dorcas Society, so long as the said Society shall continue to further the objects which it at present sets before it; or otherwise, if the Court should so think fit, that the fund should be paid directly to the office-bearers of the said Society. But they submit that in any view the whole fund should be paid to one or other of them, and not diverted, as is proposed by the petitioners and by the compearers the directors of the Royal Infirmary, to objects which have no connection with the particular purpose for which the fund was originally raised."

The cases cited infra were referred to on the questions (1) whether the Court had power to interfere,[1] and (2) which of the proposed charities was nearest to the wishes and intention of the raisers of the fund.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The funds in question here were raised by a society called the Royal Infirmary Dorcas Society of Glasgow, the purpose for which they were raised being to establish a house for the reception of patients recovering from fever, and also a children's hospital. The latter object is provided for, and the only question is what is to be done with the remainder of the funds. At the time the money was raised the Royal Infirmary received all the fever patients who fell to be treated in the hospitals of Glasgow. Since that time it has ceased to receive any fever patients in consequence of the Local Authority having established a fever hospital for fever patients. That is no doubt a great improvement as regards the interests of public health, but it has created a difficulty as regards these funds, for it is idle to suppose that we can authorise the establishment of a home for patients recovering from fever in the Royal Infirmary when there are no patients of that class in the infirmary at all.

The question we have now to dispose of is how in these circumstances we can fulfil most nearly the wishes and intentions of those who raised the fund. The case resolves into a competition between two claimants. The Royal Infirmary, on the one hand, maintain that as they were the original objects of the charity (or rather that as the Dorcas Society, which was in connection with them, was) and were intended to be its recipients, and to employ it in a certain way, they have the best claim to it now, and what they propose to do is to expend it in providing a home for nurses employed in the infirmary. That certainly is not very near the object of the original charity. It has nothing to do with fever patients or convalescent patients.

On the other hand answers have been lodged for the Magistrates of Glasgow and the Dorcas Society in connection with the Belvidere and other hospitals. They say that in consequence of the new arrangement by which fever patients are now treated in a separate hospital, a meeting was held of parties interested, in Glasgow, and they now state that their principal object is to provide warm clothing for the fever convalescents on leaving the hospital. They further state that since December 1871 they have been in use to employ their funds for that purpose. There is now one fever hospital in Glasgow, the other hospitals in which the respondents are interested not being within the city, and that one hospital in Glasgow no doubt has taken the place of the Royal Infirmary, which was also in Glasgow, in treating fever patients. The contention of these respondents is that the fund will be disposed of in the way most nearly approaching to the wishes of the original donors if it is given to them to assist the convalescent fever patients in the Glasgow Fever Hospital.

My opinion is that the claim of these latter respondents ought to be sustained. Their charity comes very naturally in the place of the charity originally contemplated. The same class of persons will be benefited in the same way as was intended, but I do not see my way to saying that this Dorcas Society should be allowed to use these funds for the relief of patients out of Glasgow. That would be an extension of the charity which I do not think is justified in view of the original purpose of the donors. Subject to that restriction, I think their proposal is just and proper.

Perhaps it is necessary, to avoid misunderstanding, to refer to a case which was some time ago before us (see 14 R. 680), as to a bequest left by Mr Mitchell, with instructions to his trustees to divide his estate among such benevolent and charitable institutions as they thought most proper. Among others the trustees allotted a part of the fund to the Glasgow Fever Hospital when erected. There is some resemblance in the cases, and as the way in which the fund here is to be given is different, I desire to shew the points in which the two cases differ. In the case of the Mitchell fund the money had been paid over to the Infirmary, it was in their possession, and subject to their use. All the Court had there to consider was what was the most profitable purpose to which the fund which was in the hands of the Infirmary could be turned. The words of bequest were very wide, and that came to be the only question. We thought at the time, and I see no reason now to doubt that we were right, that the fund might best be devoted to the Royal Infirmary Nurses' Home when it was erected. There was no competition in that case, the application being ex parte to take the advice of the Court as to how the fund should be disposed of. Here, however, there are competing claims, and we have to determine in which way the fund shall be used so as to answer most nearly to the original purpose and intention of the persons who raised it. I have already said that the party which has applied along with the magistrates is the one best entitled, in my opinion, to succeed; but as to the manner in which the money is to be used, that is a matter for further consideration, and we shall be glad to receive the suggestions of parties on that point.

Public Burdens—Clause of Relief—Lease—Expositio Contemporanea.—In a tack of lands granted in 1788, for sixty years and a lifetime, the lessee bound himself to free and relieve the lessor "of and from payment of feu-duty, land-tax, minister's stipend, and augmentations thereof, if established, and all other public burdens affecting the foresaid lands." In 1854 the lessee sublet the lands by a subtack to a person who had acquired the property, and who, by the subtack, bound himself to pay "the following yearly rents, including the sub-tenant's share of public burdens." The subtack also provided that the lessor in it, being the lessee in the principal tack, should "continue to pay the principal rent . . . . with the poor-rates for the lands as formerly, and shall also pay and free and relieve the proprietor of the feu-duty and other burdens specified in the principal tack."

From the date of the original lease the lessee paid the taxes and burdens exigible from the proprietor, including those imposed by supervenient legislation, and from the date of the subtack in 1854 till 1884 the sublessee paid besides the rent the public burdens payable by occupiers, and did not deduct them from the rent paid by him. In 1887 the latter raised an action for declarator that under the sublease these were included in the rent, and that he was entitled to deduct them therefrom. At the same time the lessee in the principal lease raised an action against the proprietor of the lands for declarator that the pursuer was not by its terms bound to relieve the defender of any proprietor's taxes except those existing at its date, and was entitled to repayment from the defender of all such taxes as he had paid in error since 1854, when the defender became proprietor.

Held that the parties having for a long period of years acted on a particular construction of the obligations of relief, such construction must be regarded as their true meaning, and receive effect accordingly.

By a tack dated in 1788, Alexander Jaffray, proprietor of the estate of Kingswells, in the county of Aberdeen, let that estate to William Black and his heirs, assignees, and subtenants for sixty years, from Whitsunday 1788, and after the expiry of the said sixty years for the lifetime of any person to be nominated within three months before or after the expiry of the sixty years. A rent increasing to £130 after the first forty years was stipulated for, "as also beside the aforesaid rents the said William Black obliges him and his foresaids to free and relieve the said Alexander Jaffray and his above written of and from payment of the feu-duty, land-tax, teind-duties, minister's stipends, and augmentations thereof, if established; and all other public burdens affecting the foresaid lands, and to pay the same annually and regularly as they become due, and report discharges therefor to the said Alexander Jaffray and his above written." Then followed a certain exception as to repairs on the manse, &c., of Newhills.

In 1807 Black assigned his right under the tack to Alexander Jopp, advocate in Aberdeen, and his heirs or assignee. Jopp then entered into possession.

In 1848 the original sixty years of the lease ran out, but the lease continued during the life of a person nominated by Jopp's testamentary trustees who was still alive in 1887.

In 1854 Mr Francis Edmond, advocate in Aberdeen, purchased Kingswells from the representatives of Jaffray. Being desirous of obtaining possession of the estate, in 1855 he entered into a subtack with Jopp's trustees as the tenants under the principal tack, whereby they let to him the estate for all the remaining years of the principal tack, from Martimas 1854. Mr Edmond bound himself to pay to them during the currency of the subtack or the principal tack "the following yearly rents, including the subtenant's share of public burdens," viz., certain rents gradually rising to £665, 11s. 7d., which was to be the rent after the nineteenth year. It was also agreed by the subtack that Jopp's trustees should "also continue to pay the principal rent of £130, with the poor's-rates for the lands as formerly; and shall also pay and free and relieve the proprietor of the feu-duty and other burdens specified in the principal tack."

Mr Edmond thereafter obtained possession of the estate, and continued to possess it by himself and his tenants. During all the years from 1854, the date of the subtack, till 1884, Mr Edmond paid to Jopp's trustees the rents stated in the sublease, and he and his tenants also paid the public burdens payable by occupiers. In 1884 he, for the first time, maintained that he was not bound to pay these burdens, and was entitled to repayment of the amount thereof as payments which he had in error omitted to deduct from the rent. He founded on the words of the subtack, rents, including the subtenant's share of public burdens." In 1884, 1885, and 1886, Mr Edmond withheld payment of the rents.

Jopp's trustees, on 18th April 1887, raised an action against Mr Edmond for these rents.

Mr Edmond lodged defences. He did not dispute that the rents were due, but maintained that the pursuers were due to him a larger sum for public burdens than was sued for.

Mr Edmond then, on 26th May 1887, raised a counter action for declarator that the rents payable by him to Jopp's trustees under the subtack "include the whole public burdens affecting the said lands, or that may affect the said lands at any time during the currency of the said subtack, so far as the said public burdens are payable by the subtenants or occupiers of the said lands and estate; and in particular, that the rents so payable by the pursuer to the defenders include the subtenant's or occupier's share of the following public burdens, viz., poor-rate, school-rate, registration assessment, sanitary assessment, the assessment for road maintenance, and the assessment for cattle disease, and any other assessments which are to any extent payable by tenants or occupiers of lands." He also concluded (2) for declarator that in paying the rent in the subtack he was entitled to deduct the amount of the subtenant's or occupier's share of public burdens, and that the defender was bound to repay him the amount of such share of public burdens, which, since 1855, he had omitted to deduct, and that the defenders were "bound to free and relieve him in all time coming of the subtenant's share of all public burdens affecting the said lands." He also concluded for decree for the sums alleged to have been paid by him in error.

Jopp's trustees lodged defences, pleading, inter alia;—(1) On a sound construction of the principal tack and subtack in question, the defenders are not bound to relieve the pursuer of the burdens and assessments of which repayment is now claimed, and they are therefore entitled to be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the summons, with expenses. (2) Separatim, The sums sued for having been in whole or in part paid not by the pursuer but by his tenants, the pursuer is not in titulo to sue for repetition thereof. (3) In any event, the defenders are not bound to relieve the pursuer of any burdens imposed subsequent to the date of said subtack, or to pay interest on any sum for which they may be liable prior to the date of citation. (5) The pursuer having for a period of thirty years voluntarily paid the public burdens in question without error of fact, and being fully advised with reference to his legal rights, is barred from insisting in this action, and separatim, is not now entitled to repayment of the sums sued for. (7) In any view, the defenders are not bound to relieve the pursuer of subtenant's taxes imposed on rent in excess of the rent payable by the pursuer to them.

This latter action was subsequently conjoined with that which Jopp's trustees had raised for rents.

Jopp's trustees had since 1854 paid the whole public burdens payable by owners in respect of the lands. They on 4th May 1887 raised a second action against Mr Edmond, as proprietor of Kingswells, for declarator that they as in right of the principal tack (1) were "not bound to relieve the defender of any burdens, taxes, or assessments affecting the same, other than those specified in said tack—videlicet, the feu-duty, land-tax, teind-duties, ministers' stipends, and augmentations thereof, if established, and any other burdens affecting the said lands as at the date of the said tack, and such only of said burdens as still affect the same," and that in regard to the parish kirk, &c., the pursuers were only bound to relieve the defender of the expense of repairs; (2) that the defender was bound to relieve them from "all burdens, taxes, and assessments other than those above specified, now affecting or that may affect the said lands and others during the subsistence of the said tack, and in particular of the burdens, taxes, and assessments which are imposed on or exigible from the proprietor of said lands and others under and in virtue of the following statutes"; then followed an enumeration of various statutes passed between 1854 and 1883, commencing with the Valuation Act, 1854, and consisting of statutes whereby burdens were laid on proprietors of lands and heritages for purposes of police, militia, registration, education, and similar burdens, and including a local Road Act passed in 1865. They further concluded for declarator that the defender was bound to make repetition to them of all such payments, and for decree against him for the amount of such payments. They maintained that the burdens imposed by the statutes in question were burdens imposed by supervening legislation subsequent to the date of Edmond's acquiring the lands, and that they were therefore not bound to relieve the proprietor of them.

In defence Edmond maintained (1) that on a sound construction of the principal tack he ought to be assoilzied, because the statutes in question were not supervenient legislation, but were statutes "passed by way of extending and developing the system of local government which had been provided for in statutes prior to 1854, and their purposes and the incidence of the relative assessments were substantially the same as those of the previous statutes"; (2) that in respect of the Valuation Act, 1854, the pursuers themselves were to be deemed "proprietors," and therefore liable for the burdens of which they claimed relief, subject only to the relief thereby afforded.*

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) On a sound construction of the principal tack, the pursuers are bound to relieve the defender of all the public burdens mentioned in the detailed account. (4) In respect of the provisions of section 6 of the "Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854," the pursuers are liable for all the public burdens mentioned in the detailed account, subject only to the relief afforded by said section. (7) The pursuers having for a period of thirty years voluntarily paid the public burdens in question, without error of fact, and being fully advised with reference to their legal rights, are barred from insisting in this action, and separatim, are not now entitled to repayment.

* The Valuation Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), sec. 6, provides that "in estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year . . . and where such lands and heritages are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, without grassum or consideration other than the rent, such rent shall be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in terms of this Act: Provided always, that if such lands and heritages be let upon a lease, the stipulated duration of which is more than twenty-one years from the date of entry under the same . . . the rent payable under such lease shall not necessarily be assessed as the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages, but such yearly rent or value shall be ascertained in terms of this Act, irrespective of the amount of rent payable under such lease, and the lessee under such lease shall be deemed and taken to be the proprietor of such lands and heritages in the sense of this Act, but shall be entitled to relief from the actual proprietor thereof, and to deduction from the rent payable by him to such actual proprietor, of such proportion of all assessments laid on upon the valuations of such lands and heritages made under this Act and payable by such lessee as proprietor in the sense of this Act, as shall correspond to the rent payable by such lessee to such actual proprietor as compared with the amount of such valuation."

et e contra.

On 20th July 1887, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), in the conjoined actions relating to the subtack, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties in the conjoined actions, repels the 1st, 2d, and 5th pleas, and also the 3d plea (except in so far as it refers to the interest claim), and sustains the 7th plea for Jopp's trustees in the action in which they are defenders; and in the same action finds and declares in terms of the first and second declaratory conclusions of the summons, subject to this declaration, that the defenders, Jopp's trustees, are not liable, and shall not be bound to relieve the pursuer, Mr Edmond, of any share of subtenant's taxes beyond the share of such taxes which effeirs to the amount of the rent as specified in said subtack: Quoad ultra continues the cause, and grants leave to reclaim."[] [] "OPINION.—The parties to these actions (which I have conjoined) are at variance as to the extent of their respective rights and obligations, under a subtack of the lands of Kingswells granted by Jopp's trustees in favour of Mr Edmond. The primary question arises on the construction of the clause in the subtack, which provides for the rent which Mr Edmond is bound to pay. By that clause it is provided that Mr Edmond shall pay, during the currency of the subtack, 'the following rents, including the subtenant's share of public burdens, viz., £540, 13s. 2d. for the first crop and year of 1855, £577, 12s. for each of the second and third years, being for crops 1856 and 1857,' and so on for each year during which the tack may endure, the rent increasing in amount as the years advance. The different views maintained by the parties may be thus stated: Mr Edmond contends that, under the clause in question, he is only bound to pay the rent specified, under deduction of the share of public burdens falling upon the subtenant, the share being included in the rent so specified. Jopp's trustees, on the other hand, contend (as I understand their argument) that no such deduction is admissible; that Mr Edmond is bound to pay the specified rent, including,—i.e. as well as,—the subtenant's share of taxes; that in any view the public burdens included in the specified rent can only be those burdens which existed at the date of the tack, and not those imposed by subsequent legislation. On this part of the case I am of opinion that Mr Edmond is right. I entertain no doubt that the specified rent was to include the tenant's share of public burdens. If these were paid by the tenant they formed a deduction from the rent; if the specified rent was paid in full the landlord was bound to pay the tenant's share of public burdens, because a part of the rent he had received was paid to meet these burdens. I can give no other meaning or interpretation to the clause I have above quoted. It is probably not so clear whether the public burdens referred to include all public burdens, at whatever date imposed, or only public burdens existing at the date of the subtack. I am of opinion, however, that on this matter also Mr Edmond is right. If the clause had been an ordinary clause of relief, binding Jopp's trustees to relieve the subtenant of public burdens, I should have decided that such an obligation covered only existing burdens, and did not extend to those subsequently imposed. But the clause I am dealing with is not of that nature. The parties stipulate in advance for a certain rent to be paid in future years, that rent so stipulated including the tenant's share of public burdens. That in effect was a stipulation that the amount of each year's rent,—that is, the nett rent payable to the landlord,—should be ascertained when the burdens for that year had been ascertained. In short the tenant was never to be bound to pay more than the amount of the specified rent, whether he paid it as rents or public burdens. At the same time I think the share of the subtenant's burdens which Jopp's trustees are bound to bear is only such a share as effeirs to the rent specified in the subtack, and not to any greater rent which Mr Edmond may be getting from his subtenant. If it were otherwise, then Mr Edmond by increasing the assessable rent might seriously reduce his own obligations to Jopp's trustees, and reduce also the benefit conferred on them in name of rent under the subtack. I cannot suppose that Jopp's trustees ever intended to leave the amount of their liability

---

Of the same date his Lordship pronounced this interlocutor in the declarator by Jopp's trustees, relating to the principal tack:—"Repels the 7th plea in law for the defender: Finds and declares in terms of the first and second conclusions of the summons, the defender being bound to make repetition, as concluded for, from the term of Martinmas 1854."*

---

practically in Mr Edmond's hands, nor do I think they have done so. Accordingly I sustain the 7th plea for Jopp's trustees in the action against them. A separate question was raised by Jopp's trustees as to the poor's-rates, to understand which it is necessary to have in view a relation of the parties to each other not yet adverted to. While Mr Edmond is the subtenant of Jopp's trustees in the lands of Kingswells, he is also the proprietor of these lands. Jopp's trustees were or are the tenants of the lands in virtue of a long lease granted by Mr Edmond's author, under which Jopp's trustees are bound to relieve the proprietor of certain public burdens, of which poor's-rates is no doubt one. And in the subtack in favour of Mr Edmond, Jopp's trustees bound themselves to pay 'the poor's-rates for the lands as formerly.' On this clause it is maintained for Jopp's trustees that they are only bound under the subtack to pay that proportion of the poor's-rates which they formerly paid, and that consequently poor-rates are not within the public burdens of which the tenant's share is to be deducted from the specified rent. They say that the words 'poor's-rates as formerly' were inserted in the subtack with the intention of so limiting their obligation, and offer to prove that this is so. If there had been any dubiety caused by these words, I would have allowed a proof to clear it up. But I do not find the words attended with any dubiety, and cannot allow a proof to contradict or modify what I think to be the plain meaning of the writ. When Jopp's trustees undertook to pay the poor's-rates 'as formerly,' I think they undertook (superfluously I admit) to pay the poor-rates so far as a burden on the landlord, which they had undertaken to do by the lease under which they hold. But this undertaking is not given in modification or limitation of their other obligations to let the tenant's share of public burdens be so deducted from the rent. The two things are distinct in themselves, and are kept quite distinct and locally separate in the subtack. As regards the poor's-rates therefore, I am of opinion that Jopp's trustees must pay—(1) the landlord's proportion in respect of their obligation under the original lease; and (2) the tenant's proportion as included in the rent under the terms of the subtack.

"I repel the second plea for Jopp's trustees in the action at Mr Edmond's instance. What may have been done between Mr Edmond and his subtenant does not concern Jopp's trustees. Their obligation to Mr Edmond is not thereby affected.—Montgomerie, 3 D. 942 (Lord Jeffrey's note, p. 947); Hunter, 20 D. 1311.

"There are some other questions raised by these actions, into which I do not enter here, as they have been disposed of by me in another action (the 'Assessments Case') between the same parties."

* "OPINION.—. . . . The pursuers aver that since 1854 they have paid a number of taxes or public burdens affecting the lands which do not fall within the clause of relief in the principal tack, and which therefore should have been paid by the defender. The present action is brought (1) to have it declared that the pursuers are not bound under the clause of relief to make payment of said public burdens; and (2) for repetition of the sums already paid by them in error.

"The several statutes under which the burdens now in question were imposed are set forth in the conclusions of the summons, and they are all enactments passed since 1854. Prima facie, therefore, the burdens in question having all been imposed by Acts of Parliament passed since the date of the principal tack, would not fall within the clause of relief, which, binding the pursuers only to relieve the landlord of public burdens then affecting the lands, could not be extended so as to cover burdens imposed by supervenient legislation.

"With regard to three of the statutes set forth by the pursuers, the defender maintains that they are truly continuations of enactments existing at the date of the principal tack, and do not, therefore, fall within the rule applicable in cases like the present as to supervenient legislation. These three are (1) the County Police Act, 1857; (2) the Aberdeenshire Road Act, 1865; and (3) the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.

"1. The County Police Act, 1857, is said to be a continuation of the Acts 11 Geo. I. cap. 26; 2 and 3 Will. IV. cap. 65; and 2 and 3 Vict. cap. 65. These three Acts only dealt with, and authorised the levying of, rogue money, a tax directed to meet the expenses of apprehending criminals, maintaining them until their prosecution, and the expense of their prosecution. The County Police Act authorised assessment for different and more extensive purposes, in which, no doubt, what was formerly levied as rogue money was practically included. But its main purpose was to provide for the establishment of a police force in each county in Scotland, and to provide, by way of assessment, for its maintenance and payment. At same time (by sec. 34) the power to levy rogue money was repealed. I am of opinion, therefore, that the assessments authorised by the County Police Act are not in continuance of the assessment for rogue money, but were new assessments not authorised or levied in 1854.

"2. The question raised upon the Aberdeenshire Roads Act appears to me to be already decided adversely to the defender, by the case of Dunbar's Trustees, 5 R. 350, aff. H. L., 5 R. 221.

"3. The third question relates to the burdens imposed on land by the Education Act of 1872. If the clause of relief in the principal tack in question had bound the tenants to relieve the landlord of 'schoolmaster's salary,' there can be no doubt that that would not have extended to the education rates now imposed—(Stewart, 3 R. 518). The clause of relief is not, however, so expressed, and the defender maintains that the clause of relief as expressed really takes over the whole burden of the landlord as heritor, and that the Education Act has imposed on the land no greater burden than the heritor formerly had to bear. I am not prepared to assent to the view that the Education Act imposes no new burden beyond that for which heritors were by law liable before 1872. But even if I were, I think it clear that the clause of relief was not intended, and in point of fact did not amount to an obligation on the tenant to take over the whole obligations or liabilities of the heritor. The heritor was undoubtedly bound to rebuild the kirk, schoolhouse, or manse where this was necessary, and the clause of relief exempts the tenant in terms from any such obligation. In my opinion the principles of the decision in Stewart's case are applicable here, and I hold accordingly that the burdens imposed by the Education Act of 1872 do not fall upon the pursuers under the clause of relief.

"The defender farther maintains, that in respect of the 6th section of the Valuation Act, 1854, the pursuers are liable in the public burdens in question, subject only to the relief which that section affords. I think this argument is based upon a mistaken view of the section referred to, even if that section has any application in the present case. The Valuation Act is not in any sense a taxing statute; it neither imposes nor exempts from taxation. When by section 6 it declares that in long leases the tenant shall be deemed to be the 'proprietor' for the purposes of that Act, it appears to me to do nothing more than provide means for the convenient imposition and recovery of the burdens which are authorised to be imposed and levied on the basis of the Valuation-roll. It does not certainly, in my opinion, lay taxation on one who is deemed to be the proprietor apart from the terms of any agreement which may exist between the person deemed proprietor and the actual owner. But has the 6th section of the Valuation Act any application here at all? It applies to leases, 'the stipulated duration of which is more than twenty-one years from the date of entry under the same.' The lands in question are held by the defender, not under the tack of 1788, but the subtack of 1854, and the latter is not of the 'stipulated duration' of twenty-one years. It has, as matter of fact, endured

In the Inner-House neither party was prepared to argue in support of the pleas founded on the practice since the date of the subtack, that practice being hostile to the view which each maintained in their respective declarators. Each party maintained their respective contentions as to the clause of relief in the tack and subtack, which have been above explained.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The parties to these actions are Mr Francis Edmond, and the trustees of Andrew Jopp. The circumstances under which the questions involved in these actions arose are somewhat peculiar. It seems that in 1788 the proprietor of the estate of Kingswells let the estate to the authors of Jopp's trustees on a long lease, which was to run for sixty years, and for and after the sixty years "during the lifetime of any person to be condescended upon and nominated within three calendar months before or after the expiry of the said sixty years," by the tenant. The sixty years ran out in 1848, but there was the nomination of a life then made, as contemplated, and the lady nominated, Miss Beattie, is still alive, and therefore the lease has not yet expired.

Jopp acquired the tenant's part of the lease in 1807, and Mr Edmond acquired the property of the lands in 1854. At the same time Edmond took a subtack of the lands from the tenant in the long lease, and has continued in possession since that time. Thus it appears that on the one hand Edmond is proprietor of the lands, subject always to the principal tack, and on the other is tenant under a sublease from the lessee in the principal tack.

In these circumstances the question arises between Edmond and Jopp's trustees as to their mutual rights, which is the subject of these actions.

The first process is an action by Jopp's trustees against Edmond for rent. That is met by Edmond by a counter claim under the subtack, and he has raised the second action to give effect to it, maintaining that under the subtack he is entitled to deduct the public burdens payable by the subtenants or occupiers of the lands from the sum of rent he is to pay to Jopp's trustees. Then Jopp's trustees raise the third action for relief of a variety of public burdens, by reason of a clause of relief in the principal tack.

These, in substance, are the claims of the parties, but one fact of importance remains to be mentioned—that in regard to both these tacks the course of possession and dealing has been the reverse of what both parties maintained in their pleadings to be the true state of their rights, in other words, the respective contentions made by them in these actions were never raised till 1883. Possession has been had under the principal tack for nearly 100 years, and under the subtack for nearly thirty years, without such claims being put forward, and for more than twenty-one years, but that is not to the purpose. Its stipulated duration was the 'remaining years and crops still to run of the principal tack,' and as that depended on the life of a certain person the defender's lease might have expired at any time. It was not, and could not be, certain that the lease would last for twenty-one years, and it was not so stipulated. The defender urges the provisions of the Valuation Act in the view that the lands are held under the tack of 1788. But it appears to me that the lease referred to in the Valuation Act is the lease under which the lands taxed are naturally or beneficially held when the tax is imposed, and if that is so, the lease to be considered is the subtack of 1854 in the defender's favour. It follows that the lease of 1854 not being of the 'stipulated duration' of twenty-one years, the Valuation Act does not apply.

"I repel the defender's seventh plea on the authority of Hope v. Lumsdaine, 9 Macph. 865."

to pay the whole revenue of the estate to his wife during her life, with power to encroach on capital, if necessary for her comfort.

The third purpose was,—"Upon the death of my said spouse, I appoint my said trustees and their foresaids to pay the whole annual rents, interest, and revenue which they may receive from my said whole estate, or the remainder thereof, to Gordon Ellis, my son, and Margaret Ellis, my daughter, and that yearly or half-yearly, as they receive the same, and they shall have full power to pay such part of the principal sums or stock of my estate to my said son and daughter, at any time my said trustees and their foresaids may think proper, my said trustees having full power either to withhold payment to my said son and daughter of any part of the principal or stock of my said estate, or they may pay the same to them equally by one payment or by various payments, as to them may seem proper; but my said son and daughter shall have no right to demand payment from my said trustees and their foresaids of the said principal sum or stock of my estate, or any part thereof, it being my wish and intention that my said trustees and their foresaids shall have full and discretionary power either to pay the whole or part of my said estate to my said son and daughter, or to withhold the same from them altogether: Declaring farther, that in case of the death of my said son and daughter, or either of them, before receiving payment of the whole or any part of the principal sums or stock of my estate, and leaving lawful issue, my said trustees and their foresaids shall in that event pay the whole principal sums or stock of my estate remaining unapplied as aforesaid, if any, one half thereof to the lawful issue of my said son, and the other half to the lawful issue of my said daughter, equally among them, or in the event of only one of my said son and daughter leaving lawful issue, then to pay the whole to such issue equally among them."

The testator's widow received the income of the estate till her death in 1865.

His daughter Margaret Ellis or Minty died in November 1874, survived by George Cumming Minty and two other children.

Gordon Ellis junior, son of the testator, left Scotland for Melbourne, Australia, in 1850, being then 21 years of age. He disappeared there, being last heard of late in 1853.

Under these circumstances, George Cumming Minty, and the other children of Margaret, the testator's daughter, presented a petition in terms of sec. 4 of the Presumption of Life Limitation Act, 1881,* for "authority to make up a title to, enter into possession of, receive, and discharge the

* Sec. 4 provides that "in the case of any person who has been absent from Scotland, or who has disappeared for a period of fourteen years or upwards, and who has not been heard of for fourteen years, and who, at the time of his leaving or disappearance, was possessed of or entitled to moveable estate in Scotland, or who has since become entitled to moveable estate there, it shall be competent to any person entitled to succeed to the said absent person in such moveable estate to present a petition to the Court setting forth the said facts, and after proof of the said facts and of the petitioner's being entitled as aforesaid, and after such procedure and inquiry, by advertisement or otherwise, as the Court may direct, the Court may grant authority to the petitioner to make up a title to, receive and discharge, possess and enjoy, sell or dispose of the said moveable estate in the same manner as if the said absent person were dead." say the words meant over and above the public burdens. But in this instance also it is not necessary to come to a conclusion, for from 1855 to 1883 the settlement of accounts proceeded on the opposite principle from that which Edmond now contends for.

I therefore think that neither of these new contentions can receive effect, and that neither party can complain if they are left on the footing they themselves selected. Something was said in the argument in Jopp's trustees' action—the assessments case—as to the effect of the Valuation Act, as if a right had been acquired under that statute to be free of the public burdens in question. I think that proceeded on a complete misapprehension of the matter. The Valuation Act is for ascertaining the annual value, and nothing else, and the machinery pointed out is that where lands are let to a tenant for not more than twenty-one years—thirty-one if minerals—the rent, if a fair rent without grassum or the like, is to be held to be that value for the purposes of the Valuation-roll. If the lease is for more than twenty-one years the rent payable is not necessarily to be entered on the roll as the yearly value, but is to be otherwise ascertained, and the lessee is to be deemed proprietor. But the Valuation Act does not apply here. Edmond is the proprietor in the sense of it, for he is the person who receives the rents and consequently comes under the statutory definition of proprietor. On the other hand his tenants do not hold for terms over twenty-one years. The leases are ordinary agricultural leases, not exceeding twenty-one years.

I have thought it right to make these last observations though they are not really necessary to my decision. I think the rule regulating both cases is that afforded by the construction which both parties have put upon their respective rights.

Lord Young.—The relation between the parties is singular but quite comprehensible. Edmond is proprietor of Kingswells, having bought it in 1854. But it was the subject of a long lease which might be of long duration, and which indeed still exists. It had run sixty years and was to run during the life of Miss Beattie, who is still alive. Its duration is uncertain. Edmond desired when he became proprietor to get the possession, which he could not do without arranging with the tenant who held the long lease, viz., Jopp's trustees. Here the complication begins. The simple course—I presume, however, some difficulty arose as to it—was to have bought up the right of the tenant. But the course adopted was that Edmond became tenant under a subtack from these lessees of the principal tack—his sublease being entered into in 1855. The principal tack had then subsisted for nearly seventy years, and that the contract between Jopp's trustees and Edmond related to a principal tack which had subsisted for that time I regard as a material fact in the case. Now, it occurred to Edmond—for we were told it first occurred to him—to raise these questions in 1884 or so,—that is thirty years after he became proprietor, and twenty-nine after the date of the subtack,—to do so. He had up till then been paying the tenant's burdens he now disputes. From 1855 to 1884 he paid them without question. In that year it occurred, I say, to him that there was a clause in his subtack, "including the subtenant's share of public burdens," which was in his favour, and might put the obligation of paying these burdens on Jopp's trustees as granters of the subtack, and he began to withhold payment of the rent payable under the subtack in order to recoup himself for the burdens which he had theretofore paid, but which according to this new view were really due by Jopp's trustees. That put them on their inquiry, on their own side. The result was that they thought they had misunderstood the principal lease, and the result is that we have three actions,—1st, by Jopp's trustees against Edmond for rent which he is withholding as I have described, and the summons in which action was signeted on 18th April 1887; 2d, a declarator by Jopp's trustees with respect to the meaning of the clause in the principal tack which in 1884 they had come to think they had misconstrued; and 3d, a declarator by Edmond against them that the clause of the sublease "including the subtenant's share of public burdens" imports an obligation on them as lessors to pay the public burdens payable by subtenants or occupiers. As this idea of Edmond was the beginning of the strife, I shall state my views as to this last action first.

The conclusion of it is for declarator that Jopp's trustees are bound to free and relieve him, Edmond, in all time coming of the subtenant's share of all public burdens affecting the lands; and that conclusion is founded on the clause "including the subtenant's share of public burdens." The words occur in the clause of obligation to pay rent. The meaning of these words is not obvious. But we are desired by the summons to declare what the parties meant by them, if they meant anything. At first sight it seems simply inaccurate language, and to have no meaning, and one therefore looks for some indication of what the parties understood, or to see if they understood nothing. We have the usage for twenty-nine years, and find that the parties who made the contract annually—for their attention was annually called to the matter—for twenty-nine years acted on the footing that the words meant nothing. That is just what they mean to my view on reading them—nothing. The parties having thus for twenty-nine years acted on that view of them, one of them now asks us to declare that the other undertook by them to pay all the public burdens of the tenants or occupiers. I cannot declare that. Such an obligation was never so expressed before. The words do not express it, and if we are asked to declare that they imply it the conduct of parties shews that they do not. The tenants paid their own burdens, and relief was never applied for. But Edmond's view is this, "You are to ascertain what the agricultural tenants pay as tenants or occupiers, and then you are to permit me to deduct from my rent to you a sum corresponding to that." That I think is extravagant, and if that construction had been suggested at once, and without the clear light of the usage of many years, my decision would have been the same as it now is, but in the face of the light of these many years' usage it seems to me as clear a case as I ever saw for refusing decree. I am therefore for sustaining the defences in Edmond's action, and assoilzieing Jopp's trustees from its conclusions, with expenses.

Now, I shall next refer to the action at the instance of Jopp's trustees for rent. They are, of course, entitled to the rent withheld by Edmond on the view of his rights which we are now about to negative. In that action I am for giving decree.

There only remains the action by Jopp's trustees for declarator of the soundness of the counter idea which they took up when reflecting on Edmond's new idea to which I have alluded. It is that whereas they have been paying under the principal tack all the landlord's burdens, they were really only bound to pay those subsisting at 1788, and not bound to pay those imposed by subsequent legislation. Well, there are many decisions to the effect that a clause of this kind in a feu-charter under which a superior undertakes to relieve of burdens is limited to those subsisting at its date, and which alone, therefore, are the date of the feu. But the rule is to ascertain, as satis- , what the parties intended. Here we have the means of for we have the usage of nearly 100 years under the principal ct made between the present disputants when that tack was old, on the footing of the usage subsisting then, which was ed, that the lessee should pay all the landlord's burdens of the rted by the clause, whether imposed in 1788 or by subsequent ince 1788 we have, I say, the contract of 1855, and alike before and since t date the lessees under the principal tack have paid all the landlord's burdens. This ascertains what the parties understood, and with reference to what they contracted in 1855, and they have acted on the contract then made. I am therefore for dealing with this contention as we are to do with Edmond's new contention. I think we should assoilzie the defender Edmond in this action, so that with respect to the supposed newly discovered rights, hinc inde, the defending party will be assoilzied from the claim made by the other.

Lord Craighill concurred.

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—I am of the same opinion. I think we must hold that the contracts should be construed as the parties themselves construed them for a long course of years.

In the conjoined actions the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, except in so far as it conjoins the actions, and in the actions at the instance of the said trustees against Francis Edmond ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £668, 16s. 1d. sterling, with interest at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, as concluded for: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses . . . and decern: And in the action at the instance of Francis Edmond against the said trustees, in respect parties have arranged inter se for the settlement of the claims for assessments in connection with the repairs of parish buildings . . . find it unnecessary to dispose of the conclusions relating thereto, and quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of said action: Find them entitled to expenses . . ."

In the action of declarator by Jopp's trustees against Edmond, the Court assoilzied the defender.

Martin.

James Ross, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Moncreiff—G. R. Gillespie.

Property—Sale—Title—Possession.—In 1875 two adjoining feus, one feued to Caldwell in 1795 the other to Kelly in 1803, came to belong to one proprietor.

In 1880 he exposed them for sale by public roup in two lots. The articles of roup described the first lot as "that portion of land feued out to William Kelly . . . bounded on the east by the house and garden now or formerly belonging to William Caldwell, . . . extending per measurement to 22 falls and 9 ells of land." Caldwell's lot was next described by boundaries only, but the description of the western boundary was not intelligible. On the margin of the articles opposite the description of Kelly's feu were the words,—"Three houses near Millgate, occupied by M. Finn and others," and opposite the description of Caldwell's feu the words,—"House and large garden, occupied by William Hannah."

Balderston became the purchaser of Caldwell's lot, and recorded his disposition in February 1880; and Martin became the purchaser of Kelly's lot, and recorded his disposition in March 1880. Martin took possession of the two houses built on Kelly's feu, and of one house and a joiner's shop which had been built on Caldwell's feu, with a strip of ground—also part of Caldwell's feu—behind them. Both dispositions as recorded contained descriptions identical with those in the articles of roup, but without the marginal notes.

In May 1885 Balderston sold his (Caldwell's) feu to Ross, and in November 1886 the latter raised an action against Martin for declarator that the portion of Caldwell's feu possessed by Martin belonged to him (Ross).

It was admitted or proved that Martin understood that he was purchasing the whole subjects of which he had taken possession, and that if he lost the ground in dispute his feu would be reduced to one-half of the extent specified in his disposition. The extent specified was identical with that specified in the original grant to Kelly, but it was proved that prior to 1850 a large portion of Kelly's feu had been used as a public road.

Ross, in his evidence, admitted that he never intended to buy the house on the disputed ground, and in the end abandoned his claim to that, but stated that he understood he was buying the other disputed subjects.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) that the subjects in dispute were within the pursuer's and not within the defender's title, that the pursuer as a singular successor could not be affected by such personal exceptions as might have been pleaded against his author Balderston, and therefore that he was entitled to decree as concluded for, except as regarded the house.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
M.

IN 1795 William Honyman, of Græmsay, feued out to William Caldwell, a piece of ground in the village of Blackburn, in Linlithgowshire, and in 1803 he feued out an adjacent piece of ground on the west to William Kelly. The feus continued to be separately owned and occupied for over forty years, but by 1875 they had both come to be the property of Thomas Robinson Johnstone.

In February 1880 Johnstone exposed both feus for sale by public roup.

The eastmost (Caldwell's) feu was sold to Lawrence Balderston. The articles of roup contained this description of it,—"All and Haill that part or portion of land, with the houses thereon, in the village of Blackburn, bounded on the south by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Road; on the west by the feu sometime ago granted to David Mitchell; on the north by the lands sometime belonging to the said William Honyman; and on the east by the feu now or formerly belonging to David Brownlee, lying in the parish of Livingston, and sheriffdom of Linlithgow." On the margin of the articles of roup there was this note,—"House and large garden, occupied by William Hannah."

The disposition in favour of Balderston was dated 4th, and recorded 11th February 1880, and contained a description of the subjects identical with that in the articles of roup, but without the marginal note, and the boundaries given were the same as those in the original feu to Caldwell except that the western boundary in the original feu was stated to be "the feu recently granted to David Mitchell."

The westmost (Kelly's) feu was sold at the roup to William Martin, whose title was not recorded till 2d March 1880. The articles of roup gave this description of the subjects:—"In the third place, All and Haill that part or portion of land feued out to William Kelly, merchant in Glasgow, by William Honyman, Esquire, of Græmsay, bounded on the east by the house and garden now or formerly belonging to William Caldwell, on the south by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Road, and on the west and north by the lands sometime occupied by David Prentice, extending per measurement to 22 falls and 9 ells of land, all lying within the barony of Blackburn, parish of Livingstone, and sheriffdom of Linlithgow." There was also this marginal note,—"Three houses near Millgate, occupied by

M. Finn and others." The description in the recorded disposition in favour of Martin was the same as in the articles, with this addition, and without the marginal note,—"Together with the buildings and erections on the said part or portion of land, and all my right, title, and interest therein." The boundaries and measurement in the original grant to Kelly were identical with those in the foregoing description.

With reference to the discrepancy between the western boundary of Caldwell's feu and the eastern boundary of Kelly's, it was not disputed by the defender in the action after mentioned that there was no trace of any grant in favour of David Mitchell ever having been feudalised.

In 1885 Balderston sold his (Caldwell's) feu to James Ross. The disposition in favour of Ross, which was dated 27th and 30th May, and recorded 5th June 1885, contained the same description of the subjects as in the disposition by Johnstone to Balderston.

In November 1886, Ross brought an action against Martin for declarator "that a piece of ground in the village of Blackburn, parish of Livingstone, and sheriffdom of Linlithgow, extending to 11 poles 20 yards or thereby, imperial measure, bounded on the south by the old Edinburgh and Glasgow Road; on the east by the gable-wall of the cottage belonging to the pursuer, and presently occupied by Hugh M'Conkie, and by a line drawn northwards in continuation of the line of the said gable-wall; on the north by the lands belonging to Sir William Macdonald Honyman, Baronet, of Torbanehill; and on the west partly by the eastern gable of a house belonging to the defender, and partly by a stone wall and thorn hedge, said last-mentioned gable-wall terminating at a point 31 feet to the westwards of the gable-wall of the said cottage belonging to the pursuer, and occupied as aforesaid, being the portion of ground coloured pink on the plan herewith produced and referred to," was part of the ground conveyed to the pursuer under his disposition from Balderston; and for removing.

The pursuer, after setting forth his own and the defender's titles as recorded, averred;—(Cond. 4) "The piece of ground, with reference to which decree of declarator is now sought . . . was in the occupation of William Caldwell, the original feuar of the pursuer's property, from the date of the feu-disposition till his death in or about 1838, and continued to be possessed as part of the feu granted to the said William Caldwell by his successors therein. The said William Caldwell built a joiner's shop on the said piece of ground against the gable of his own dwelling-house (that now occupied by Hugh M'Conkie); he drew the rents of a cottage which stands on the said piece of ground at the western extremity of it, and otherwise exercised all the rights of ownership . . . If the said strip of ground is deducted from the pursuer's feu there will be left an extent of 1 rood 12 falls, being considerably less than the extent to which he is entitled under the original feu-right granted to William Caldwell."

The pursuer also denied the defender's averments of want of bona fides.

The defender founded on the conditions in the articles of roup and on the recorded titles, and in his statement of facts averred, inter alia;—(Stat. 4) "The properties as now possessed by the pursuer and defender respectively exactly answer the descriptions and measurements contained in said articles and dispositions. Were the pursuer's claim in the present action to succeed, the defender's subjects would be reduced from three houses (as bought by him) to two, and from 22 falls and 9 ells of land (as specified in the disposition in his favour) to about half of that extent. On the other hand, the pursuer's property would be increased by the addition of a house other than that formerly occupied by Hannah, which alone he bought, and would be very greatly increased in extent and nearly doubled in value. The pursuer was aware of this when he purchased from Mr Balderston, and he knew that what he now alleges to be his ground was being possessed by the defender as owner thereof. The pursuer was not a bona fide purchaser of the subjects described in the summons."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being by virtue of his titles heritable proprietor of the subjects in question, is entitled to decree of declarator and removing as asked. (2) The defender having no right or title to the property or possession of the subjects in question, should be ordained to remove therefrom.

The defender pleaded;—(3) Under the titles, including the articles referred to, the claim of the pursuer is unfounded, and the defender should be accordingly assoilzied. (4) The pursuer not having been a bona fide purchaser of the subjects described in the summons, he is not entitled to decree as concluded for, and the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (5) The defender being the owner of the strip of ground in question, is entitled to absolvitor.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect: Between the ground marked pink on the plan and the pursuer's undisputed property the only boundary line was an ill-defined footpath. On the other hand, between the ground marked pink and what was undoubtedly the defender's property, there was a well-marked boundary hedge, except between the points occupied by the eastern gable of the house referred to in the summons. That house was marked C on the plan, and was one of the houses "occupied by M. Finn and others," mentioned in the marginal note on the articles of roup of the defender's property. The house described in the summons as occupied by Hugh M'Conkie was that described in the articles of roup of the pursuer's property as occupied by William Hannah. There was also a joiner's shop on the disputed ground, the rest of which was a garden. There was no doubt that the whole subjects in dispute were in the possession of Caldwell as proprietor from the original grant in 1795 down to about 1842, and there was no other title to which that possession could be ascribed except the grant of 1795. The defender when he made the purchase intended to buy, and thought he was buying, the whole subjects in dispute, and he was in the occupation of them at the date of the action. The pursuer, who was a native of Blackburn, but had left it in early life, deponed that he never intended to buy the house marked C, but that he did intend to buy the joiner's shop and the garden. He further deponed that he had bought the subjects from recollection and without visiting them, and that according to his recollection his boundary line was the hedge, the line of which he was surprised to find on visiting the place included the house C on its eastern side. He stated that he had included the house C in the summons only because his agent advised him that his proper course was to claim all his titles gave him. Kelly's feu without the ground coloured pink was nearly one-half less than the extent specified in the conveyance to the defender, but it appeared that some time before 1850 a large strip of ground on the west was taken off Kelly's feu to form the Riddochhill Road.

On 18th April 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) assoilzied the defender.*

* "OPINION.—There can be no doubt, upon the evidence, that the subjects in question form part of a property which was purchased by the defender in 1880 from Mr Robinson Johnstone, the common author of the parties, and which he has possessed ever since under the title given to him by Mr Johnstone, in implement of the contract of purchase and sale. If the question had arisen between him and the seller there could have been no difficulty in sustaining the defender's right. But the subject in which the defender is infeft is described in the disposition in his favour as the portion of land 'feued out to William Kelly, merchant in Glasgow, by William Honyman of Græmsay, bounded on the east by the house and garden now or formerly belonging to William Caldwell, on the south by the Edinburgh and Glasgow Road, and on the west and north by the lands sometime occupied by David Prentice, extending per measurement to 22 falls and 9 ells of land.' The pursuer alleges that he has acquired the property originally feued out by the common superior, Honyman of Græmsay, to William Caldwell in 1795, and that that feu has been shewn to have included the piece of ground described in the conclusions of the summons. He therefore maintains that whatever may have been the defender's bargain with Mr Johnstone, and whatever possession may have followed upon it, the defender can have no right in the disputed ground available against him, because the description of the subject as 'the ground feued out' to Kelly, and the boundary by 'the house and garden belonging to William Caldwell,' effectually exclude the disponee from any part of the ground originally included in Caldwell's feu.

"If the feus granted to Caldwell and William Kelly respectively had been separately possessed from the date of the original feu-right, and the question between the parties had depended exclusively upon the identification of the original feus, the pursuer must probably have prevailed. But for many years before the defender's purchase both feus had belonged in property to one proprietor, and the question is, what part of the property then belonging to him the common author, Mr Johnstone, sold and conveyed to the defender, and what part to the pursuer's immediate predecessor, Mr Balderston?

"The piece of ground in dispute is occupied by a house and garden, with a shed or building, which is spoken of in the proof as a joiner's shop, attached to the house. There can be no question that this house, with the joiner's shop, was part of the subject purchased by the defender, or that it was intended to be included in his title. He bought three houses, and if the pursuer's construction of his title is right he will only have two. But a few days before the sale to the defender, the common author, Mr Johnstone, sold to the pursuer's predecessor, Balderston, the subjects which the pursuer acquired in 1885. Upon his purchase being completed, the defender entered upon possession of the property which he understood that he had acquired, including the house and joiner's shop in dispute, and he has continued in the undisturbed possession of the whole until the present claim was advanced by the pursuer. Mr Balderston entered on possession of the adjoining property, and asserted no right to the eastmost of the defender's three houses, or to the joiner's shop. The pursuer frankly admits that when he made his purchase from Mr Balderston he was perfectly well aware that the defender was in possession, and was reputed proprietor of the house and garden now in dispute. His case, therefore, is based exclusively on a strict construction of the titles.

"The description in the defender's title requires to be explained by evidence, because what is meant by the feu granted to Kelly, or by the house formerly belonging to Caldwell, cannot be known without evidence as to the history of the possession. The result of the evidence appears to me to be that the ground, of which he is now in possession, coincides in part, but in part only, with the feu granted to Kelly. There appears to have been a small piece of ground included in the original feu, to the west of the defender's property, and to which

Lord Rutherfurd Clark.—This case, which is concerned with a property of trifling value, is attended with considerable difficulty.

In the village of Blackburn there were two feus, the one given out in 1795 to William Caldwell, and the other in 1803 to William Kelly. These were adjacent feus. It is true that in the feu-disposition of 1795 Caldwell's feu is described as bounded on the west by the feu recently granted to David Mitchell. But there is no trace of a feu-right in favour of Mitchell having ever been feudalised. For the feu granted to Kelly is described as bounded on the east by the house and garden belonging to William Caldwell.

he asserts no right; and I think it probable that the disputed ground on the east was not originally in Kelly's but in Caldwell's feu. But then the extent of the ground conveyed to the defender is specified in the conveyance as 22 falls and 9 ells of land per measurement, and that is within 2 ells of the extent of the ground of which he is now in possession. The defender, therefore, will lose about half of the extent of ground specified in his title if he is deprived of the ground now claimed by the pursuer. In these circumstances, I think the reference to Kelly's feu must be regarded as demonstrative, and not as taxative. There is no question about any of the boundaries except the boundary on the east. But it is to be observed that the eastern boundary is not 'Caldwell's feu,' but the 'house and garden formerly belonging to Caldwell,' and that is a description which will be satisfied by the boundary claimed by the defender, because the pursuer's house and garden, which lie immediately to the east of the disputed ground, did at one time belong to Caldwell. There is thus a description of a piece of ground by specific measurement, within boundaries of which one alone is ambiguous. If the ambiguous boundary be construed in one way, it will satisfy the measurement; if it be construed in the other way, it will diminish the property to a very material extent. The larger measurement is in accordance with the possession which has followed upon the title, and it is in accordance also with the evidence as to the extent of the ground embraced in the contract of sale to which the title was intended to give effect. I think it would be inconsistent with sound principles of construction to allow the description by measurement to be overruled by the reference to the original feu. Nor does it appear to me that the description by measurement will be satisfied by including portions of the old feu, to which the defender has admittedly no right, in order to restore the quantity of ground which will be cut off by the pursuer's claim. The measurement given in the defender's title must be taken to mean the measurement of the ground actually conveyed.

"There might have been greater difficulty if the pursuer could have alleged that the ground in dispute was clearly within his title, and that he had bought on the faith of the record. But neither of these points can be maintained. His boundary on the west is described as the feu granted to David Mitchell; and it is admitted that no trace of a feu-right to David Mitchell has been recovered. But he did not purchase in reliance upon any description in the titles, but upon his general knowledge of the ground, and he admits that he never supposed he was buying the defender's eastmost house, which forms the most important part of the subject he now claims, but only the joiner's shop. The witness Young, who acted as the pursuer's agent in making the purchase, knew that the defender was in possession of the joiner's shop. But, whatever doubt the pursuer may have had as to the joiner's shop, he had none as to the defender's property in the house. He claims the house, to which he admits that he has no just right, because he has been advised that the construction of the titles, upon which alone he can make good his claim to the joiner's shop, must either be pressed so far as to include the house also, or must be admitted to be untenable. It follows that the construction to which he asks that effect should be given is inconsistent with the admitted rights of parties. . . . ."

It appears, then, on the face of the later title that Kelly's feu was adjacent to Caldwell's feu, and the possession which followed on the feu-rights puts this point beyond a doubt. For Caldwell and his successors possessed up to Kelly's feu, and Kelly and his successors possessed up to Caldwell's feu. There is no trace of the existence of any intermediate right, except the mention of Mitchell's feu, which must be laid aside as having been nothing more than a personal fee.

The next question is, what did Caldwell's feu comprise, and here again the possession is decisive. It is clear that Caldwell and his successors possessed up to the western margin of the ground coloured pink on the plan which is before us, which is the disputed ground. It is not necessary to examine the evidence, for it is all one way. The house marked C was all along in the possession of the Caldwells, as well as the ground behind it. The feus were divided from each other by a well-marked boundary hedge running along the west side of the pink ground, and, as I have said, each feuar possessed up to that boundary.

The defender suggested that Caldwell's possession of the ground coloured pink must be attributed to a title other than the feu-right of 1795, because on the theory that that ground formed part of Caldwell's feu, Kelly's feu was materially less than the dimensions given in his title. There are two answers to this suggestion. Caldwell's possession must be attributed to the only title which he is shewn to have had, and it is proved that Kelly's feus were diminished by alterations which were made on the Riddochhill Road. Mrs Lind, whose grandmother occupied a house on Kelly's feu, remembers that there was a garden on the west side of the house, which no longer exists. It may be safely inferred that the garden was taken in order to make the alterations on the road.

So far, all, I think, is clear. The two feus were contiguous, and the ground in dispute was comprised in Caldwell's feu. The titles and possession continued to be the same down to 1841 or 1842.

At a later date the feus came to be held by one person, and of course from that time onward it is immaterial to consider the state of possession. We may advance to the year 1875, when they both belonged to Thomas Robinson Johnstone.

In February 1880, Johnstone disponed a piece of ground to Lawrence Balderston. The description and boundaries of the subject so conveyed are the same as occur in the original feu-right granted to Caldwell. This subject was conveyed by Balderston to the pursuer in 1885, and by consequence the pursuer is ex facie of his title the proprietor of the ground originally feued to Caldwell.

The subjects of which the defender is in right were acquired by him from Johnstone, conform to disposition dated March 1880, so that his title is later than the pursuer's. They were conveyed to him according to the boundaries contained in Kelly's feu, and therefore on the face of his title he is proprietor of Kelly's feu, and of nothing more. If, therefore, the case were to be decided by the titles alone, it seems to be clear that the pursuer's must prevail. His title contains the ground in dispute. The defender's title does not contain it.

But the defender maintains that Johnstone did not intend to sell, and that Balderston did not intend to buy, any part of the ground coloured pink. He points out that the entire subject as it stood in the person of Johnstone was exposed for sale in two lots, conform to articles of roup under which Balderston made his purchase. Each of these lots was described in precisely the same terms as Kelly and Caldwell's feus are described in the feu-contracts. Indeed, the description in the articles of roup is nothing more than an excerpt from the original titles. But on the margin of the articles the lot which the defender acquired is described as consisting of "three houses," while the lot which the pursuer acquired is described as consisting of a "house and large garden occupied by William Hannah." The defender contends that the description contained in the titles must be construed in conformity with what is shewn to have been the true bargain, that Balderston could not claim more than what he intended to buy, and that the pursuer is in no better position. I confess that I have much sympathy with the defender, for it is clear enough that he intended to buy, and thought that he was buying, the whole subjects which he now possesses, and it is equally certain that after he obtained his disposition Balderston did not take possession of any part of the ground which is now in dispute. But the case cannot be disposed of on these considerations alone, because the defender has no title to the ground which he claims, and because the title is clearly in the pursuer, who is a singular successor.

If the question had arisen with Balderston, it is by no means clear that he could not have vindicated all the subjects which were conveyed by the disposition in his favour. But if it were pleaded against him that such a claim was contrary to the good faith of the bargain, to what extent would his claim be limited if such a plea received effect? It is founded on the marginal note in the articles of roup, and I do not see that it could be pressed further against him than that his claim must be consistent with that note,—in other words, that he could claim nothing which the articles under which he purchased assigned to the other lot which he did not buy. But that lot was described as consisting of "three houses near Millgate, occupied by M. Finn and others." If he did not claim any of these houses, there is no evidence that his claim would be contrary to his bargain.

It is true that when the defender took possession of what he thought he had purchased, and erected some buildings on a part of the disputed ground, a question was raised by Balderston as to the defender's right, but he did not persevere with it or bring it to decision. But there is no evidence to shew that he surrendered any right, or that he would now be barred from putting forward his claims if he had continued to be the owner of the feu which he had bought. It is certain that he conveyed nothing to the defender, and nothing more is proved than that he did not at that time take any legal steps to vindicate what he asserted to be his rights.

Thereafter he sold to the pursuer, who bought according to the titles. The pursuer acquired all that was in Balderston's person, and I, as I have already said, do not think that it can be doubted that he acquired the disputed ground. If the titles were ambiguous, much might be urged in favour of the defender. But when they are clear, how can the pursuer be prevented from vindicating what is in his title? It is not affected by any personal exception which could be stated against Balderston, for the pursuer is a singular successor. The defender cannot claim the ground in question, for he has no title to it. It is true that he is in possession, but he is without a title, and his possession has not been of such duration as to give him any aid. The case therefore comes to this point, that the pursuer has a title to the disputed ground, while the defender has none, and inasmuch as he has no title to it, he has no title, and never had any title, on which he can resist the pursuer's claim.

But I am disposed so far to modify the conclusion which I have reached as afterwards made up, in which the complainers averred that the respondents had received from them as commission on the price of the mines the sum of 37,632 dollars—being upwards of £7500—being 28,857 dollars, corresponding to the call of £8, 10s. on 700 shares, and 8775 dollars, which was at their credit in the company's books as above stated. Mr Walker, a partner of the respondents' firm, having been a promoter, and subsequently having become a director of the complainers' company, the complainers contended that the respondents were bound to refund the sums above mentioned, and that upon an accounting it would be found that the respondents were indebted to them. They therefore averred that the bill in question had been granted without value, and ought not to be enforced.

Their case, shortly put, was that "the respondents, and in particular their partner James D. Walker, took an active part in the promotion of the said company, and in the preparation and issue of the said prospectus; and they also took an active part in the negotiations with the vendor of the said mines. . . . The said James D. Walker was, and acted from the first as, a director of the company. The firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company (the respondents) throughout acted as the agents, managers, and factors of the company at San Francisco. Following on the formation of the company, the provisional agreement with the vendor was confirmed, and the stipulated price of 400,000 dollars was, by or with the authority of the directors, paid to or on account of the vendor." They stated further that the arrangement regarding the payment out of the price of the mines to the respondents "was known to Mr Walker, but was not disclosed nor known to the board of directors, nor to the company or its shareholders."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) Power to accept bills not being conferred by the memorandum and articles of association on the company or its directors, and not being necessary in the ordinary course of its business, the granting thereof was ultra vires, and the bill in question is null. (2) There being no balance due by the complainers in account with the respondents, no value was received by the complainers in respect of the bill libelled, and they are entitled to suspension and interdict as against the respondents, Falkner, Bell, & Company. (3) The sum of 35,000 dollars, equal to £7000 or thereby, being a payment obtained by the respondents—the firm of a promoter and director of the complainers' company—out of the price of subjects sold to the company, falls to be credited to the complainers in account with the respondents. (4) In any event, the complainers are entitled to retain the amount of the said bill in extinction pro tanto of the said debt due to them.

The respondents stated in answer;—"The respondents believe that the £7500 referred to was a sum which they were credited with by Mr Charles Sutherland of San Francisco, in respect of an agreement between them and him, with which the complainers have no concern. The said £7500 was arranged to be paid by Mr Charles Sutherland to the respondents from the proceeds of a sale to the complainers' company of certain mining properties in America, but, at the request of Mr Sutherland and the complainers, the respondents took payment of the said sum of £7500 in shares of the complainers' company, with the exception of a certain sum which is due to them by the complainers, and stands at their credit in the complainers' books. No cash has ever been received by the respondents from the complainers in respect of said arrangement." "The prospectus is referred to. succeeded in selling them one-half of the nett profits was to be paid to Falkner, Bell, & Company, and a quarter to Mr Sutherland himself.

On 13th January 1881 a meeting was held in Edinburgh to consider a proposed purchase of the mines, and as the result of it a provisional agreement was drawn up, under which Mr Sutherland, as first party, agreed with certain persons as second parties, including Mr Walker, to sell the mines in question for the sum of 400,000 dollars to a company, to be thereafter incorporated under the Companies Acts, and to be named the Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Company, with a capital of £100,000 (£10 shares), provided the result of certain inquiries which were to be made by an engineer, who was to report upon the nature and value of the properties, and by a lawyer, who was to investigate the title, was favourable. Five gentlemen were named, of whom Mr Walker was not one, who were to have the sole right of determining whether the company ought to be incorporated. This agreement was signed by Mr Sutherland and by the gentlemen present at the meeting, including Mr Walker.

A prospectus of the company was issued on 21st January following, which gave the names of the provisional directors, among which was that of Mr Walker. The prospectus also bore,—"It is proposed that, if the company be incorporated, Mr James D. Walker, of the well-known firm of Falkner, Bell, & Company, San Francisco, should be managing director in California. His firm, and other parties in San Francisco, will subscribe £10,000." It was further stated that the company was not to be incorporated until Mr Price, the engineer who had been employed, had reported, and that no agreement other than the provisional agreement with Mr Sutherland had been entered into on behalf of the company. Copies of the prospectus were sent to Falkner, Bell, & Company for circulation.

The inquiries made by the committee having proved satisfactory, the company was incorporated on 8th March 1881, the provisional directors, including Mr Walker, being appointed in the articles of association the first directors of the company.

The memorandum of association bore that the company was formed for the purpose of acquiring various mining properties, and recovering precious metals from them, &c., and it embodied the provisional agreement of the 13th January. It was signed, inter alios, by Mr Walker.

Of the purchase price of the mines, amounting to 400,000 dollars, 350,000 dollars were remitted in cash to Falkner, Bell, & Company, and of that sum 330,000 dollars were paid to the original owners, and 20,000 to Mr Sutherland. The balance of 50,000 dollars was put to Falkner, Bell, & Company's credit in the books of the new company; they were at the same time debited in the books of the company with 41,225 dollars, being £8, 10s. per share on 1000 shares, which were to be taken up by them and their friends, on which £8, 10s. was called up, leaving 8775 dollars at their credit. These shares were afterwards registered by request of Falkner, Bell, & Company, 700 in name of one of their partners, Mr Harrison, and 300 in the name of Mr Sutherland.

In 1884 Falkner, Bell, & Company, who acted as the company's agents and managers in San Francisco, drew three bills upon the company for £1000, £2000, and £3000 respectively. These were at first accepted, but subsequently the company refused payment of them, and brought a note of suspension and interdict against Falkner, Bell, & Company, and James D. Walker, as an individual member of the firm, in which they craved interdict against the defenders doing diligence upon the first of these bills, amounting to £1000.

Interim interdict having been granted, and consignation of the bill, and £20 to cover interest and expenses having been made, a record was tion, and by the provisional agreement between the vendor and the provisional directors Mr Walker was excluded from taking any part in considering whether the American property should be purchased or not, and as to what reports and evidence of value should be obtained. In point of fact it was intended that Mr Walker should be merely managing director or manager, and it was not necessary that to hold that office he should be a member of the company. He never was, and as above explained was not qualified to be, a director in the ordinary sense of that term." They further averred that Walker's name had appeared erroneously, and without his consent, in the articles of association as one of the first directors.

In regard to the averment as to Walker's knowledge of the arrangement between Sutherland and the respondents, they stated;—(Ans. 10) "Denied that Mr Walker was a party to the agreement here mentioned, or knew that it was to be made. Explained that it was made in America between Mr Sutherland and Mr Thomas Menzies, a member of the respondents' firm, before Mr Sutherland came to this country to try and dispose of the mining properties he had for sale. Mr Walker knew nothing of said agreement till after Mr Sutherland came to London. It is denied that the arrangement as to the respondents receiving a share of Mr Sutherland's profit on the sale of the mines was not disclosed or known to the company. The provisional directors and other gentlemen were made aware of the arrangement at a meeting or meetings held preliminary to the purchase of the properties."

The respondents pleaded;—(2) The complainers are bound to make payment to the respondents of the sum contained in the said bill, the same being a liquid debt, and they are not entitled to refuse to make payment of the same in respect of the illiquid and unconstituted claim for £7500 against the respondents, now put forward for the first time. (3) The ordinary course of the company's business requiring that they should accept the bills to their foreign managers against expenditure necessarily made by them abroad on the company's behalf, the bill in question is valid; and separatim, the complainers are barred by their own actings and course of dealing with the respondents from pleading that it is null. (5) No part of the sum of £7500 mentioned in the complainers' third plea having been paid to or being in the hands of the respondents, the complainers' pleas of compensation and retention are excluded.

Falkner, Bell, & Company raised a counter action concluding against the complainers for payment of the bill for £3000. The averments and pleas in this action were similar to those already set forth, and the two actions were conjoined.

Falkner, Bell, & Company afterwards raised another action against the company for payment of £2000, the sum contained in the second bill above mentioned, with costs, interest, charges, and damages, and of a sum of £1540 as remuneration for work done by them as agents for the company since its formation in 1881. This action was subsequently not insisted on by Falkner, Bell, & Company, as it appeared that they had no title to sue upon the bill. It need not therefore be further adverted to.

In February 1885 the company having resolved on voluntary liquidation, Francis More, C.A., was appointed liquidator, and he was afterwards sisted as a party to the actions.

Parole proof was led in the conjoined actions at great length, and documentary evidence was also produced. It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the proof, the result of which sufficiently appears from the Lord Ordinary's note, and from the opinions of the Judges.

Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Co. Limited, v. Falkner, Bell, & Co.

It dealt chiefly with the question whether the directors were or were not cognisant of the agreement between Mr Sutherland and Falkner, Bell, & Company, and with the negotiations about the formation of the company. It was proved that the agreement had never been communicated to the shareholders.

Mr Walker's name was shewn to have appeared in the lists of directors and in the annual reports of the company for each year except 1882, and its omission in that year was explained to be due to an oversight.* The minutes of meetings of the committee, dated 25th February and 5th March 1881, were produced, at the former of which Mr Walker was present. At the general meeting of the shareholders of the company, held on 22d May 1883, he fell to retire from the directorate, but was re-elected. It was proved that he had signed the memorandum of association for fifty shares.

With regard to the 1000 shares set aside for Falkner, Bell, & Company, although it appeared that no formal letter of allotment and no call letters ever reached them, letters were produced from them,—the first dated 6th July 1881, bearing:—"Register of stock.—Please place Mr C. Sutherland's in his own name, and our shares in the name of H. D. Harrison. Please keep Mr Sutherland's with you, and send our certificate to Messrs Bell, Harrison, & Company"; and the second, dated 16th August 1881, bearing:—"Shares.—Of the 1000 shares referred to, 700 are for our account, to be registered in name of Mr H. D. Harrison; and 300 for Mr Sutherland, to be registered in his name." That left 8775 dollars or £1809 still at the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company, and it appeared that in May 1882 Walker was asked to join a private syndicate to take up those shares of the company which had not been taken up by the general public, and he agreed to make a contribution of the 8775 dollars for that purpose. These shares were registered in the company's books in name of Mr W. J. Menzies on behalf of the syndicate.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) on 24th June 1887 pronounced this interlocutor in the conjoined actions:—"Repels the first plea in law for the complainers and defenders, the Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Company, Limited, and liquidator; sustains the third and fourth pleas in law for the said complainers and defenders: Sustains the respondents' and pursuers' claims upon the bills libelled; but in respect the complainers' and defenders' counter claim exceeds the amount thereof, in the suspension and interdict, interdicts and suspends as craved, and in the action for payment assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action: Grants warrant to the liquidator of the said Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Company, Limited, to uplift the sum of £1020 consigned in the process of suspension and interdict, with the interest accrued thereon, and

* Mr Walker, in cross-examination for the liquidator, deponed,—"I was not surprised to find in the prospectus that I was to be managing director in California, because that had been arranged. I was surprised to find my name appear as a director, because I did not see what use I could be to the company here, and I had never been asked to be a director. I got copies of the prospectus sent to me immediately on its issue, and I sent copies to various of my friends. I did not take any objection when I saw my name included as a director. I did not mention to the friends to whom I sent copies of the prospectus that that was a mistake, because when I got the prospectus and saw my name in it I took no objection to it, and I thereby gave consent. I afterwards signed the articles of association, in which I was named as one of the first directors of the company. I cannot say whether I attended any of the meetings of directors in Edinburgh after the company was formed, but if the minutes shew that I did I will accept that."

authorises and ordains the Clerk of the Bills to pay over the same to the said liquidator, and that on production of a certified copy of this interlocutor and decree: Finds the Scottish Pacific Coast Mining Company, Limited, entitled to expenses in both actions, and in the conjoined actions." *

* "OPINION.—The first question for consideration in these actions is, whether the defenders are liable to the pursuers for the sums contained in three bills for £1000, £2000, and £3000 respectively, drawn by the pursuers and accepted by the defenders in June 1884. [His Lordship then dealt with the £2000 bill, which he explained was now out of the case.]

"As to the other two bills, the objection that the directors had no power to accept was not seriously pressed at the debate, although the defenders' pleas upon that point were not withdrawn. I see no reason, however, to doubt the defenders' liability. Falkner, Bell, & Company were their agents in California, and were required to make disbursements on their account. But the moneys of the company were in Scotland, and the acceptance of bills was the ordinary and convenient method for making remittances to America. . . .

"Assuming the sums contained in the bills to be due, the next question is, whether the liquidator of the defenders' company is entitled to retain; and the ground on which he claims to do so is, that the pursuers' firm has taken benefit to a greater extent than the amount sued for from an unlawful agreement between one of its partners and the directors of the defenders' company, or some of them. The facts upon which this claim arises do not appear to me to be doubtful.

"The company was formed for the purpose of acquiring and working certain mining properties in California, described in a provisional agreement mentioned in the published prospectus. The nominal vendor of these properties was a Mr Charles Sutherland of San Francisco, and the provisional agreement was made between him and certain gentlemen, who afterwards became directors of the company, and one of whom was the pursuers' partner Mr Walker. But before any negotiation had taken place between Mr Sutherland and the promoters, other than Mr Walker, a prior agreement had been made between him and the partners of the pursuers' firm in San Francisco by which it was agreed that if the pursuers should by their introduction enable Mr Sutherland to find a purchaser for the mines in this country, one-half of the profit which Mr Sutherland might make upon the transaction was to be paid to their firm. In pursuance of this arrangement, Mr Sutherland was introduced by the pursuers' partner Mr Walker to the gentlemen who promoted the company; and an agreement was made by which the mines were purchased from the company for 400,000 dollars, of which 330,000 dollars went to certain prior owners or bondholders on the property, and the remaining 70,000, which represented the vendor's profit upon the sale, was to be divided, according to their previous arrangement, between Mr Sutherland and Falkner, Bell, & Company. It was subsequently arranged that Falkner, Bell, & Company, should take their share of the profit in shares, paid up to the extent of £8, 10s. on £10 shares. The agreement was carried out after the formation of the company by payment of 350,000 dollars in cash, of which 330,000 was paid to the original owners, and 20,000 dollars to Mr Sutherland. This left 50,000 dollars of the price; and in June 1881 that sum was put to the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company in the company's books and in their current account with the company; and on the same day they were debited with 41,000 dollars odds, which represented £8, 10s. per share on one thousand shares. Seven hundred of these shares were registered, at the pursuers' request, in name of one of their partners, Mr Harrison, and three hundred in name of Mr Sutherland. This left 8775 dollars at the credit of Falkner, Bell, & Company. But in May 1882 certain of the gentlemen interested in the company formed what is called a syndicate for the purpose of taking up the shares which had not been taken up by the public. Mr Walker agreed that he should contribute to the purposes of the syndicate the sum with which his firm was credited, and accordingly that sum was paid over, or put
